And now my work's for the day has begun.
Open the door, open the windows,
Make the fires, and sweep the stairs:
Take down the shutters, place them neat,
Clean the grates and sweep the street!
Do a thousand things or more,
Before the house is open to the store.

* * * *

Now a few lofty errands there were,
Overhauls a dozen things or more,
Looks at all things, chooses some,
And though living a mile must have it sent home.
Back to the Post-office I must bound,
Whether there's letters or whether there's none,
Next there comes a heavy box,
Which in vain I try to carry,
A wheel-barrow I must trundle,
Softly, 'go quick and do not tarry.'

* * * *

If it is a rainy day,
There's bills to be sent out for debtors to pay.
And my wants are at la vain,
For 'tis always, 'Call again,'
Now the dinner comes on,
Now I hasten quickly home;
At the table I have a seat,
Sit no down and quickly eat.
To the clock my eyes I keep,
And I rise and haste away!
Running home to bring o'er,
What the morning saw before;
And when night's dark veil doth come,
Wearily dragging my tired limbs home;
Softly my feet all inherrit and sore,
And my shoes sit torn and new;
As tough I pretend to welcome you,
Get something to eat, for supper is o'er;
And up the stairs I drag to bed
My wearied body and weary head:
And all the long, long night I ocan
In an earthy bunnie in my dream.
All these things and many more,
Which I have to bear in number o'er;
Borrow and care, but never joy.
Is the AUTOBIOG OF THE ETHANOL BOY."

—C. C's

"I remember, I remember,
In the days now long gone by,"

is not so good as the old version:

"I remember, I remember
The cat where I was born."

The feeling is tender; but tender feeling is not, of itself, poetry.

—Omega and Omicron find that "all the persecutions of the Puritans of England, the Protestants of France, and elsewhere, were followed by great revivals and the increase of the Christian Church," and infer that the present great wrecks ing may be considered as a kind of reaction from the Spoay slaughters of Christians in India. The letter is full of generous enthusiasm about the revivals—an enthusiasm which we will hope flowers into humble, patient, self-sacrificing lives.

—Rev. sends "dear Mr. Lounger" part of a letter from a poet-friend, written during a late sunny-day remain. It is a hymn to sunshine:

"The most blessed of manifold blessings is the genial sunshine.

"Without it, beauty were but a radiant myth—bright objects seemed as but unattractive forms and opaque undistinctive.

"It is God's sweetest charity to His pauper-children: yet what mattered it how much it were without our kindling glow of gratitude to the beneficent Giver!

"What marvelous power it hath! It quickens it heaves the bending 'bow of promise;' unto the evening sky with crimsons hues it gives a glowing blush down with gay threads of light; and throws the lingering mantle o'er the dying day.

"Spreads a tapestry of varied green o'er hill and valley, forests with flowers of every form and hue; rocks the trembling forest-maids of spring with leafy verdure; and, to the country dance of autumn, a wardrobe gives of scarlet, gold, and crimson, that India dyes may vainly strive to imitate."

—The Lounger has been speaking of the University to-day, and is glad to have his attention called to the good sense of a suggestion in the catalogue and laws of the "Irving College, in Maryland. "The regular reading of good periodicals in more than one respect, considered of great importance to every student, therefore, is requested to subscribe to some good paper, according to his own selection and with the approval of the faculty." This suggestion is full of good sense; for in this country, where every young man is to have an active share in the government, he cannot be graduates, it is only fair and necessary that he should have the same knowledge of politics that he fairs. Dr. Longstreet, also recommended every college student to take a newspaper. It is pleasant to find such intelligent adaptability to new times and a new country.

Mr. Longum.—Allow me to suggest to Mr. Try that the word "acumen" is probably derived from the Greek as and acuo, to sharpen, and not from acumen, a point from the Latin language. In not a sufficient reason for confusion to the present spelling?

Respectfully yours, Pedagogue.

—C. A. B., Davenport, Iowa. "An ambitious young gent" wishes to know whether Longarm in "Lucile" is spelled "Long" or "Longe," "Longe" is right, and resemble other children? Even so, C. A. B., even to being "ambitious young gents."

—Greek informs us that upon visiting the land of dreams he was requested to examine the "Book of mortal Washington," and was told that he was still in the Abe. We are glad the editor's chair of Harper's Weekly. The Editor informs the Lounger that he wishes people in dreamland could keep a secret.

—Dolly Ann, who says

"I am one of that nondescript class called Single Women—belonging to a genus, but of no particular species or method, but only know why existing—alone our friends," speaks very well upon a very important subject; namely, domestic civility, or good manners at home; and concludes thus:

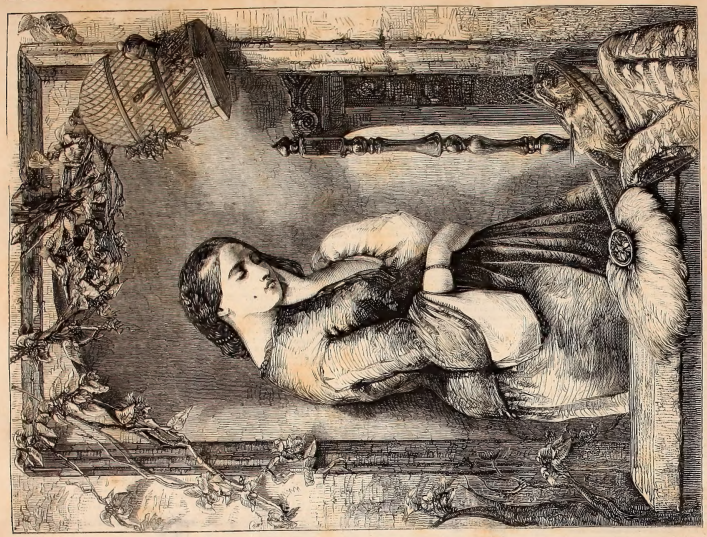
"If you, dear Lounger, can put your sex wife and daughter, without exacting a proper acknowledgment, they will claim it as their undoubtable right from you, but, after all, in all the relations between husband and wife, parent and child, brother and sister, master and servant, these little civilities are strictly observed, a habit is formed which will inevitably be carried out and practiced in the world, and this crying evil rectify itself."

—Agricola Randol sends the following epigram upon a recent vote in Congress. It is late, but it, perhaps, as good as ever:

EPIGHAM.



"The day is fixed the struggle's to be ended, Turnout to vote, and Kansas free be minded!"
"What is the day?—when it is?" Answer truly."
"The best of all, the 1st of April."
Let no one call our Congress irreligious,
Let no one attribute to it superstitious:
The golden mean is chosen, and by the rules they Have taken from the Almanac of Poor Richard.
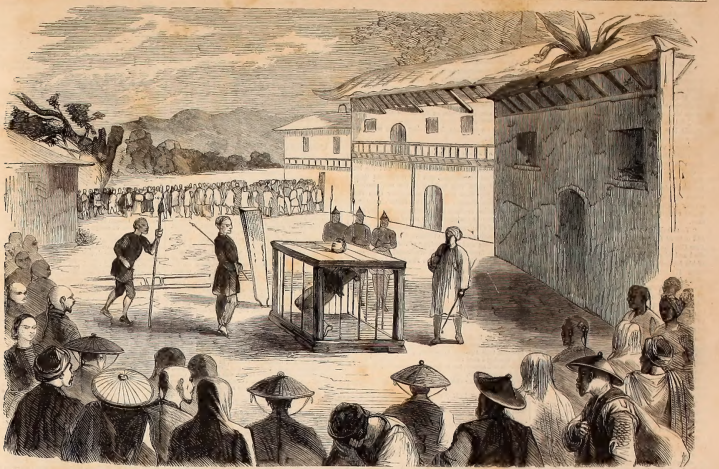
And to their patron saints have made appeal
Ere guide them, and insure the commonweal."

—Several letters to Spring come declaring in upon the warm air of these April days. They show that the old magic still works, and that song and love woken with the birds and flowers. But they have nothing which would make them very interesting to the general reader.

—A Savage, Tobacco Worm, replies promptly to the Mrs. Lounger's letter to the boys, with genuine gallantry:

"Why lovely antagonist have dismed me as a 'crusty old bachelor,' and inadvertise that my sentiments are positively pleasantable to 'staring a lady out of countenance,' or because they compel her to look through the juice.' Here the precious Methods does me great injustice. I am a 'crusty old bachelor,' but that is only instead of being 'crusty,' I am quite amiable—too much so for my own happiness. Staring ladies out of countenance is not one of my accomplishments; and I utterly detest that I would attempt to acquire any art which evidently compelled to 'wade' under the embarrassing circumstances which it has so elegantly described. On the contrary, my pity is easily excited; and if I should see my humble Methods endeavoring to make headway against such a sea of troubles, I would rush to the rescue, lift those feet, as Hero changé, form the consternation, and, in the most graceful manner imaginable, 'pick me up' and dispatch her safely to 'quarters dry.'"



The Lounger trusts his correspondent may never have the opportunity of doing any such thing. But his gallantry does not console us. Except for Christy to Miss Melinda, and wishes her to know that he has lately been singing psalms "like a nightingale."

DISAPPOINTMENT.

HOPE.

PÈRE CHAPELAINE IN THE CANGUE.

HOPE AND DISAPPOINTMENT.

These two pictures have been exhibited at a late Exhibition of Paintings in London.

They are by Mr. A. J. Woolmer, and place him in a high rank among British artists. They are beautiful pictures, full of tender sentiment poetically expressed. In the one, we have a fair-haired girl looking out in joyful expectation at the approach, or supposed approach, of her lover; the glad sun-rays so bright that she is obliged to shield her eyes from their influence with her feather-fan. In the other, we find that the fond expectation has not been realized—the advancing form was not that of the loved one—and, the fan thrown aside, with head resting on hand, all is disappointment and dejection. The quaint old window surrounded by the trailing foliage, the bird-cage and the knitting implements, indicate that our heroine is in the seclusion of an old country mansion, where the advent of an agreeable visitor would be an occurrence all the more important and welcome for its rarity.

We are sure that the lady subscribers to Harper's Weekly will be glad to add these pretty faces to their album gallery.

A RECENT MISSIONARY MARTYR.

Opinions are divided as to Chinese civilization. Part of the civilized world regards the Chinaman of this day as the result of an effete ultra-civilization; the other part looks upon him as a narrow-minded barbarian. In theory, the first-mentioned supposition is perhaps correct; in practice, the last is most likely; as is proven by the terrible and wanton cruelties practiced upon an inoffensive French Jesuit missionary and several of his Chinese converts, last year, in the province of Quangsi, in Southern China, circumstantial accounts of which, by an eye-witness, have just been received in France.

The Reverend Father Chapelaine had labored for a number of years faithfully and quietly in various provinces of the Chinese Empire. Genial, inoffensive, ingenious, and a man of letters even in the Chinese sense of that term, the good Father was more than usually successful in gaining the good-will of the people among whom he labored, and even in conciliating the authorities generally in his favor so far as to cause these to leave him unmolested. Thus matters had gone for some years, until February of last year, when, being then resident in a city of the province of Quang-si, he found himself suspected by the authorities of being in league with the—at that time—victorious rebels. The facts of the case seem to have been that the chief mandarins feared the worthy Father's influence among the people; for he had, by his preaching, and exhortations, and prayers, made numerous converts to Christianity.

On February 26th a patrol of mandarin soldiers suddenly entered the house where Father Chapelaine was staying, and rudely dragged him before the Mandarin Judge. Here, placed in the midst of a large concourse of people, he was interrogated as to his purposes and political sentiments. So well did he answer that the mandarins saw they should lose their prey did they not silence him. They therefore addressed to him some blasphemous questions, whereupon the Father kept silence, and thus effectually preserved his dignity during a most angry interrogation.

Made furious by the calm dignity of the priest, the chief Mandarin Judge at length ordered him to be bastinadoed. Hereupon, we read, a touching scene ensued. Several young converts to Christianity stepped forward, and implored that they might receive the blows instead of the aged Father.

"You shall bear him company," said the Judge, and ordered four of them to be stretched out with Père Chapelaine. The last then received one hundred and fifty blows with a bamboo upon the soles of his feet—sufficient, often, to kill an able-bodied man. He bore these without a murmur. Enraged at his heroic silence, he was then taken to one of the squares of the town, and placed in the cangue, or wooden collar, where for three hours he was left bareheaded, exposed to the heat of the sun and to the jeers of the multitude. His position, as will be seen on reference to our engraving, was one of utmost discomfort. He was, in fact, suspended by the head in an iron cage, in a semi-crouching position, so that his lower limbs were of no support to his body. Here, amidst the abusive cries of an immense crowd, the poor Father suffered for three mortal hours, several times losing his consciousness, but never (so writes a Chinese Christian, an eye-witness to the whole scene) gratifying his persecutors by a cry for mercy.

The following day he was brought out again. The crowd was now ferocious. They demanded blood. Again he was stretched upon the ground, and again one hundred and fifty blows with a stout bamboo were administered upon his swollen and inflamed feet. He fainted during the operation. One of his native fellow-martyrs gave up the ghost while undergoing the same punishment. Still the Father kept silence—not a cry for mercy saluted the ears of his persecutors.

Such unheard-of endurance could not come from natural causes, thought the mandarins and the populace. The unfortunate man must be a magician. So, while he was yet lying in a swoon upon the ground, a dog was brought, his head cut off, and the insensible body of the missionary was sprinkled with the hot blood. This was to exorcise the devil of endurance.

Whereupon he was returned to prison for that day; and here one of his followers, by means of a bribe, obtained access to him to dress his grievous wounds.

But the poor man's sufferings were not yet over. On the following—the third—day he was taken out to the square of punishment, and there underwent the final torture of the knives. This is, we believe, a mode of punishment peculiar to the Chinese. The unfortunate sufferer is stripped and tied to a stout stake in the midst of the square, and then, the judges and high mandarins being present, the executioners—generally five or six in number—bring on a large covered basket filled with knives. Each of these knives is marked with the name of some portion of the human body, and is devoted to the mutilation of that part. The executioner puts in his hand, and drawing out a knife at random, performs the operation which chance has pointed out. Often flesh-pincers are used to assist in the excision of tender portions of muscle and flesh, as is shown in our illustration. Even this intense torture failed to elicit signs of pain from the Christian hero. He bore all without complaint. His hands, his arms, his thighs, his breasts, were successively mutilated; and at last, when bleeding at every pore, he was disemboweled, and his entrails thrown to a caged wolf brought for the purpose.

The next knife brought death. It was the headsman's tool; and at one blow the head was severed from the mutilated trunk.

So suffered a Christian missionary in this nineteenth century. This tale of horror will sharpen the swords of those Frenchmen and Englishmen who are now bearing the banners of their countries into China. Whatever may be thought of the Chinese as a people, the insolence of their officials is beyond bearing with; and it is to be hoped they will, in the present war, be taught—at the sword's point, as no other way seems likely to succeed—enduring lessons of moderation and toleration.

LITERARY.

MR. CHARLES KINGSLEY appears again as a poet. Ticknor & Fields republish ANDROMEDA, AND OTHER POEMS, in the very chaste style which characterizes all their issues. The volume is small, and its contents will not tire the reader. This is one merit. Andromeda occupies two-thirds of it, the rest being filled with seventeen longer or shorter poems, as Mr. Kingsley styles them on the title-page. Unquestionably (like the boy's picture of a horse in the story) some of them need the label. Such mixed metaphors as this, indeed, have no place any where in literature:

> So many a wife for cruel man's caresses
> Must inly pine and pine, yet outward bear
> A gallant front to this world's gaudy glare.

One characteristic of the only poems that have sufficient merit to demand special notice is their imitation of others—an imitation not sufficiently close to found a charge of plagiarism, yet enough so to deprive them of the merit of originality. ST. MAURA is very much like Tennyson's "St. Simeon Stylites," evidently suggested by it, yet not copying from it except in what may be called the action.

Andromeda is a poor specimen of hexameter; as a rhythmical production it fails; sparkles of beauty here and there relieve its dullness, but gross faults mar it past redemption by these beauties. The story of Andromeda is, of course, familiar to all readers. The present version locates the enchaining of the maiden and goes on to relate the coming of the sea-monster, which > ——devoured of the fairest,

> Over the sea, past Crete, on the Syrian shore, to the southward;

> Cattle and children and maids, till the terrified people fled inland.

The consulting of the priests follows, and the lot which takes Cassiopœia, and her confession that, while her child was bathing in the sea, she had dared to say that the maid was fairer than the Queen of the Ocean; and for this crime comes the condemnation to chain the maiden to the rocks, and leave her to be the prey of the monster.

Some of the finest passages in the poem are those which describe the grief of the mother in fulfilling the sentence; and the inability of Mr. Kingsley to sustain the force of poetry is illustrated in the same lines. The mother speaks to the child before she leaves her:

> "Daughter! my daughter! forgive me! oh curse not the murderess; curse not!
> How have I sinned, but in love? Do the Gods grudge glory to mothers?
> Loving I bore thee in vain in the fate-cursed bride-bed of Cepheus,
> Loving I fed thee and tended, and loving rejoiced in thy beauty,
> Blessing thy limbs as I bathed them, and blessing thy locks as I combed them;
> Decking thee, ripening to woman, I blessed thee; Yet blessing I slew thee!
> How have I sinned, but in love? Oh swear to me, swear to thy mother,
> Never to haunt me with curse, as I go to the grave in my sorrow,
> Childless and lone! May the Gods never send me another to slay it!
> See, I embrace thy knees—soft knees, where no babe will be fondled—
> Swear to me never to curse me, the hapless one, not in the death-pang!"
> Weeping she clung to the knees of the maid; and the maid low answered—
> "Curse thee! not in the death-pang!" The heart of the lady was lightened.

The flatness of the conclusion destroys the entire passage. The substitution of "mother" for "lady" would have saved it somewhat, but as it now stands the descent is a shock. To call classic Cassiopœia "the lady" was left for the weakness of modern poetry.

The maid waits on the rock—sees the sea nymphs go by, prays and weeps by turns, till Perseus comes. The latter is not the Perseus we have been accustomed to. He is "a boy in the bloom of his manhood," if one can understand what that is. He comes and looks at the chained maid, flits around her, butterfly fashion, and is altogether an object that the writer somewhat mythically describes thus:

> Hovering over the water he came, upon glittering pinions,
> Living, a wonder, outgrown from the tight-laced gold of his sandals;

from which it is difficult to discover whether Mr. Kingsley wishes us to understand that the wings grew from the sandals, or that Perseus (having slain the Gorgon and won the fleece) had grown too big for his boots. He "bounds from billow to billow, sweeping the crests like a sea-gull," until he reaches her side, and > Hovering under her brows, like a swallow that haunts by the house-eaves, lifts the vail of hair which conceals her beauties, and the > ——maiden, motionless, frozen with fear, wept loud.

Perseus addresses her; likens her to a white cross against the dark rock (a fine, but not an original idea); to a statue, which he had thought her to be.

> But the maid, still dumb with amazement, watered her bosom with weeping; and then the new-comer, considering her a fair prize and lawful prey, begins to warm her up after a fashion that must have surprised the poor naked girl that had been all night chained to the rock, even though the sea-gull which had shrunk to a swallow now dwindled to a bee.

> Beautiful, eager, he wooed her, and kissed off her tears as he hovered,
> Roving at will, as a bee, on the brows of a rock, nymph-haunted, etc.

And again:

> Beautiful, eager he kissed her, and clasped her yet closer and closer,
> Praying her still to speak—until he reached the desired result, which is thus delicately (!) described:

> Just as at first some colt, wild-eyed, with quivering nostril,
> Plunges in fear of the curb, and the fluttering robes of the rider;
> Soon, grown bold by despair, submits to the will of the master,
> Tamer and tamer each hour, and at last, in the pride of obedience,
> Answers the heel with a curvet, and arches his neck to be fondled,
> Cowed by the need that maid grew tame;—

We trust the reader has the scene in his mind precisely as Mr. Kingsley seems to have it. Perseus continues kissing and the maid continues kicking, and by kissing steadily he tames her. When we reflect that she was chained with brazen links, which his sword could afterward scarcely cut away, it is not a matter of great surprise that he succeeded, especially as she was naked, and had been all night chained to the rock, "motionless, frozen with fear."

This will suffice of Mr. Kingsley's last poem. From some of his songs in former works he had acquired a reputation, well-deserved, which he has ventured too much on. With a little learning but no scholarship, a good imagination but no judgment, a superabundance of egotism, which leads him to attempt theology, novel writing, political reform, and poetry, without the ability to be perfect in either, until he shall give up all the others, and study more rules of reason and rhetoric for one line of authorship, he is in danger of losing what reputation he has acquired if he tries again without taking good advice. He is still young—much younger than he feels—and when he is older he will go back and begin again.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, April 5, in the Senate, various petitions were presented, among others one from citizens of New York praying for a bankrupt law. Senator Bright moved for the instructions of Mr. Reed, United States Commissioner to China. Senator Brown introduced a bill for the protection of life and property at Washington, providing, among other things, for an armed patrol of one hundred men. Discussion ensued, in which Senators Douglas, Fessenden, Seward, Wilson, Iverson, Houston, Crittenden, Johnson, and others took part, and, after various ineffectual attempts to amend it, the bill passed by 34 to 9. Senator Douglas introduced a bill for the admission of Oregon.——In the House, a bill for the protection of life and property at Washington was introduced by Mr. Goode, and, after discussion by Messrs. Colfax, Goode, Washburne, Leiter, Giddings, Kilgore, and Morris, was referred to Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union. After remarks by Messrs. Quitman, Hughes, and Otero, the House concurred in the Senate amendments to the Volunteer Bill. A resolution was moved by Mr. Lovejoy, and adopted, inquiring for information respecting the Utah contracts.

On Tuesday, 6th, in the Senate, Senator Slidell claimed the right of holding back for three days his motion to reconsider the vote on the Kansas Bill. This was opposed by Senators Stuart, Douglas, Crittenden, and others; but the Chair, Senator Fitzpatrick, ruled in favor of Senator Slidell. The bill for the admission of Minnesota was taken up, and discussion ensued, in which Senators Fitch, Douglas, Pugh, Kennedy, and Johnson took part. No vote was taken.——The House was all day in Committee of the Whole on the Deficiency Appropriation Bill. Speeches were made, chiefly against the appropriations for the war in Utah, by Messrs. Seward, Taylor, Burnett, and Tappan among others, and the Committee rose.

On Wednesday, 7th, in the Senate, the subject of printing eulogies of deceased Senators was taken up, and remarks made by Senators Brown, Fessenden, and Hale against, and by Senators Houston, Mason, and Seward in favor of printing eulogies of certain deceased Senators. The question being put, the Senate decided not to print. The Minnesota Bill being then taken up, speeches were made by Senators Houston, Johnson, Stuart, Crittenden, and Wilson, and the bill passed by 48 to 3.——In the House, Mr. Otero introduced a bill for the construction of a wagon-road to New Mexico. The House then went into Committee on the Deficiency Appropriation Bill, and speeches were made, chiefly on the Utah question, by Messrs. Letcher, Lovejoy, Hughes, Colfax, and others, after which the Committee rose and reported the bill, with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instructions to report in separate bills the items for deficiency under each head for the expenditure for service of the present fiscal year, and in another bill all appropriations designed for the next fiscal year, and also with instructions to inquire what further legislation is necessary to restore to Congress an efficient control over the expenses of the Goverment.

Some further remarks on these instructions were made by Messrs. Letcher and Campbell, but the Speaker ruled that it was competent for the Committee to make the representation.

On Thursday, 8th, in the Senate, a discussion took place on the printing of expensive works, in which Senators Johnson, Bright, and Fessenden, took part, and a motion by Senator Johnson to amend the Public Printing Act was adopted. Senator Gwin reported a bill for the construction of a Pacific Railroad. The Diplomatic and Consular Appropriation Bill was passed with amendments. The bill to restore officers dropped by the Naval Board was passed. The bill for the organization of the Territory of Arizona was reported by Senator Douglas. The subject of a medal for Commodore Paulding being taken up, Senator Slidell read an elaborate speech in favor of national filibusterism.——In the House, the Deficiency Appropriation Bill being taken up, the resolution of the Committee, passed on the day previous, was put and lost by 101 to 119. The bill was then put to the vote and rejected by 124 to 106. On motion of Mr. Montgomery, the House resolved to adhere to its amendment on the Kansas question by 119 to 111. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table. Remarks on the Deficiency Bill were made by Messrs. Branch, Campbell, and others, but no vote was taken.

On Friday, 9th, the Senate not being in session, Mr. Lovejoy moved unsuccessfully to obtain from the War Department a return of the number of officers absent from duty. The vote on the Deficiency Bill was reconsidered, and after remarks by Messrs. Branch and Glancy Jones, the bill passed by 111 to 97. The death of Mr. Benton was then announced, and the House adjourned to Monday.

ABROGATION OF THE CLAYTON-BULWER TREATY.

Negotiations are now going on between the United States and England for the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The Senate and House Committees on Foreign Affairs will shortly, by a decided majority, recommend its immediate abrogation. The English Government, through their Minister here, professes to have no objection, provided our Government will make certain concessions in Central America.

NEWS FROM THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

We have dates from Camp Scott, Utah Territory, to 15th February. Brigham Young had notified Colonel Johnston to leave the Territory of Utah by the 10th of March, otherwise his troops would be annihilated. Young had also tendered to the army sufficient provisions to last them to the States. Indictments for treason have been found in Judge Eckel's Court against all the leading Mormons and members of the Mormon Legislature. The Times correspondent writes, under date of 13th February:

"I am told by a gentleman who has just arrived from Henry's Fork, where the animals of the command have been kept during the winter, that they are in excellent condition. The dragoon and artillery horses are improving beyond all expectation, and are now really fat. There is no snow on Henry's Fork. The health of the command has been excellent during the winter. There has been but three deaths, and these were from the effects of diseases contracted elsewhere. The weather thus far has not been severe, for although the temperature has been quite low, yet its freedom from sudden changes, and the extreme rarity of the atmosphere, prevent the cold from being felt as it would be in a much lower temperature in the climate of the Eastern States."

Enough is known to warrant the assertion that Governor Powell and Major M'Cullough, Peace Commissioners to Utah, will be instructed to assure the Mormons that it is not the desire of the President and the United States authorities to make war upon them, but to secure the enforcement of the laws, to which end they will be counseled to participate. The Commissioners will also inform them that some troops will be retained in the Territory to protect the emigrants to the Pacific against the attacks of hostile Indians. The Commissioners will go with the next reinforcements to Utah.

THE KANSAS CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION.

This body met on 25th March and adjourned on 3d inst. General Lane was elected president but resigned before proceeding to business, and M. F. Conway was elected in his place. A Constitution was duly framed. Foreigners who have declared their intentions to become naturalized, and also negroes, are allowed to vote on the question of the adoption of the Constitution by the people. At the first election under it a vote is to be taken on granting universal suffrage. Several of the delegates signed the Constitution under protest on account of its giving the right of suffrage to negroes.

STATE AND MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

At the State election in Connecticut the Republicans have won the day, electing their Governor, Buckingham, by about 3000 majority. Both branches of the Legislature are strictly Republican.

In Rhode Island, the American Republicans have elected their Governor and a majority of both branches of the Legislature.

At Cincinnati, Ohio, the anti-Lecompton ticket has triumphed at the municipal election. At St. Louis and Jefferson City, Missouri, the Free-Soil Democrats have been successful. At the town elections in Michigan, at Portland, at Detroit, at Elmira, and Ogdensburg, the Republicans have carried the day.

PERSONAL.

Mohammed Pasha made an application to the Secretary of the Navy to build the best three-decker that could be constructed for Turkey, without regard to cost. He did not apprehend that any objection would be made. Judge of his surprise when a negative reply was given. He has now written home for instructions to make a private contract, though it is suggested here that a naval constructor may be assigned him to prevent him from being fleeced.

Before the members of Congress separated on Thursday, a letter was read, dated the day previous, written by Colonel Benton to Senator Houston and Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, saying that, in the event of his death, he expressly desires no notice to be taken of it. No rule of either House would justify such a proceeding, and, besides, it was contrary to his convictions expressed many years ago.

It is understood that the daughter of a distinguished Senator from Georgia is soon to be led to the altar by a gentleman from Memphis, Tennessee.

General Persifer F. Smith has been ordered to Utah, as well as General Harney. The chief command of the Utah Army will devolve on the former.

The President had a long interview with Col. Benton on 9th inst. It is said the conversation was very affecting—that the dying statesman expressed his views freely to Mr. Buchanan, and that the President was greatly moved. It is understood his remains will be conveyed to St. Louis.

Last Thursday an assault was made, in Washington, upon the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Thompson, by a man named Peter Besancon, who, some months ago, was discharged from the Department, together with about thirty other clerks. He had recently made several unsuccessful applications to be restored, and on Thursday used violent language toward the Secretary in the hall of the Department, and struck him as he was entering the door. Mr. Thompson immediately turned, and discovered Besancon in the act of drawing a pistol upon him. Mr. Thompson thereupon seized Besancon, and threw him upon the floor, dislocating one of his arms. He was then secured.

We learn by the Cleveland Herald that Professor J. B. Hudson, of the Oberlin (Ohio) Collegiate Institute, was killed on the Cincinnati, Cleveland, and Columbus Railroad, on the evening of the 1st inst., near Olmstead Station. The place where the body of Mr. Hudson was found is about fifty-eight rods east of Olmstead Station, on the joint track of the Cincinnati, Cleveland, and Columbus, and the Cleveland and Toledo Railroads. His footprints were found on the earth, making short steps at first, then longer strides, as if running while holding on to the cars, and ended at a pile of iron, beyond which his body was found. It is supposed that his foot struck the pile of iron, by which means his hold on the cars was loosened, when he fell under the wheels. This theory is strengthened by the fact that his shawl, carpet sack, and pieces of clothing were found scattered along the track between the pile of iron and the body. Thus lying helpless upon the track, the poor man was sufficiently conscious to know that the Toledo train was coming down upon him, yet he was unable to drag his crushed bones off the rail. He could but raise his hand, and in an instant was mangled beyond even recognition.

Mrs. Mary H. Breckinridge, consort of the late Hon. John Breckinridge, departed this life, at the residence of her son, Dr. W. L. Breckinridge, on Friday evening of the week before last, in the ninetieth year of her age. We shall not attempt to portray her strongly marked character, nor pay the passing tribute which her memory so richly deserves, presuming that some one more familiar with the facts in her long and most useful life will perform that task. The mother who could give birth and training to four such sons as Robert, John, Caleb, and W. L. Breckinridge—to say nothing of her daughters—was no ordinary woman. Her funeral obsequies were attended, on Sabbath afternoon, by a very large concourse of people, in the First Presbyterian Church, where a discourse was delivered by Rev. Dr. Halsey. The remains were taken on Monday to Caleb Dale, her residence in Fayette County, where they were deposited by the side of her distinguished husband, to await the resurrection morn.

Hon. John Greig died at his residence at Canandaigua on 9th inst., aged over seventy years. He was among the early settlers, and one of the most esteemed citizens of that section of the country, and for thirty years or more has been one of the Regents of the University of the State of New York. When Louis Philippe was an exile in this country, in the time of the first Napoleon, he is said to have been especially indebted to Mr. Greig for hospitality and friendship.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Transcript writes:

"We had the pleasure of reading, the other evening, a very characteristic letter—the joint production of Macready and Thackeray—to Dr. Francis, dated last month, at the rural home of the former. It appears the retired actor is building up an Institution in his neighborhood for the Education of the Poor; and the novelist went down to lecture in its behalf; at breakfast, they talked over Brother Jonathan, and discovered they had a mutual friend in the medical Nestor of New York, and so resolved to send him a common epistle—which, however, is quite uncommon, coming from two such famous men, and written with such geniality; Macready declares himself moored for life, unless routed out of his pleasant domain by the French; while Thackeray owns he relishes a friend's society and a cigar more than quill-driving, but says he must work still for his girl's sake: both seem to cherish fond reminiscences of Yankee land, and the latter means to pay it another visit; and they both recall the Doctor's curative and personal influence with grateful affection."

Michael Clear, a native of Queen Anne's county, Maryland, died at Greenwich, Connecticut. In 1810 he was a sailor before the mast, but during the war of 1812 he was captain of the foretop on board the old United States ship Constitution. He aided at the taking of the British frigate Guerriere, under Commodore Hull; at the taking of the British frigate Java, under Commodore Bainbridge; and at the taking of the Cyane and Levant, under Commodore Stewart. He subsequently returned to the merchant service, where he continued for many years, when he re-entered the United States service, on the sloop-of-war Erie, and subsequently on the frigate Congress. His last position was that of a sailing-master at the Brooklyn Navy Yard.

At the Historical Society's meeting on Tuesday evening Mr. Bancroft read a passage from the forthcoming volume of his History. It relates to the battle of Lexington, and is greatly admired by those who were favored with its perusal.

The Detroit Advertiser says that Mrs. Thomas, a washerwoman of that city, has recently become heir to a fortune of a million of dollars in Europe.

It is said that the Earl of Rosse, one of the first astronomers in Europe, has told a gentleman in England that he anticipates one of the most intensely hot summers this year that has ever been known, and he advises farmers to build sheds for their cattle by way of protection against the extreme heat.

Mr. Sydney Gipson, of Tuscumbia, Alabama, last week killed a horse-thief whom he was hired to pursue and capture. The thieves set upon him, when he drew a bowie-knife and killed one. Gipson surrendered himself to a Justice of the Peace, who looked upon the case as one of justifiable homicide, and refused to hold him. When Gipson got home his fellow-citizens gave him the ovation of a hero, and the papers puff him.

The Pennsylvania Regiment for Utah has been fully organized. It numbers 1000 men, under command of Colonel Breece. A Committee of officers has been appointed to proceed to Washington, and make the tender of the services of the regiment to the President.

The Lockport papers have reports of the arrest of a Mrs. Lavina Fisher for larceny; but in the course of the examination it came out that the lady was purchased by one Carpenter from her husband, some six years ago, for the sum of fifteen dollars. The buyer and the bought have since lived together as man and wife. Carpenter died recently, and the woman took possession of his personal property. The heirs prosecute her for grand larceny, to answer which charge she is under bail.

A native Japanese, Samuel Southaro, was baptized at Madison University, in this State, by Professor Harvey, a few days ago. He is to return to Japan as a Missionary.

Mrs. Swanson, the widow of the gentleman who was murdered by the boy Rodgers, writes to the papers to say: "There appears to be a rumor prevailing in this city to the effect that I have received money from various persons who were interested in Rodgers's case, and supposed to be for the purpose of exerting my influence in his favor. Persons have approached me on two different occasions, though entire strangers to me, requesting my intervention in his behalf; but, as soon as I became aware of their motives, I absolutely refused to listen to their respective propositions, and stated that I desired to have it distinctly understood that I should in nowise interrupt the course of the law. And all rumors concerning my complicity in this matter are wholly without foundation.

"Having recently opened a fancy store at this place, in order to obtain a subsistence for my three orphan children, and as the extensive circulation of this rumor is calculated to seriously affect my business in so doing, it prompts me to make this correction."

ANOTHER ATTEMPT TO BREAK JAIL.

The Utica Herald says: "About two o'clock last Sunday morning a messenger came to Jailer Baker, in the jail at Watertown, with the intelligence that a prisoner named Spencer Wilson was sick, and wished Mr. Baker to bring him some medicine. Mr. B. did not hesitate to attend the prisoner, and brought him a drink calculated to alleviate his pain. While Mr. Baker was holding the cup for the consummate villain to drink (for Wilson was feigning his illness) three other prisoners, named Eddy, Ward, and Missic, stole slyly into the cell in their stocking feet (Mr. B.'s back being toward them) and seized him, bore him to the ground, beat him terribly about the head, and abused him shamefully. One of the wretches stepped on the throat of the prostrate jailer, while the three others proceeded to gag and bind him—not, however, until he had made sufficient noise to awaken his wife, who, brave woman! seized a revolver, and stationed herself at the outer door leading into the hall, where she calmly awaited developments.

"Meantime the villains had picked Mr. Baker's pocket of his wallet and the prison keys, and locking him into the cell, coolly proceeded to prepare for departure, considering themselves now 'all hunk,' as the phrase is. They picked up their sachels, which were carefully packed, flung their coats on their arms, and proceeded to the outer door for the purpose of taking leave.

AN UNEXPECTED OBSTACLE.

"What was their consternation on looking through the hole in the door and beholding leveled directly at them an ugly concern with six holes in the end of it, and a little white finger calmly resting on the trigger. 'Advance one step into this hall,' said the delicate, but firm voice, 'and you die!' The villains quailed. 'Come on,' said Mrs. Baker; 'but the first man who steps from that door I will shoot!' This was more than the fellows had bargained for. But one of them was cool and impudent. 'Pshaw!' said he, 'you don't know how to shoot it.' 'Yes, I do,' said Mrs. Baker; 'I have been practicing this long time; if you don't believe it, you can make the trial.' The fellows were completely baffled. They retired for consultation. With a refinement of deviltry worthy the arch fiend, they returned with the intelligence that Mrs. Baker might take her choice—either to see her husband's brains knocked out, or to retire and let them pass out! Here, indeed, was a fearful trial! What did the brave woman do? She quailed not for an instant—her eye relaxed not its vigilance—her finger trembled not on the trigger—there she stood pointing the deadly weapon through the iron bars of the hall before the door, and repeating her warning to the villains not to come forward a step, as they valued life! We challenge history to produce an example of more glorious heroism on the part of a woman!

RELIEF AT LAST.

"A messenger had, in the mean time, gone after help, and it soon came in the shape of some of the most resolute and hardy men in Watertown, who speedily relieved the little woman from her guard, drove the prisoners back into their cells, and set matters 'to rights.'

"The four men are now in chains. They are named, H. D. Eddy, in for grand larceny at Watertown; Oliver Missic, in for attempting to commit a rape in Rutland; Lawrence Ward, in for burglary in Watertown; and Spencer Wilson, in for burglary in Clayton. Four more Heaven-defying and devilish wretches probably Jefferson County boasts not; at least, we hope so!

"Mrs. Baker is a small, slim woman, with very expressive features, in which courage and firmness are displayed in the keen, clear eye, and the resolute lines about the mouth. We asked her if she would really have shot the men, had they disregarded her warning? She said, 'Most certainly I would! Wouldn't you?'"

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

On the 22d ult., in the House of Lords, Lord Derby announced that the House would be adjourned from the 30th to the 12th of April, for the Easter holidays. He also said, in reply to Lord Brougham, that there was no foundation for the report that it was intended to import free negroes from Africa and form them into black regiments. The Earl of Carnarvon, in reply to Lord Brougham, said that the Vagrant Act, recently passed by the Assembly of Jamaica, had been received at the Colonial Office, and was under consideration. He believed that there would be no objection to laying the bill upon the table before it received the royal assent. One of the allegations against this bill is, that it partially revives slavery. In the House of Commons, General Peel said that it was not the intention of Government to embody any more regiments of militia. Mr. Disraeli gave notice that he would move for leave to bring in a bill to reform the Government of India on the 26th. Lord John Russell's Oaths Bill was debated at length, and an amendment, which continued the exclusion of Jews from Parliament, was rejected by a vote of 297 to 144. The third reading was fixed for April 12. A motion to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the Consular service and Consular appointments was agreed to.

On the 23d, in the Lords, Lord Ellenborough explained the desire of the Government to enlist into the Indian Army Kroomen on the coast of Africa, but said the plan had been abandoned on account of technical difficulties. In the Commons it was announced that the Governor-General of India had, on his own responsibility, confiscated and annulled the principality of Jhar. Mr. Monkton Milnes called attention to the vexations to which British subjects were exposed by the alterations in the French passport system, and moved for the production of the correspondence on the subject. After considerable discussion on the merits of the whole question, assurance was given on the part of the Government that they had considered the best mode of providing a remedy, and it was contemplated to establish offices at the principal ports, and to reduce the price of Foreign-Office passports. Leave was given to bring in a bill to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister, by 43 majority.

On the 25th, in the House of Lords, Earl Malmesbury, referring to the case of the British engineers at Naples, stated that Mr. Watt had arrived in England very much improved in health, and that a telegraphic dispatch had been received from Mr. Lyons, stating that Mr. Parkes had been liberated on bail. The same subject attracted attention in the Commons. Mr. Griffiths asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, if in the opinion of the law officers of the Crown the capture of the Cagliari proved illegal, it was intended to demand from the Neapolitan Government full and ample compensation to the engineers for the treatment they received? Mr. Disraeli declined to answer. General Peel announced that it had been determined to grant a medal to all troops serving in India, and to give a clasp for service at Delhi and Lucknow. Mr. Roebuck brought forward his motion for the abolition of the Irish viceroyalty. After some debate, a motion for the previous question was negatived by a majority of 127, when the subject dropped, the main question not having been put.

In the House of Lords, on the 26th, the sanitary condition of the army was debated, and the Government promised the adoption of all necessary improvements. In the House of Commons, Government was asked whether it meant to prosecute the directors of the Western Bank of Scotland. The reply was that they had no materials before them to justify prosecution. Mr. Henley announced that the Government had no intention of introducing any measure in regard to the passing of tolls and local dues on shipping this session. Mr. Disraeli moved for leave to bring in a bill to amend the government of India, and explained its provisions at length. Like the bill of the former Government, it abolishes entirely the East India Company and Board of Control, and substitutes in their place a Council composed of a President, Vice-President, and eighteen members—the President to be a Secretary of State. It was not proposed to interfere with the powers of the Governor-General. The details of the bill were objected to by sundry members, but leave was given to bring it in.

HOW PELISSIER WILL BE RECEIVED IN ENGLAND.

The appointment of General Pelissier as Embassador from France gives very general satisfaction in England. The London Times believes the English nation may be fairly gratified by the appointment of the Emperor, as he is said to have declared that he selected this distinguished soldier as a tribute of respect to the alliance, to the English people, and to the two armies. The Times' correspondent believes General Pelissier to be a warm partisan of the English alliance, and says that, on a recent occasion, before the Privy Council, he expressed himself very strongly to that effect. The London Herald unhesitatingly asserts that the resignation of Count Persigny does not proceed from any difference with the existing administration, but is the result of some divergence of opinion on certain matters between him and Count Walewski.

PROGRESS OF THE LEVIATHAN.

The editor of the Portland Advertiser has had an interview with a gentleman lately from England, and says: "The gentleman informs us that, just before he left England, he visited the monster steamship; that there are 1750 men hard at work upon her; that her machinery is already in, and every thing is being driven as fast as man can do it. The desire on the part of the overseers to prevent all impediments to the work going on as rapidly as possible is so great that 'passes' to go on board of her are refused to visitors, lest they should incommode the workmen; and our informant was enabled to get on board only by a personal acquaintance with Captain Harrison, who kindly took him over the ship. He speaks of the state-rooms and other arrangements for passengers in the highest terms. She is being fitted up in the most costly and desirable manner. Captain Harrison had strong hopes of getting her ready for sea in July. This is good news, and we are rejoiced to be able to record it from so direct a source."

PROGRESS OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

The United States steam frigate Niagara arrived at Plymouth on the 23d ult., with machinery slightly damaged, having encountered a succession of southerly gales. The British frigate Agamemnon had commenced taking in the telegraph cable. A large quantity is on board by this time.

THE GREAT EXHIBITION OF 1861.

The correspondent of the Herald says: "Touching the proposed exhibition of 1861, in celebration of the Prince of Wales's majority, and under his Presidency, it will come off, be assured. The Council of the Society of Arts have had several meetings to discuss the project of holding this great international exhibition, and we may mention that among its members are some of the most distinguished men of the day. If we are rightly informed, they one and all take a different view from the Times, and intend to announce boldly to the world that they mean to have the exhibition in question in 1861—on the principle that Homines nihil agendo discunt male agere—and so to avoid the ills consequent upon inactivity, they intend to be active. On the 24th inst. the Council will again have the subject before them. It is said that the exhibition is intended to combine with industry and art manufactures all the materials of interest which made the Manchester exhibition so eminently successful last year."

SAD END OF A FAMOUS MAN.

He adds: "Apropos of exhibitions, you must have been, in common with us Britishers, very sorry to hear that Mr. Henderson, of the once celebrated firm of Fox, Henderson, & Co., the builders of the Exhibition of 1851, in Hyde Park, and of the Crystal Palace at Sydenham, died the other day, so penniless that his bereaved wife had not the means to bury him or save herself from starvation. A committee has been formed in London to collect subscriptions."

A REVIVALIST IN SCOTLAND.

A Glasgow correspondent of the Presbyterian Herald writes: "In the early part of the year our city enjoyed the ministrations of Mr. Brownlow North, a lay gentleman of independent means, who has devoted himself to the preaching of the Gospel. He is an Episcopalian, but addresses all who choose to listen to him wherever he finds an open door. His object is to deliver the simple Gospel message, which he does with overpowering earnestness. He speaks with fluency and even elegance, makes no attempt at exegetical preaching, says that he has but one doctrine to expound and enforce, and disavows the ministerial character and authority. But such is the fervor of his earnestness, that the largest edifice in town was not capable of containing the multitudes who flocked to hear him, from the highest to the lowest, nor were two addresses on Sabbath sufficient to meet the demand upon his ministrations, which were continued throughout the week. I heard him address about three thousand people, who were admitted by ticket to the City Hall, and the effect of his simple and earnest pleadings was very impressive and memorable. No preaching, I dare say, since the days of Whitfield, has produced such a powerful effect upon the popular mind as this remarkable man's addresses; and their power lies not in their logical structure, but in their earnestness. A friend of mine, who has seen Mr. North in his wild days on the stage as an amateur player, once dined in his Highland lodge along with a gay party. The wine was circling freely, and a Highland boy, whom Mr. North had engaged as a domestic servant, entered with a fresh supply of liquor, and in setting it before his master, whispered something to him, upon which North instantly withdrew from the table and took a cigar, refusing to indulge longer in his cups. Turning to my informant, he said, 'P——, that boy is a Christian; I could trust him with untold gold.' Whether that poor Highland boy's humble influence as a child of God was instrumental in touching the wicked heart of his master my friend could not tell. But on the occasion referred to, his warning whisper arrested North in his bacchanalian career, and probably he was in the habit of using the same liberty with his master on other festive occasions."

PIERRI'S HOUSE AND DAUGHTER.

The Birmingham Daily Press says: "The house lately occupied by the misguided and unfortunate Pierri, in Bath Row, which, up to the last few days, remained, nominally at least, in his tenancy, is now shut up. Hand-bills announcing the sale of his household furniture were, we have understood, issued some days ago, but from some cause, at present unexplained, the sale in question has not taken place, and the goods have been removed, we were told, by the parties whom their late owner left in charge. By whose authority, or for whose benefit the removal has been carried into execution, we have not heard. Pierri has left a daughter, now in a conventual school at Leicester, to whom, we apprehend, any sums arising from the sale of his effects are legally as well as morally due."

FRANCE.

THE FEELING WITH REGARD TO THE ALLIANCE.

The Paris Constitutionnel of the 25th ult. has an article in large type on the alliance between France and England. Most friendly sentiments are expressed throughout. It says that the Duke de Malakoff personifies the alliance as a living memorial of common glory and common perils, and that the Emperor could not have made a choice more significant or more flattering for the Queen and English people.

THE SECRET POLICE OF PARIS.

The correspondent of the London Times writes: "The Moniteur says that 'his Majesty has changed nothing in his ordinary habits, and that he continues to go out every day without an escort.' It is very true that the Emperor takes his drives in the Bois de Boulogne, and that his carriage is not on those occasions encircled or followed by Cuirassiers, Lancers, Gendarmes, or Cent Gardes armed cap-à-pie, with the earth shaking under their horses' hoofs. If the Moniteur means this by 'escort,' it is quite right. But the author of this paragraph in the official paper must know better than any one that there are other escorts besides those with uniforms, helmets, breast-plates, and sabres. There is the secret escort of police in plain clothes, with its advanced and rear-guard, its éclaireurs, its flank companies, etc., exclusive of the ostensible police. They ride in coupés, on horseback, or go on foot, and a good many have as fashionable an exterior as any of the professional lions of the Bois de Boulogne. Their numbers have been considerably increased since the attentat, and the Minister of the Interior is too experienced and too skillful a soldier not to take care that they who form this species of escort are distributed in the most effective manner for the protection of his august master. If the action of the police is, as the Moniteur inconsistently affirms, the same as before, I would venture to ask what was meant by the demand made by the government, and granted by the Legislative Body, of 1,200,000 francs for the service of the secret police? This sum is in addition to the 2,000,000 francs previously comprised in the budget on the same account. The secret police service under Louis Philippe was, I believe, just 1,000,000 francs."

HOW THE EMPEROR'S PERSON IS GUARDED.

The Herald correspondent writes: "I have heard a curious and perfectly authentic anecdote, illustrative of the state of things during the last days of M. Pietri's administration. It is usual, when the Emperor is going out, to telegraph the fact from the Tuileries to the Prefecture in the Rue de Jerusalem, and then numerous police agents in and out of uniform are dispatched to the line of route which he takes. But it very frequently happens that the notice given is so short that the Emperor is outside the barrier and in the Bois de Boulogne before the police have arrived in the Champs Elysées. M. Pietri, deeply feeling the weight of his responsibility, represented these facts, and asked to be furnished every morning with a programme of the Emperor's movements, so that he might be enabled to make proper arrangements in time. The request was refused."

PRUSSIA.

THE PRINCESS ROYAL OF PRUSSIA AND HER FATHER-IN-LAW.

The Berlin correspondent of the Herald writes: "On Sunday the Prince and Princess Frederick William and the Princess of Prussia attended divine service at the English chapel, in the Monbijon Palace. The young Princess appears to great disadvantage by the side of the tall and commanding figure of her mother-in-law; it must be confessed, in fact, that she is a rather insignificant-looking little lady, but she is gaining 'golden opinions' by her good nature, and the unaffected kindness with which she treats every one that approaches her. The old Prince of Prussia has been confined to his room for the last fortnight, in consequence of a fall, by which he sprained his ankle severely; but he is now recovering. His Royal Highness seems to have been born under an unlucky star, for his whole life has been one succession of accidents. At home or abroad something is sure to happen to him; in the antediluvian times, before the invention of railroads, his traveling carriage was constantly overturning or his horses running away with him; once he tumbled off a platform and almost killed himself; another time his sleeping apartment caught fire, and he was nearly roasted. Then, again, he would slip on the parquetted floor of his drawing-room, or a chandelier would fall down upon him and almost crush him to death. If omens were believed in nowadays, a disastrous reign would be prognosticated for him in case he should ever ascend the throne; but perhaps he will have exhausted the malice of fortune before that period arrives."

PARTIAL RECOVERY OF THE KING.

He adds: "The other day the King came to see him for the first time since his illness, and staid with him for about half an hour. Prince Albert, their youngest brother, who was present at the interview, says (as I am informed by a friend of mine) that the King appeared 'bei leidlicher besinnung' (tolerably sensible), an expression which shows plainly that even in his more lucid moments his mind is not entirely free from the dark cloud that overshadows it. In bodily health he has improved wonderfully. He takes long walks and rides every day, in spite of wind and weather, and looks almost as stout as ever. Under these circumstances there is no prospect that the provisional authority intrusted to the Prince of Prussia will either cease or be converted into a Regency; indeed, the latter has agreed to wait for at least twelve months, to see whether his brother will recover the entire amount of his faculties before taking any steps for settling the administration of the country on a more permanent basis."

ITALY.

POLITICAL DISCONTENTS.

Discontent in Austrian Italy is said to be daily increasing. On the 20th ult. the Court at Genoa gave judgment in the political trials which took place in consequence of the events of June. Mazzini and five others were tried in their absence, and in contempt of Court sentenced to death. Twenty-nine were acquitted and twenty-eight were sentenced to imprisonment for terms varying from seven to twenty years.

INDIA.

THE PROJECTED ATTACK ON LUCKNOW.

An official dispatch to the East India Government says that Colin Campbell, with his force, consisting of fifteen regiments of European infantry, three regiments of native infantry, three regiments of European cavalry, three regiments and detachments of two others of native cavalry, with eighty heavy guns and mortars, and sixty-three field pieces, had crossed the Ganges, and was in progress to Lucknow. The attack was expected to take place on the 27th of February, when Jung Bahadoors and General Frank's forces, 12,000 strong, would also have reached Lucknow.

CHINA.

THE LATEST NEWS FROM CANTON.

The blockade of Canton was raised on the 10th of February. The Americans and Russians have joined the French and English in a demand on the Chinese Government. The letters of the four Plenipotentiaries have gone up to Shanghai, and by the middle of March it will be known what line China would take. Trade has re-opened at Canton. The 70th Sepoy Regiment had arrived, and is quartered within the walls of Canton. The city is now accessible to foreigners under certain conditions. The state of siege is to continue during the period of occupation. Immense dépôts of arms have been discovered. The allies have destroyed the remainder of the fortifications. The large towns of Koachow and Koang Chang have been retaken by the Imperialists.

LOSSES OF THE CHINESE DURING THE BOMBARDMENT.

The correspondent of the Times writes: "I have taken some pains to ascertain the loss suffered by the Chinese during the bombardment and the storm. We have all the official returns of the first day in our possession, and no account that I have seen places the deaths during the whole operations higher than two hundred. Some distrust the Chinese accounts, but I am inclined to put faith in them. Unless you surround Chinese soldiers you never kill many of them. You never catch them upon an island or in an isolated position. They act upon the principle of the Wife of Bath, that 'A mouse who trusts to one poor hole,

Can never be a mouse of any soul.'

They fire very fiercely upon you as you are coming up to attack them, but escape by the back door as soon as you get too near. Our escalade was a complete surprise upon them. They fancied you were advancing under the fire from their walls to attack Fort Gough; they never expected that you would turn aside and 'jump upon wooden legs' over the wall. Howqua's Comprador, with whom some of us talked the matter over, declares that it is impossible that the numbers killed could be greater than is stated. The people, he says, knew perfectly well the line the fire would take, and got out of the way. The troops who were obliged to remain on the walls kept very much under cover, and great quantities of the missiles missed the wall and fell into the ditch. The dead must be buried outside the city, and, as the western gate only was open, it was easy for any one to calculate how many were carried out. It says little for the destructive power of our warlike engines that so small a loss should have been occasioned by so large an expenditure of shot and shell, but the probabilities are that the fact is as the Chinese state it. It is placed beyond doubt now that the loss of the Chinese during the bombardment in 1856 was not more than forty-three, and I quite believe in the probability that the recent list of killed does not exceed two hundred."

THE STATE OF THE CITY.

He adds: "On the 21st I returned to my quarters in Canton, and found that all the tender solicitude of the people of Hong Kong had been entirely thrown away. I traversed the whole city with my trunk and chow-chow baskets, myself the only escort to my four Coolies. Along the great east and west thoroughfare a closed shop was become a rare exception, and the only difficulty was to push our way through the crowd. The people were cutting up their pigs and their fish (the abundance of immense carp, tench, and roach in the streets of the city is wonderful), and cooking their comestibles in full business-like security. Idlers were playing at Chinese hazard, and exhibiting their piles of coins upon the board. The curiosity-shops, in incredible numbers, were spread with curious antiques of the newest fashion, and were victimizing credulous lieutenants in a way which Mencius would not have approved. The crowds are not even afraid to manifest curiosity at the clothes and features of their European guests, and the shop-keepers invite you into their shops with a politeness that proves they have no misgiving that you will exercise any right of conquest except a conquest by purchase. Yet the spirit of insolence has departed out of them. Neither in word nor gesture is there any symptom of hostility or even of dislike. I have seen two people frightened very much by a scolding for using the word Fan-quei (Foreign devil); but I believe they used it in all innocence, having never heard it called by any other name. I would neglect no precautions, for the neglect of precautions would revive hopes now abandoned, and the neglect of precautions nearly proved our destruction at Ningpo during the last war; but, so far from there being any notion of retaking this city, I believe that no ten Chinamen within sight of Canton would dare raise a stick in the presence of a British or French soldier or sailor."

YEH AND HIS BUTCHERIES.

Official documents have been discovered in Canton, in which it appears that Yeh, during the short period of three months, put to death no less than the enormous number of 20,000 human beings. This is a fact beyond doubt, the documents taken showing the name of every man and woman, and for what they were executed.

Yeh is still on board the Inflexible. He eats and drinks well, but is not very communicative, and says "he is tired of waiting for Lord Elgin, and if he does not come soon, he must really go and attend to the governorship of his province."

WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH HIM?

The Times correspondent writes: "It naturally occurred to the Anglo-Saxon mind that he also must want books. The offer was rejected; but Yeh is a religious man, and said nothing about romances. His answer was, 'What should I do with books? All the books that are proper to be read I know by heart.' He quoted Caliph Omar, without having ever heard his name. He passes his time in praying to Buddha and telling his fortune. His papers abound in fortune-telling schemes, analogous to our 'Sortes Virgilianæ' or 'Sortes Biblicæ.' One of them is headed 'Scheme to determine when the Kwang-si Rebellion will Terminate.' The Chinese are very indignant with him for not killing himself. They say, 'Eep number one fools; he no makee writee pigeon, he no makee fightee pigeon; he number one bad Mandalin; he no cuttee thloat.' The wretched creature seems to have been influenced in his conduct by these fortune-telling tricks, which are as heterodox in China as they are in England. Yet, although the revelations of his State papers, and our observation of his personal habits, demonstrate that he is without conduct or judgment, or even the strong common sense of an ordinary Chinaman, his official rank is so great that we are told his presence in the Canton river exercises an unfavorable influence upon our dealings with the Chinese people. Unless early news of his degradation should be received, he will be sent away. The present idea is to send him to Calcutta, where he will probably have an opportunity of cultivating the friendship of the King of Oude within the walls of Fort William."

VENEZUELA.

ANOTHER REVOLUTION.

The Herald correspondent writes: "A revolution, headed by General Julian Castro as military chief, broke out in Valencia on the 5th ult., on the same day Puerto Cabello was taken, and the movement spread through the Valles de Aragua on the 6th, coming as near as the Ajuntas to Caracas; immediately also others of the western provinces, as Barquinwater, Taraqui, Cojedos, etc., joined, and Castro was in a few days able to collect a very respectable army of about 10,000 men near Victoria, at the same time that General Briceno was blockading Laguayra with a few small vessels.

"President Monagas tried hard to collect people and arms, and all that he could get together was sent under Generals Castelli and Tisa and Commandant Rafael Vidanalo, who got as far as the Coquija or the Consejo, but soon found out that their force was altogether too small to attempt an assault: meanwhile the Tuy pronounced also against Monagas, and he, seeing that resistance was useless, abdicated on the 15th his Presidency and that of his son-in-law, the Vice-President, into the hands of Congress, and surrendered himself and family and ministry, taking refuge at the French legation, where they still remain.

"Immediately, and under the greatest possible enthusiasm, a provisional government was named by Congress, which after this dissolved; the provisional government consisted of Dr. Pedro Gual, Dr. Lucio Siso, Manuel M. Quintero, and Dr. Manuel Maria Echeandia y Ledo. The ministers are Dr. Reyes Pinal, Interior; Pedro de las Casas, Finance; Minchin, War; and Ramon Yopes, Foreign; Commandant de Armas Corovell Mattuerell, Governor Joaquim Herrera."

SPRING IN THE CITY.

SPRING IN THE COUNTRY.

SPRING IN CITY AND COUNTRY.

THE foregoing pictures do credit to the artists who drew them. They explain themselves, and illustrate ingeniously the contrast between the genial invigorating spring of the country, and the gay, fluttering spring of the town. Where one has buds, the other has bonnets; where one rejoices in verdure, the other exults in showy dry-goods; birds are the music of the one, barrel-organs that of the other; but in both the season is one of love, gladness, and general expansion of mind and body. Both pictures are taken from nature. We will look at them and endeavor readers to discover the scenes which they represent. It would be unfair to the proprietors of our resorts not to reveal the charming spot which has been selected to illustrate spring in the country; for their native wealth in the way of verdure, and the owner of the fortunate Paradise would be troubled with offers which he certainly would not accept. And those persons who are locked of the other scene may be no secret to some of our New England readers, our respect for the metropolitan pride of the denizens of other cities forbids us to say more than that the site represented is one which perhaps will become more beautiful and famous a summer afternoon than any other in the United States—Broadway, of course, excepted.

LEAVES.

WHAT is life, and what are we?
Only leaves upon a tree,
Green to-day, to-morrow sere,
Then we are no longer here!

Others, fair and brave as we,
Grew, of old, upon the tree;
Now they crumble in the mould,
With their histories untold.

So shall we—it is our lot
'Thus to shed and to forget;
By-and-by the tree will fall—
One oblivion waits for all.

ANAÏK TIMOR, THE SORCERESS.

HAVING occasion, while staying at Fontrieux, to visit Trégnier, I took a cross-road which I had traversed before, and which I calculated would bring me to my destination before nightfall. As this I found my memory had deceived me, for night overtook me before I had accomplished a third of my journey, and I became fearful of losing myself among the various by-paths, which, in the darkness, it was difficult to distinguish one from the other. To add to my embarrassment, the wind rose and the rain began to fall.

I had just reached a sort of moor, covered with heath, over which the road sweep with a sullen roar, and which offered no shelter from its relentless fury. Enveloped in my fur cloak, I bent my head to the storm, and continued to walk through the uneven path. Turn which way I would I could see nothing but a wide moving sheet, which served to confound both heaven and earth. Momentarily, however, the storm would abate, and the wind sink so as to enable me to distinguish the murmur of a distant waterfall, or the plaintive howls of famished wolves; then, again, the blast would overtake me, groaning and moaning, until all was lost in one great roar.

I had at first a sort of proud enjoyment in battling with the whirlwinds, which tossed like the waves of the sea around me; but exceedingly cold and fatigue lessened my ardor, and I began to look out anxiously for some shelter. By good fortune this path I had continued to follow soon began to dip into a narrow gorge, where I was soon able to distinguish the outlines of several black trees; and as I proceeded I seemed to leave the storm behind me. At last I arrived at the entrance of a narrow valley, where the noise of the storm was suspended by the surrounding mountains, reached me only as an echo. The moor also fell away behind. I raised my head, glad to breathe freely once more.

I knew by experience that the valley contained rain habitations. A washing-shed and a solitary oven soon confirmed me in this belief; and, a few steps further, I perceived a hamlet, composed of about a dozen cabins. The first which I approached was also the largest; but, guided by the murmur of voices, I reached one standing by itself, and pushing open the door, found myself in the midst of a Veillée.* A dozen women were seated upon their heels around a blazing fire of furze, worn turning their spindles, chatting and laughing the while. Several children lay at their feet, asleep; and a young mother, seated in the most distant corner of the hearth, was suckling a newborn infant, murmuring, in a low voice, a cradle-song. On my entrance they all turned round. I had stopped at the threshold to shake off the water with which I was covered, and now placed my thick soar hat on a neighboring nail, after the custom of the country. The mistress of the house understood by this that I demanded shelter.

"The blessing of God be upon all here!" said I, advancing to meet her.

"And on you!" she replied, with American brevity.

The shroud covers the moor, and wolves themselves could not find their way."

"Heaven were made for Christians."

Uttering these words the peasant woman remained me to the hearth. All the spinners made way for me; and I took my seat by the young mother, while the mistress of the hut threw upon the fire an armful of dry brambles. A long silence ensued, the laws of Breton hospitality forbidding the host to question a guest until he has himself spoken. At last I asked how far I was from Trégnier.

"Three leagues and two-thirds of another," answered the peasant woman; "but the waters are out, and the road is dangerous without a guide."

"Nothing else?"

"Will one of your men serve me as such?"

"The men of this place have gone to Newfoundland in the St. Pierre."

"What, all?"

"All. The master perhaps knows that these of the same parish embark together when they can?"

"And you are expecting their return?"

"Every day."

"Ah!" yes," exclaimed one of the spinners, with a sigh; "may God protect them! The other vessels have returned to Brihat, to Saint Pierre—every where. The St. Pierre is the only one that delays."

"And you," continued a second woman, with emphasis, "it is quite time the men returned."

"Indeed! Why?" I asked.

She pointed to the peasant girl who sat beside me as the hearth. "Ah Dieu, Marie, how many bushels of barley she has left in her bin," said she, "The young peasant blushed.

"Not so many as she owes me as many measures of milk as her child numbers days," added a third woman in the house.

"Or that her landlord has threatened to sell her furniture," added a third.

So much I comprised the first speaker, "I have advised her to pray that the sailors of the St. Pierre may be successful in their fishing, and to ask a blessing here!"

"I only pray God to bring Jean back," said the girl, pressing her infant to her breast.

I was struck with the sad and profoundly pathetic tone in which these words were uttered, and I turned and looked at Dinah. She was a beautiful woman, not more than four-and-twenty; and notwithstanding the rather masculine style of her beauty, there was something extremely gentle about her. Her carriage was upright, her forehead high, and her feet were firmly planted on the hearth; with one arm she held her sleeping infant on her bosom, the other being employed with her side. There was in the proud yet flexible lines of her countenance, in her full brown lips, and black eyes, ever ready to veil themselves with their long lashes, an expression of wild, untamed pride, softened, tempered, however, with an intensity of caressing tenderness. After a second she perceived that I was observing her, and turned away her head, embarrassed. But while I was thus engaged the conversation had continued among the spinners, the sum of whose wailing of what she would do when the St. Pierre had returned.

"I shall go and visit the town, and, for once, eat my fill of wheaten bread," said one.

"My husband will bring me a silver ring worth thirty francs," said another.

"I shall buy a mass for my mother's soul."

"I shall go to St. Ann's shrine."

"And you, Dinah," I asked, "what will you do on your return?"

"I shall put his child into his arms, and we shall be united again," she answered, with a blush.

At this moment the black rose at the end of the hut put her head over the low partition which kept out of the cows, and bellowed.

"There is some one approaching," said the mistress of the house.

As she spoke a sharp blow shook the door, and a rough voice was heard without.

"Is there room for a belated traveller?" it said.

"Anaïk Timor!" exclaimed all the women.

"Anaïk!" repeated Dinah, involuntarily pressing her infant closer.

"But who is she?" I asked.

"She is a woman made the future and tells fortunes," replied the mistress of the hut.

"Is there room for the poor in this house?" repeated the voice, impatiently.

"Let her in, or she will make mischief enough us," remarked Dinah.

A spinner rose and opened the door, and Anaïk Timor appeared. She was a little old woman, whose tattered garments drenched, in many places, her withered limbs. She carried at her back a coarse basket, which, sitting at the door, she took off a bottle, and held in her other hand a prickly stick, hardened in the fire. The nose, which had originally been that of a man, but which, under others, gave a speedy appearance to their dull color; and the scanty locks of white hair, stiff with rain, hung like icicles around her wrinkled cheeks. Her gray eyes had the sharp yet vacillating expression peculiar to those addicted to intoxication.

She stopped short in the middle of the room and looked fixedly, without at the same time, at a low grovel. "Much trouble you give yourself to receive a beggar," she said, throwing a disconcerted glance around. "You let us work, and do not answer.

"We were not expecting you," replied the woman of the house, a little embarrassed.

"Are you expecting any one?" repeated Anaïk.

"What does it matter to those who sit by the warm hearth that others are freezing outside? But take care; every one has their turn."

Although I was well acquainted with the privileges accorded to the mendicant by the laws of charity, and had been accustomed to see them, when once admitted, place themselves on a perfect equality with the owners of the house, I was struck by the perfect, not to say menacing, tone assumed by the old woman. While thus scolding the relieved herself of her wallet, and having deposited it in a corner, advanced to the hearth, where she perceived me. "Ah! there is a gentleman here," said she, stopping short, and fixing her piercing glance on me. I was struck with her singular appearance. She had one, too—and gold earrings, and ribbons in his shoes! While Jann lived old Timor was not obliged to knock at people's doors with a beggar's staff! But he has gone to rejoin his father and sisters! So now every one tramples on the widow who has buried her only son." And she began to cross, almost unintelligibly,

"J'vais rend'ffe des pas j'avais mis au monde: et voila que la mort est venue me les prendre— Ne les prend pas encor le seuil de notre porte, et je n'ai personne pour me donner une goutte d'eau."

While she murmured this song she knelt down on the hearth-stone, and extended her skeleton hands over the fire, whose dying gleams flickered over the sparkling rings in her hair. Her haggard, restless eyes wandered, meanwhile, from face to face, till they fell upon Dinah, when a flash of hatred crossed her features. "You here, you raven?" she cried. "What business have you among honest folks—you, the mother's daughter?

I glanced at Dinah, who turned very pale. The word, "mother's daughter" explained the young girl's timidity, and the vague feeling of ill-will evinced toward her by her neighbors. She belonged to the race of the old criminal among the peasantry of Bretagne as accursed one.

"You cannot recall what I have committed!" continued Anaïk, "because a young man of the village took it into his head to like you—because you have a young child! Ah, but a hundred years of burden. But wait a little; it is just a year since I foretold your evil days!"

"Why do you wish me ill, Timor?" asked Dinah, in a gentle, timid voice.

"Why? Ask me why? Has not your husband chased me from his door?"

"Because your master made me weep."

"My tants!" repeated Anaïk. "I called you the cupcake's daughter! Was it not true? And my Jean declared I was drunk! He threatened me—yes, he threatened me, old Timor!—ah! ah! Ah! the knapsack he had set his foot on the viper, but it can sting yet! An hour is coming when I shall be revenged on all who have despised me—on all who have shut the door! Ay, ay, my children, your pride will have a fall. She was a beautiful woman, not more than four-and-twenty; and notwithstanding the rather masculine style of her beauty, there was something extremely gentle about her. Her carriage was upright, her forehead high, and her feet were firmly planted on the hearth; with one arm she held her sleeping infant on her bosom, the other being employed with her side. "Has not the gentleman heard the voices?"

"I have heard some pilgrims, who, as they passed, were chanting a hymn." She looked at me fiercely, and shook her head.

"Good! that is the way they talk in towns. No one in the town believes in the soul; they treat their dead as so many dogs, and cast entirely in the hole in which they are flung. Well, well! God will yet teach the heathens what he can do. Perhaps the gentleman means to deny that those who have just passed are the drowned sailors of the St. Pierre?"

"And the gentleman would be right," interrupted a grave voice. I turned; a priest stood on the threshold.

The woman rose, exclaiming, "The rector!" The latter advanced slowly into the room, and fixed a severe look upon Anaïk Timor.

"What business have you here?" he asked, abruptly.

"The poor have a right to go wherever there is a morsel of bread to be found among Christians," whined the beggar.

"It was not hunger," replied the priest, "but the love of evil. Instead of basking beside the hearth of a clergyman, you should be at the altar of the Holy Virgin!"

"And those six—?"

"Are saved!"

"Where are they?—where are they?"

"You have just heard them pass."

The woman of shook tumultuously to the door.

"Stop!" cried the rector, barring their passage. "You can not see them."

"Are they not here?"

"They are here; but they have all vowed not to lift their voices to God to save them by words."

"Their names—at least their names!" cried the excited Dinah.

"It would be a violation of their oath," replied the priest; "for they have sworn that neither to wife, to mother, nor to child will they make themselves known till after the accomplishment of their vow. Respect their solemn promise made before God."

There was a cry of despair, and, as it seemed, a moment of hesitation. Then, with a movement like her father, son, brother, or husband, endeavoring to glean some information from a corpse's face, or name after name was pronounced; but the priest, immovable, continued to invoke the sanctity of the vow, and to exhort them to submit to his decisions. At last several, listening only to the promptings of their generous impatience, exclaimed that, at whatever cost, they must know their fate. The rector vainly attempted to detain them; they rushed in a body to the threshold, and, irregularly.

"Go, then," he cried, indignantly; "go, violate the sacred vow made before God. But tremble lest his punish your sacrilege, and the first who lifts the veil in of the wrecked men shall see the fate he expects!"

Dinah, who was in the act of going, suddenly recoiled.

"Ah, I will not go!" she cried, terrified.

"Solemn words, my daughter," said he, authoritatively; "your suspense can endure only for a short time. Be patient and unmurmuring, as a punishment for your many sins. Be you one of the happy or of the afflicted, endeavor to bend to His divine will. Learn each of you submission from this moment a widow, or an orphan; let her heart become like marble, and, as the storm-tossed mariner tries from the tomb, let her regard it as a miracle, for which it will be her duty to thank God as long as she lives."

The women burst into tears and fell on their knees.

The rector endeavored to calm them, addressing to each some especial consolation. He reminded Dinah, in a few words of encouragement, the holy patroness of broken hearts; and having announced that he would offer up the holy sacrifice for the deliverance of the shipwrecked mariners, he made them promise to accompany him to the church, and join their prayers to his.

All followed, with the exception of Dinah, who, turning aside, remained kneeling on the hearth, on who was seated by the hearth, and seized her hand.

"You know who are saved?" she asked, in a voice choking with emotion.

"Ah!" cried Anaïk.

"You must have met them at Trégulier."

"Well?"

"Jean! Where is Jean?"

The beggar sneered.

"The priest desired you to wait."

"No!" exclaimed Dinah, who had sunk upon her knees, with clasped hands and wandering eyes; "I must find my Jean, Anaïk, if you have seen Jean—if you have recognized him. Oh, a word, a single word! Say it, for the happiness of a child let me know it! Better to die at once than wait! Anaïk, Anaïk! Ah, do not—do not refuse me!"

"And what will you give me for my news?" asked the beggar.

"All that I have!" cried Dinah. "What will you have? Here—my ebony beads—my cross? Here they are."

"They are not enough."

"Well, then, take the gold ring he gave me. Take all, Anaïk—all that I have in the world."

And she knelt at the old woman's feet, pressing her child against her bosom with one hand, while, with the other, she offered her cross, ring, and beads. Timour held her thus for several instants, as if expiring beneath her glance; then, bursting into a wild laugh, she said,

"You may keep them all; for to torment you is better than any thing you can offer me!"

Dinah rose with a bound, and darted out of the cabin.

I was too interested in the result to remain behind, and followed her.

She ran through the hamlet, and we reached the Christian temple. The women were in their usual haunts, the vapers burned upon the altar, the choristers were in their places. Suddenly the door of the sacristy opened, and the six shipwrecked men appeared, enveloped in white shrouds, which effectually concealed their persons.

A smothered groan burst from the women; several nuns escaped amidst their sobs, but the vails remained immovable.

It were vain to attempt to describe the awful solemnity of the scene which followed. The whole body which reigned throughout the church was broken only by the voice of the priest; and if, for a moment, a murmur were audible, it rose as if to remind the murmurer of patience, and the sound died away!

What sublime power has the will over the human soul! Every woman there was awaiting the decree that was to influence the remainder of her life; yet each, with her hands clasped upon her bosom, knelt motionless before the altar.

I glanced round in search of Dinah, and discovered her kneeling in the porch, her face raised to heaven, her arms hanging powerless by her sides, and her hair lying before her, like a victim awaiting the blow, with an instant of awaking!

At last the rector pronounced the blessing. A shudder ran through the crowd, and the moment that followed was one of intense agony. Every head was strained, and all arms were extended toward the altar.

"Put your trust in the Lord!" said the priest; and, taking by the hand the man who stood nearest to him, he made him step forward, and raised the shroud! There was a scream; and the next instant he fell dead at his wife's feet!

The priest raised the second shroud, and then the others. As each vail fell to the ground a scream of joy resounded, echoed by a sorrowful murmur; but as the last fell, loud groans and sobs of despair burst forth.

I turned quickly to where Dinah knelt. She was in the same place, in the same attitude, still gazing intently in the direction of the altar. All the vails had been raised, and still she sought Jem.

* * * * *

I passed the rest of the night at the parsonage, while the rector occupied himself in offering consolation to the orphans and widows. A wreck of day I resumed my journey to Trégulier.

The wind had ceased; and the sun, unencumbered by mist, shone joyously in the heavens; the birds, under the enlivening influence, flew among bedless branches glittering with frost; the hoarhorn hedges had shaken off their robes of snow, and displayed their ruddy berries; all creation seemed to revive under the warm breath of spring, which spared never the frozen earth.

Just before descending the hill I turned to give a last look at the desolated village I was quitting, and perceived in the distance, on the road to Carhaix, descending the opposite slope, her child in her arms and a mendicant's white staff in her hand.

CHAPTER III.

MR. VANCE explains how to make presents to grind colors and save half-pence.—A sudden announcement.

The meal was over—the table had been spread by a neat maid-of-all-work upon the river. The moon was up; the young men asked for the other lights; conversation became brisk, and often shifting, often pausing—had gradually become grave, and, as usually does, with two remarkable results; while the lively voices of young Future stretch before them deep in shadow, and half call into existence the shapes that gleam within, what they fear; making visionary maps in that luminous obscure.

"There is so much power in faith," said Lionel, "even when faith is applied but to things human and false. Now, I am sure I could be half persuaded that he is born to do, some day, what at the moment seems impossible, and it is fifty to one but what he does it before he dies. Surely, when you were a child at school, you felt convinced that there was something in your fate distinct from that of the other boys—whom the master might call quite as clever—felt that faith in yourself which I am sure that you would be one day what you are."

"Well, I suppose so; but vague aspirations and self-conceits must be bound together by some practical necessity—perhaps a very homely and a very vulgar one—or they smoke and evaporate. One would think that rich people in high life ought to do more than poor folks in humble life. More pains are taken with their education; they have more leisure for the summer, the bent of their genius; yet it is the poor folks, often half self-educated, and with pinched bellies, that do three fourths of the world's real labor. Poverty is the keenest stimulant, and poverty made me not say, 'I will do,' but 'I shall.'"

"You know real poverty in childhood, Frank?"

"Real poverty, covered over with sham affluence. My father was Genteel Poverty, and my mother was Genteel Gentility. Sham affluence went when my father died. The real poverty then came out in all its glory. I was driven from a genteel school, at which, long afterward, I genteelly paid the bills; and I had to support my mother and sister—or rather contribute to her support. I succeeded. Also, I fear not genteelly! But before I succeeded, which I did in a few years, she had some comforts which were not appearances; and now I easily allowed, dear soul, that gentility and shame do not go well together. Oh! beware of debt, Lizzette sus; and never call that economy which entails debt—debt is but the safeguard from mean degradation."

"I surround you at last, Vance; shake hands; I know why you are so fond of me."

"Habit now," answered Vance, repressing praise of himself, as usual. "But I remember, so well what twopence was a sum to be respected, that to this day I would rather put it by than spend it. All our ideas, like orange-plants, spread out in proportion to the size of the box which imprisons the roots. Then I had a sister. Vance paused a moment as if in pain, but went on with seeming carelessness, leaning over the window-sill, and turning his face from his friend. "I had a sister older than myself, handsome, genius, the very pride of her! Foolish girl! my love was not enough for her. Foolish girl! she could not wait to see what I might live to do for her. She married—oh! ingenerally!—a young man, very well born, who had wooed her before my father died. He had the villainy to remain constant when she had not a farthing, and he was dependent on distant relations and his own domain in Parmasan. The wretch was a poet! So they married. They spent their honeymoon genteelly at Bare say. His relations cut him. Parmasan paid no rents. He wrote sonnets. Such sonnet-reading letters from her! They were destitute. How could I help it? how I regret! But how could I maintain her and her child? Yes, more child than I was! No matter. They are dead now, both; all dead but whose name I bear, and whose memory is half-peace. And Frank Vance is a stingy, selfish bachelor. Never revive this dull subject again, or I shall become a crown from you, and cut you dead. Waiter, ho!—the bill. I'll just go round to the stables, and see the horse put to."

As the friends re-entered London Vance said, "I'm not down my wives in Piccadilly; I will walk home. You, I suppose, of course, are staying with your father in Gloucester Square?"

"No," said Lionel, rather embarrassed; "Colonel Morley, who acts for me as if he were my guardian, owns a house in Chesterfield Street, Mayfair. My hours, I fear, would ill suit my dear mother. Only in town two days, and, thanks to Morley, my table is already covered with invitations."

"Yet you are no one day, generous friend!"

"You the second day—my mother the first. But there are three balls before one can dine. Come home with me, and smoke your cigar while I dress."

"No; but I will at least light my cigar in your hall—prolong it!"

Lionel was engaged at his lodging. The groom, who served him also as valet, was in waiting at the door. "A note for you, Sir, from Colonel Morley—just come, Sir." Lionel hastily opened it, and read:

"My dear Lionel,—Mr. Darrell has suddenly arrived in London. Keep yourself free till to-morrow, when, no doubt, he will see you. I am hurrying off to him. Yours in haste, A. V. M."

Grey and Grey Darrell.

GUY DARRELL was alone. A lofty room in a large house, on the first floor. His own house in Caulton Gardens, Pimlico. He had arranged during his brief and brilliant parliamentary career; since then, all his contemptuously to the care of a house-agent, to be let by year to the highest bidder known various tenants of an opulence and station suited to the rent he asked. Dinners and concerts, routes and balls, had assembled in its friendly walls all the spirits of many a gracious host and smiling hostess. Now, however, one of these temporary occupants had recently departed, and the house agent, had not forgotten the long-absent owner dropped down into its silvered halls at the very hour that gives writers what they fear; making visionary maps in that luminous obscure.

"There is so much power in faith," said Lionel, "even when faith is applied but to things human and false. Now, I am sure I could be half persuaded that he is born to do, some day, what at the moment seems impossible, and it is fifty to one but what he does it before he dies. Surely, when you were a child at school, you felt convinced that there was something in your fate distinct from that of the other boys—whom the master might call quite as clever—felt that faith in yourself which I am sure that you would be one day what you are."

"Well, I suppose so; but vague aspirations and self-conceits must be bound together by some practical necessity—perhaps a very homely and a very vulgar one—or they smoke and evaporate. One would think that rich people in high life ought to do more than poor folks in humble life. More pains are taken with their education; they have more leisure for the summer, the bent of their genius; yet it is the poor folks, often half self-educated, and with pinched bellies, that do three fourths of the world's real labor. Poverty is the keenest stimulant, and poverty made me not say, 'I will do,' but 'I shall.'"

"You know real poverty in childhood, Frank?"

"Real poverty, covered over with sham affluence. My father was Genteel Poverty, and my mother was Genteel Gentility. Sham affluence went when my father died. The real poverty then came out in all its glory. I was driven from a genteel school, at which, long afterward, I genteelly paid the bills; and I had to support my mother and sister—or rather contribute to her support. I succeeded. Also, I fear not genteelly! But before I succeeded, which I did in a few years, she had some comforts which were not appearances; and now I easily allowed, dear soul, that gentility and shame do not go well together. Oh! beware of debt, Lizzette sus; and never call that economy which entails debt—debt is but the safeguard from mean degradation."

"I surround you at last, Vance; shake hands; I know why you are so fond of me."

"Habit now," answered Vance, repressing praise of himself, as usual. "But I remember so well what twopence was a sum to be respected, that to this day I would rather put it by than spend it. All our ideas, like orange-plants, spread out in proportion to the size of the box which imprisons the roots. Then I had a sister. Vance paused a moment as if in pain, but went on with seeming carelessness, leaning over the window-sill, and turning his face from his friend. "I had a sister older than myself, handsome, genius, the very pride of her! Foolish girl! my love was not enough for her.

The man is but little altered externally since we saw him last, however inly changed since he last stood on those unwelcoming floors; the form still retained the same vigor and symmetry—the same unexhaustible dignity of mien and bearing—the same thoughtful bend of the proud neck—no distinct, in its elastic rebound, from the stoop of debility or age. Thick as ever the rich mass of dark brown hair, though, when in the impatience of some painful thought, his hand swept the loose curls from his forehead, there was discernible streaks more than scanty here and there—vanishing almost as soon as seen. Not, however, the baptismal register may say to the contrary, that man is not old—not even elderly; in the deep of that clear gray eye light may be cold, but it sparkles not; nor will a ray, sent from brain or from heart, is yet flickering down. The cheek, however, there is less composure than of old in his smile, and hesitancy—less of that resignation which seemed to say, "I have taken the substances of life." Still there was gloom, but it was more broken and restless. Sometimes he would throw his head again admitting, or forcing itself to cease, human hopes, human objects. Returning to the substances of life, their memories were seen in the shadows which, when they wrap us round at sunset darkness seem to lose their solidity as they gain their width. He broke from his musing attitude with an abrupt, angry movement, and it fell from off thoughts which displeased him, and gathering his arms rigidly to his breast, in a gesture peculiar to him, paced to and fro the room, murmuring inaudibly. The door opened; he turned quickly, and with an evident sense of relief, for his face brightened. "Adrian, my dear Alban!"

"Darrell—dear friend—old school-friend—dear, dear Guy Darrell!" The two Englishmen shook hands tightly clasped in each other, in true English gentleness—eyes exchanging with remembrances that carried them back to boyhood.

Alban was the first to recover self-possession; and when the friends had seated themselves, he surveyed Darrell's countenance attentively, and said: "So little change!—wonderful! Why, you are younger!"

"Suppose from life—hybernating. But you look me; you have been spending life, yet seem as rich in it as when we parted."

"No; I begin to decry the present and look the past—my head with gladness to decide from prejudice, to recoil from change, to find sense in wrinkles, and the value of health from the fear to lose it—feel a tendency to rheumatism, an awe of bronchitis—to tell anecdotes and to wear flannel. Yes, I am a street-collector I disclose the truth—I am no longer twenty-five. Yet, lurking—I'm civilized talk; does it not refresh you after the gibberish you have been forced to in Asia Minor?"

Darrell and Alban answered in the affirmative with truth. What man, after long years of solitude, is not refreshed by the sound of social, that recalls to him the gay time of the world he remembered in his young day—and recalls to him on the first day of his return home? But Darrell and nothing; only he settled himself in an chair with a more elaborate air of enjoyment, his relaxing brows with a nod of encouragement or assent.

Colonel Morley continued. "But when did you arrive? whence? How long do you stay here? What are your plans?"

DARRELL. "Cæsar could not be more laconic."

"When arrived?—this evening. Whence?—Constantinople. How long? So I say unceremonious. What are my plans?—let us discuss them."

COLONEL MORLEY. "With all my heart. You have plans, then?—a good sign. Animals in hibernation form none."

DARRELL ("Putting aside the lights on the table, so as to bring the fire-light more strongly toward the floor as he speaks). "For the last five years I have struggled hard to renew interests—to find occupation—to deal with common life and its healthful objects. Between Easley and Loddon I desired to be—to become—to almost. I took rather a vast one—nearly all the rest of the known world. I have visited both hemispheres—both Indies. I have have I ransacked, and pierced as far into Africa as travelers have ever been in search of knowledge. I have sojourned also, at long intervals—at least they seemed long to me—in the gay capitals of Europe (Paris excepted, which, even with the payest—hired palaces, filled them with guests—I could not stand much). 'Guy Darrell,' said I, 'shake off the rust of years—thou hadst no youth while young. Behold a holiday for young nature free to wholesome work, as a boy restores the worried school-boy.'"

COLONEL MORLEY. "Experimented; the experiment succeeded?"

DARRELL. "I don't know—not yet—but it may; I am here, and I intend to stay. I would not go to a hotel for a single day, lest my resolution should fail me. I drove to my own—of into the castle of care without even a garrison. I am here, Mr. Morley, I am here. In a word, and without metaphor, I am here with the design of re-entering London life."

COLONEL MORLEY. "I am glad. Hearty congratulations! How rejoiced all the Viponts will be! Another career for you, and we shall have seen the newspapers regularly, of course—the state of the country interests you. You say that you come from Oxenford, the town you once represented. I guess you will re-enter Parliament; you have but to say the word."

DARRELL. "Parliament! No. I received, while abroad, so earnest a request from my old constituents to lay the foundation-stone of a new Town-hall, in which they are much interested, and my obligations to them have been so great, that I could not refuse. I wrote to fix the day as soon as I had resolved to return to England, making a condition that I should be spared the infliction of a public dinner, and landed just in time to keep my appointment—reached Southford early this morning, went through the ceremony, made a short speech, came on at once to London, not venturing to diverge to Fawley (which is not very far from Oxnelford), lest, once there again, I should not have strength to leave there again, I should not have strength to leave it—and here I am." Darrell paused, then repeated, in brisk, emphatic tone: "Parliament? No. Luther? No. Fellow-men? I am about to confess to you; I would snatch back some days of youth—a wintry likeness of yesterday—than none. Old friend, let us resume ourselves! When I was working hard—hard—hard—it was you who would say: 'Come, Darrell, come!'—You happy butterfly that you were! Now, I say to you: 'Show me this Boanerges town that you know so well; initiate me into the joy of polite pleasures, social communion—

"Dash—and forever on and on:
You have amusements—let me share them."

"Faith," quoth the Colonel, crossing his legs, "you came late in the day! Amusements cease to amuse at last. I have tried all, and begin to be tired. I have had my holiday, exhausted its sports; and you, coming from books and desk fresh into the playground, say, 'Football and cricket—Ah! my poor friend, why did not you come sooner?'"

Darrell.—"One word, one question. You have made rash a philosophy and a system; no man ever did so with more brilliancy and less loss in following pleasure, have you parted company with conscience and shame. A fine gentleman even, in honor as in elegance. Well, are you satisfied with your choice of life? Are you happy?"

"Happy—who is? Satisfied—perhaps?"

"Is there any one you envy—whose choice, other than your own, you would prefer?"

"Certainly."

"Who?"

"You."

"I!" said Darrell, opening his eyes with unaffected amaze. "I! envy me! prefer my choice!"

Colonel Morley (coyishly). "Without doubt. You have had gratified ambition—a great career. Envy you! why, you have the stalwart and unbowed, young blood still in your veins. Ungrateful man! who would not change lots with Guy Darrell? Those words are sincere, and, not to flatter you, a form and presence that would be remarked, even in the crowd of the black frock by the side of a monarch in his coronation robes."

Darrell.—"You have turned my questions against myself with a kindliness of intention that makes me forgive your belief in my vanity. Pass on—or rather pass back; you say you have tried all in life that distresses or sweetens. So be it; lose bachelor, you have won wedlock. Has not that been your mistake?"

Colonel Morley.—"Excuse for yourself. You have tried it." The words were scarce out of his mouth ere he repented the answer. For Darrell did not let it sting to the quick; and his brow, before serene, his lip, before playful, grew, the one darkly troubled, the other darkly compressed. "Pardon me," faltered out the friend.

Darrell.—"Oh, 'tis I should ask pardon of myself. What could we have been talking? Tell me the news—not political—any other. But first, your report of young Haughton. Cordial thanks for all your kindness to him. You write me word that he is much improved—more worthy of his name? Is he become the rage—that in London you are sure he will be extremely popular. But is it so, if for his own sake, I feel quite sure that it is not for the expectations which I may have allowed to conjure?"

Colonel Morley. "Much for himself, I am certain; a little, perhaps, because, whatever he thinks itself I say to the contrary—people have no other heir to your property."

"I understand," interrupted Darrell, quickly. "But he does not nurse those expectations? he will not be disappointed?"

Colonel Morley. "Verily I believe that, apart from his love for you, and a delicacy of sentiment that would shrink from pilfering hopes of wealth in the graves of benefactors, Lionel Haughton would prefer carving his own fortune to all the chances here and out of California by another's hand, and bequeathed by another's will."

"I am heartily glad to hear it—glad to trust you."

"I gather from what you say that you are here with the intention to—to—"

"Marry again," said Darrell, firmly. "Right. I am."

"I always felt sure you would marry again. Is the lady here, too?"

"What lady?"

"The lady you have chosen?"

"Ouch—I have chosen none. I come here to choose; and in this I ask advice from your experience. I would marry again! I—at my age! Ridiculous! But so it is. You know all the mothers and marriageable daughters that London—words mirror—rears for nuptial share —where, among them, shall I, Guy Darrell, the man whom you think so enviable, find the safe helpmate whose love he may reward with magnificent jointure, to whose child he may bequeath the name that has now no successor, and the wealth he has no heart to spend?"

Colonel Morley—who, as we know, is by habit a match-maker, and likes the vocation—assumes a placid but cogitative mien, rubs his brow gently, and says, in his softest, best-bred accents, "You would not marry a mere girl? some one of suitable age? I know several most some one of suitable age? I know several most superior young women on the other side of thirty—Wilhelmina Prymme, for instance, or Julia—"

Darrell. "Old maids. No—decidedly no!"

Colonel Morley (suspiciously). "But you would not risk the peace of your old age with a girl of eighteen? Now, I—I, who am so accomplished, well brought-up girl; just eighteen —why—"

Darrell. "Re-enter life by the side of eighteen! Am I a madman?"

Colonel Morley. "Of Neither old maids, nor young ones; maybe the choice becomes narrowed. You would prefer a widow, I suppose, for sake of one's a prize, indeed, could you but win her —the widow of—"

Darrell. "Sphynx! Halt! suggest no widow to me. A widow, with her affections buried in the grave!"

Morley. "Not necessarily. And in this case—"

Darrell (interrupting, and with warmth). "In ever case, I tell you, no widow shall doff her weeds for me and for me alone. Enough of Belle is the woman who can love twice. Did she not love him? why did she marry him? Perhaps she could not help it. Enough! Shall she sell herself again to me, for a jointure? Heaven forbid! Shall I, Guy Darrell, be bought so favorless as a heart warmed up again?"

Colonel Morley. "Neither widow nor thing old or young, you refuse. Possibly you want an angel. London is not the place for angels."

Darrell. "I grant that. I am not quite so wolved in perplexity. How can it be otherwise, if one's self is perplexed? And yet, Morley, I am curious; and I do not think I am so exacting as my words have implied. I ask not fortune, nor, since I have myself some name, another beauty, nor accomplishments, nor fashion; but I do ask one thing, and one thing only."

"What is that?" said the friend left nothing worth the having to ask for."

"Nothing! I have left all. I ask some one whom I can love—love better than all the world —not the surrogate de connexion, not the amour de raison, but the love of romance. All other marriage, with vows of love so solemn, with interchange of affections so tender, now touch, now sage, in my eyes, is as rotted falsehood—a vanished sin. Ah! if I had thought so, what a brief misery, torpor and repulsion! The future alone is now before me. Alban Morley, I would not have the body of a lovely dead girl laid in the house at Fawley, ay, and after signing, eat off, to boot, this right hand, could I have seen her lips kiss my brow, my heart, again, as any two of Heaven's simplest human creatures may love each other with all their soul! Stranger, friend —look out into the world; mark the man of our years who shall be most admired, most followed, most adored. Give him all the attributes of power, wealth, royalty, genius, fame. See all the younger generation bowing down to him, as they or owe; his word can make their fortune; at his smile a nation may rejoice. Then look on that man say to the young, 'Room among yourselves—all that wins me this homage I would not at the like price accept.' I enter the lists of love," and straightway his power vanishes, the young body my early-dead can push him aside; before the object of reverence he is now the butt of ridicule. The instant he asks right to win the heart of woman, he is, in her objective, he could rule as a hickey, cries, 'Off, Gray-beard!' and Time is the victor over me."

"This were but eloquent extravagance, even if your heard were gray. Men older than you, and with half your fame, have married, and in some form, have carried away hearts from boys like Haughton. Be reasonable, and, as I said before —if it was not difficult who would be a bachelor?"

Guide my choice. Pilot me to the haven."

"Accepted! But you must remount a suitable establishment, receive and visit—in a great world, and penetrate those sacred recesses where anxious spinsters weave the fatal web. Leave all to me. Mrs. and Miss (I see you have him still) call on me to-morrow about your nosegay. I can will go home, and write to them."

"Oh, of course. Must I dine at them myself?"

Morley laughed softly, and took up his hat.

"So soon," cried Darrell. "If I fatigue you already, what must I be together—you, my friend—to others?"

"So soon! it is past eleven. And it is you who speak so fatigued."

"So much good luck; were I fatigued, I might hope to sleep. Good night, Morley. Let me not alone in this room—alone in the jaws of Fish; swallowed up by a creature whose blood is cold!

"You have something still to say to me," said Alban, when they were in the open air; "I desire it to be said before we part."

"I know not. But you have told me no news; these streets are grown strange to me. Who're now the great? Who're the rising? Answers were my friends."

"In that house—oh, new people; I forget their names—but rich—in a year or two, with luck, they may be exclusives, and forget we name. In the other house, Curr Viponi, still."

"Viponi; those dear Viponis! what of them all? cruel they? sting they? Bask they in the sun? or are they in anxious process of a change of skin?"

"Hush, my dear friend; no satire on your own connections; nothing so injudicious. I am a Viponi, too, and all for the family maxim—'Viponi with Viponi, and come what may!'"

"I stand rebuked. But I am married. I married, it is true, into their house, and they married, ages ago, into mine; but no drop in the blood of time-servers flows through the veins of the last childless Darrell. Pardon. I allow the merit of the Viponi ease; no family more serene nor respectful interest. What of their births, deaths, and marriages?"

Colonel Morley. "All to births, Carr has just welcomed the birth of a grandson; the first-born of his daughter, who married last year the son and heir of the Duke of Halifax]—a promising young man, a Lord in the Admiralty. Carr has a second son in the —— Hussars; he just purchased his step; the other boys are still at school. As for Lady Viponi, she is now considerably brought up; indeed, now I think of it, the eldest, Honoria, might suit you, slightly accomplished as she is read, interests herself in politics—a great admirer of intellect—of a very superior order, in fact."

Darrell. "A female politician with a serious turn of mind—a farthing rushlight in a London fog! Honoria to subjects less gloomy. Whose funeral achievement is that present?"

Colonel Morley. "The late Lord Niton's, father to Lady Montfort."

Darrell. "Lady Montfort! Her father was a Lord, and left her to the Fleet. Ha! Haughton, at least, has gone over me and my world with a kindred spirit in the face of his widow."

Colonel Morley. "I speak of the present Lord Montfort's wife—the Earl's. You of the late Marquis's first wife. Marquises—the antipathies is extinct. Surely, whatever your wanderings, you must have heard of this death of the last Marquis of Montfort!"

"Yes, I heard of that," answered Darrell, in a somewhat changed and muttered voice. "So he is dead, the young man.]—What killed him?"

Colonel Morley. "A violent attack of croup—quite sudden. He was staying at Carr's at the time. I suspect that Carr made him drink a drug, for he was not accustomed to the deranged his system altogether. But don't let me revive painful recollections."

Darrell. "Was she with him at the time?"

Colonel Morley. "Lady Montfort? —No; they were very ill-matched together."

Darrell. "She is not married again yet?"

Colonel Morley. "—No, but still young, so beautiful, she will have many offers. I know those who are waiting to propose. Montfort has been only dead seven months—died in May, and how young Carr's marriage. His widow lives, in complete seclusion, at the furniture-house at Twickenham. She has only seen even me once since her loss."

Darrell. "When was that?"

Morley. "About six or seven months ago; she asked about you with much interest."

Darrell. "After me?"

Colonel Morley. "To be sure. Don't I remember how constantly she and her mother were at your house? Is it strange that she should ask about you, or ought to know her better—the most affectionate, grateful character?"

Darrell. "I dare say. But at the time you refer to I was too occupied to acquire much acquaintance with a young lady's character. I should have known her mother's character better, yet I scarcely do."

Colonel Morley. "Mrs. Lyndsay's character you might well mistake—charming but artificial; [and I should advise you, Darrell, if you had not that liberal prejudice against widows, she was the very person I was about to suggest to you."

Darrell. "A fashionable beauty, and young enough to be my daughter! Such is Spartan friendship! So the manipulate is extinct, and Sir James Graham [of treasonable name in the House of Commons—respectable man—great authority on cattle—timid, and always saying, 'Let your own better article to-day's cattle-show'] has the estates and the earldom."

Colonel Morley. "Yes. There was some fear of a disputed succession, but Sir James made his claim very clear. Between you and me, the claimant has been a curious subject for the Viponis. The late Lord was not wise, but the Morse connection [that of the late Lord Grand Seigneur—and Carr managed the family influence with admirable tact. The present Lord has but been a cypher, as his wife's family his taste. He has taken the management not only of the property, but of its influence, out of Carr's hands, and will make a sad mess of it, for he is an impracticable, speculative politician. He will never keep a Parliament together—quarrels —a-nd thing. I remember how our last minister, Lord Spain [not a Viponi connection—created into Lord ——'s Cabinet; the mere report of it in the newspapers set all people talking and thinking. What was it, then, that, a month after, proper overtures were made to Carr—he connected to assist the Administration, and the Country was saved! Now, thanks to this stupid new Earl, in eighteen months we have lost ground which it took at least a century and a half to gain. Our votes are divided, our influence frittered away. Montfort and Viponi, he and Carr, grown quite thin, says that, in the coming ' crisis ' Cabinet will not only be formed, but will last—last—last—long enough for reputable mischief—without a single Viponi in office."

Thus Colonel Morley continued in mournful strain, Darrell silent by his side, till the Colonel reached his own door. There, while applying his latch-key to the lock, Alban's mind returned from the perils that threatened the House of Viponi and the Star of Brunswick, to the petty claims of private friendship. But even these last were blended with those grander interests; one care for which every true patriot of the House of Viponi imbibed with his mother's milk.

"Your appearance in town, my dear Darrell, is most opportune. It will be an object with the whole family to make the most of you at this coming ' causes'—I say coming, for I believe in most cases. Your name is still freshly remembered—your position greater for having been out of all the scrapes of the party the last sixteen or seventeen years; your house should be the nucleus of new combinations. Don't forget to send Mills to me; I will engage your chef from your present steward for a month. I know just the man to suit you. Your intention to marry, too, just at this moment, is most auspicious; it will increase the family interest. I may give out that you intend to marry?"

"Oh, certainly—if all [you please."

"A club-room will do as well. I beg ten thousand pardons for my want of luck about money whenever they talk about marriage. I should not like to exaggerate your fortune—I know it must be very large, and all at your own disposal—eh?"

"Every shilling."

"You must have saved a great deal since you retired into private life?"

"Take that for granted. Dick Fairthorn receives my rents, and looks to my various investments; and I find I can keep my disposable cash nearly when I say that, what with the rental of hands I purchased in my poor boy's lifetime, and the interest of very much more lucrative money-ed capital, you may safely whisper to all Indies that it is not for interest in their affairs I invoke a—Sphynx, 'Thirty-five thousand a year, and an old fool.'

"I certainly shall not say so aloud, for I am the same ages as yourself; and if I had £35,000 a year I would marry Venus."

"You would! Old fool!" said Darrell, turning away.

THE GREAT PARIS SEWER.

The great argument, according to some authorities, in favor of the authenticity of the regal history of Rome is the existence of the Cloaca Maxima, the great sewer, by which the city of Tarquin was drained. This was standing one hundred years since, and parts of which serve the same useful purpose today.

The accompanying illustrations demonstrate that the Emperor Napoleon the Third is minded to leave a equally substantial memorial of his reign. Under his orders, a gigantic sewer has been constructed in Paris with a view of carrying all the sewage water and refuse stuff from all the lower decies on the right side of the Seine into that river near the Pont d'Asnieres. This work commenced some seven years ago, and the Cloaca Maxima of Rome, of which it has been said that a loaded cart could be driven through it. The main sewer into which we herewith present a vertical section—is about eighteen feet wide, and fourteen feet high. Scores of various sizes, communicating with street and house drains, traverse the earth on either side, and discharge themselves into the main sewer, which flows through the bed prepared for it. This bed is nearly seven feet deep, and is formed of concrete, so that it may be considered a small river. In dry seasons it is calculated that the drain-stuff will keep the sewer well pretty full; but in seasons every preparation is made for the overflow of the sewer. In the section which the reader will remark in the walls of the sewer are doors of escape for those who may be surprised by a sudden rush of water into the drain and an overflow of the curb. They are provided with safety ladders communicating with dry land above. Such precautions are the more necessary as, in the very rainy seasons which sometimes occur in Paris, it is estimated that the flow of water from sources will amount till the whole tunnel, and would of course drown every unfortunate workman who happened to be in it at the time the torrent began.

The tunnel itself is about three miles long altogether. It is calculated to carry off all the stuff not only from Paris itself but from the populous suburbs of Montmartre and Belleville, which provide against any rise or fall in the Seine which might interfere with the steady flow of liquid outward. At the end of the drain is a system of locks at the point where it joins the river.

The great London drains have not exactly the subject of much curious inquiry. Though they are neither as large nor as scientifically constructed as that Paris sewer they are nevertheless very capacious subterranean tunnels, and may, with proper care, be traversed by visitors without fear or toil. The great danger to be apprehended on such an expedition is from the rats. The sewer rat is a peculiar variety of the genus. They have huge spiny garbage their bite becomes venomous. At those times they will attack a full-grown man among the sporting men of London, the owner of the dog invariably stipulates that no sewer rat is to be introduced. Under such circumstances, these denizens of the sewers become very tiers and hold when brought to bay. They have frequently been known to attack the scavengers while engaged in their work.

A few years since, an unfortunate man, who had been reduced by intemperance to the profession of scavenging, was sent down into one of the great London sewers to make the usual examinations—to clear away obstructions, and inspect the solid matter which is gathered in gratings placed at intervals in the sewers. He was a very corpulent man, and much disabled by the use of ardent spirits. He descended into the sewer late in the afternoon, promising to return by nightfall. Night came, and he did not return. Unhappily no one thought enough about him to inquire what had become of him, or, if the idea occurred to any one, it was not sanatorially cooperated that he had emerged and had gone to the public-house, as his wont was. Next morning his wife and child appeared at the office to inquire after him. Their questions aroused the attention of the agent in charge, and he directed a couple of men to descend instantly into the sewer in search of him.

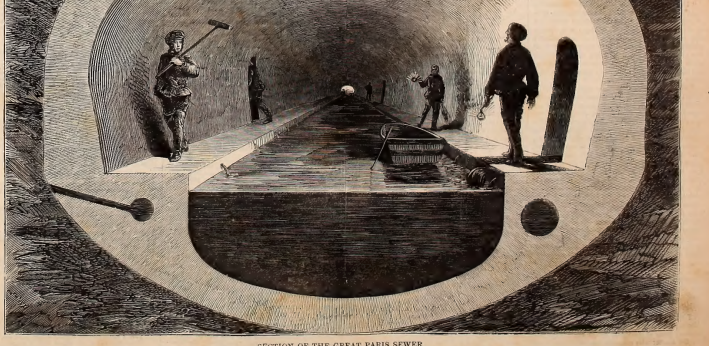
They found a horrid spectacle on descending into that abode of filth and darkness. The unfortunate man lay with part of his body in the turbid stream, his head against the side of the sewer. He was quite dead, and almost fleshless. When the two men first saw him, they estimated that a thousand rats were at work devouring him. Around him lay many score of dead rats, whose corpses attested the vigor with which he had defended his life. His cheeks, nose, and eyes were gone. His intestines were mostly devoured, and the bulk of the flesh was gnawed from his legs and arms. At the first approach of the new-comers, the rats evinced a strong disposition to contest possession of the corpse. As the men approached they flew at them with tiger-like ferocity. To drive them away, the scavengers were compelled to resort to a well-known method: by a mixture of chemical ingredients they produced an ammoniacal flame which rats can not endure, and by this means recovered possession of the horrid skeleton of their unhappy comrade.

Old scavengers have been heard to declare that they had rather meet a well-armed burglar than a squad of these sewer rats on a foraging expedition, unless they were provided with their chemicals. The peculiar mode of attack of the sewer rat indeed renders him a most formidable enemy. The sewer rat, when he has resolved upon an attack, runs with peculiar swiftness upon his adversary, and in a twinkling ascends his legs to a vital part. At the moment the man aims a blow at the rat who is dashing at his feet, the vermin is biting his stomach or his throat. If the rats are numerous, and the man has no means of defense but a common weapon, he must find an avenue of escape or he is gone. These safety holders have been added to the Paris sewer partly with this view.

At the locks at the extremity of the Paris sewer proper gratings are provided to facilitate an examination of the matter which passes through the drain into the river. It may not be generally known that Pactolus, with all his golden sands, did not flow to the sea more richly freighted than the great sewers of metropolitan cities. The slime, and filth, and garbage, and refuse of all kinds which roll their unfragrant bulk through the underground channel contain, every day, the most precious products of human industry and ingenuity. If the scavenger staff of New York could be sifted thoroughly, the right of retaining the valuables buried in the filth would be worth a princely fortune. In London, the scavengers constantly find in the sewers such articles as bank-notes, valuable papers of various kinds, lace handkerchiefs, and trimmings, pieces of silk (sometimes whole, having evidently been thrown into the sewers by thieves who were chased and took that method of getting rid of the evidences of their crime), jewelry of every kind, rings, bracelets, ear-rings, breast-pins, chains, pocket-books, purses, silver spoons and forks, small articles of plate, etc., etc., etc. Of these, many find their way into the sewers through the carelessness of servants. Thieves—under a police pressure—contribute others. The bakers are articles dropped in the street which the first rain naturally floats into the common receptacle.

The Paris sewer was somewhat impeded in its progress by the necessity of guarding against a landslip in parts where the earth above had an unusual weight to bear. In one part of its course it passes under a railway. This part was considered peculiarly dangerous, and, until the sewer was complete, the railway company was prohibited from running heavy trains over the spot; even the lighter trains were ordered to proceed as slowly as possible on approaching that point. When the London drains were opened they met with very different obstacles. At several points they intersected with subterranean channels, which, up to that time, had remained quite unknown to the police. These channels, or tunnels, had been used for generations, it is supposed, by thieves and malefactors. Some of them led to the Thames; into these murdered bodies were thrown, and left to float out into the river. Others were convenient channels of escape for burglars and other criminals when hard pressed by the police. The English novelist, Harrison Ainsworth, turned the discoveries of unlawful subterranean passages to good account in his "Jack Sheppard" and other romances, which were published at the time the construction of the sewers led to these discoveries.



Even in modern times criminals have frequently sought refuge in sewers. Some years since, under one of the last Bourbons, the police and public of Paris were appalled by the commission of an atrocious crime. An old lady and her daughter—both members of the first society of Paris, and the latter one of its fairest ornaments—were discovered murdered in the house which they occupied alone. It was evident that they had been robbed and shockingly abused previous to death. Circumstances, which need not be here repeated, pointed to two notorious villains, who had lately been released from prison, as the criminals. All Paris was on the alert. The King, the municipality, the family of the murdered ladies, and various prominent citizens offered high rewards for the detection of the scoundrels, and that large body of idlers who are ready for any thing instantly turned detectives for the nonce, and gave their aid to the regular police. Not a nook or cranny in the old city was left unexplored, but all without result. Suddenly, in the midst of the excitement, one of the principal sewers became choked up. The consequences were so disagreeable that measures were at once taken to discover the stoppage, and a very few hours' work brought to light the bodies of the two criminals jammed into a narrow part of the old sewer, and perfectly embedded in a mass of filth and garbage. From the position in which they were found it seemed likely that they had tried, after finding refuge in the sewer, to make their way out of it, probably in search of food; but that, whether from incaution or accident, they had contrived to jam themselves into a corner from which they had not the power to creep out. The effluvia would soon cause death in such a case.

The old Dublin story may serve as a pendant to this. Many years ago, as people were trudging along Sackville Street, in Dublin, on a bright morning, a voice was heard issuing from the mouth of a sewer—"Help! help! I'm stifling! Good Lord—good people, get me out!"

In an instant the street was crowded with people, and the police, who had attempted to take the lead in investigating the matter, were roughly driven aside. Half a dozen sympathetic individuals volunteered to communicate with the imprisoned tenant of the sewer.

"Where are ye, darlint?" shouted they, with their noses in the dirt.

"Sure it's in the drain I am, honey; an' ay ye

SECTION OF THE GREAT PARIS SEWER.

don't get me out mighty quick, I'll die here — the smell is killin'."

"He's alive!" shouted the leaders of the mob; and to work fell the crowd instantly, under their command, to tear up the street. With picks, and spade, and shovel, and crow-bar, they fell upon the pavement—working so furiously that in a very few minutes the drain was laid bare. There were no signs of the prisoner.

"Where are ye, honey?" roared one of the chiefs of the sympathetic mob.

"Shall I be fainted—the poor crathur!"

And the crowd fell to, more ardently than before, digging and delving, till a full acre of the pavement of the street was torn up. Still no signs of the miserable prisoner was seen.

Just at this moment a squadron of horse-police arrived at the scene of action, and the mob took to their heels instinctively. The magistrates had been told that a clever ventriloquist had played the trick on the mob, without dreaming of the consequences. But it is generally believed by this day, among the people of Dublin, that the voice came from a poor Irish potato, which the luckless Saxons stifled to death in the drain, sorra.

PROVERBS.

INCOME.

No one is less respected than a man who muddles away a large income, nobody knows how. For all expenditure there should be something to show, and that something ought to have either utility, use, or dignity, or pomposness to recommend it. But every one and then we meet with cases of expenditure perfectly mysterious. A man of princely inheritance or preferment does nothing, makes no figure, helps nobody, has no exquisite taste, has not only spends every shilling of his income, but eats into difficulties. His domestic comfort, his house ill-furnished, his equipages shabby, his servants ill-paid, his subscriptions in arrears, his hospitality mean, his sons stinted, his daughters portionless, his estate encumbered: in fact, every thing goes to rack and ruin around him, occasionally performing his part in sustaining the great fabric of society, as far as his influence extends, there is one vast deficiency. He may be with cases of cards and crash in every direction. Nobody can say where the money is gone. He has not portioned friends, assisted dependents, built churches, fertilized the soil, ornamented the country, delighted the town, or done any thing that is creditable to his hand upon. It has all been dribbled and frittered away on himself, without any visible enjoyment, without either system or object; it has won neither gratitude, nor admiration, nor respect.

ARTICLES OF FOOD.

Besides varieties in the staple articles of food, there are the infinite varieties of fancy. The Chinese make a delicacy of rats and mice—almost the French, of frogs. The ancients, who carried epicureanism to lengths never dreamed of by gourmen, thought the hedgehog a tit-bit, and had a word to say in favor of the donkey, which they placed on an equality with the ox and sheep. They considered squid to chickens, and even eats were not to be despised. The pork which we eat with great confidence, they considered, and not unfruly, the least digestible of animal meats, fit only for artizans and soldiers. They ate snails, and the edible chodder, with the gusto we acknowledge in oysters. It would be difficult to persuade even a Roman stomach to dine, in full consciousness, off a "single donkey," flanked by "ribs of dog, with fried hedgehogs." In this repugnance only peculiar to the were Greek dogs and donkeys more succulent than ours?

DIOGENES AND HIS TUB.

Every body has heard of Diogenes and his tub. All may not know, perhaps, that the tub was an article of pottery, and not very easy to make.

"The principal vases of terra-cotta manufactured by the Greeks were large tubs or casks, called pithi, calculated to hold enormous quantities of wine and oil; amphoræ, or vases with a small size, yet sufficiently large to hold several gallons; phiale, or saucers; pomoles, or vases shaped like pears; unochoe, or jugs; together with numerous small vases used for common domestic purposes, and others which appear to have been manufactured solely to funeral ceremonies.

"Pithoi, or casks, of gigantic size, are found in Italy; and although no perfect ones have been discovered in Greece, yet fragments of them prove that they were also used in that country. They are shaped like enormous cadrons, with globular bodies and wide gaping mouths. When full, the mouth was covered with a large circular stone, called lekanis. It must have been such a cask that Glaucus, the son of Minos, fell; and it was amount the Centaurs, according to mythical traditions, how kept their stock of wine. They were sufficiently capacious to hold a man, and were, in fact, the original bodies of the tubs which are perhaps best known from the circumstance of the eccentric Diogenes having converted one of them into his domicile; who is represented in some works of ancient art stretching his body out of a pithos at the moment of his conference and repartee with Alexander. They were used to hold honey, wine, and figs. It required great skill to make such vases; hence the Greek potters characterized an ambitious but inexperienced man as 'one who began with a cask.' They were made by a peculiar process, which is described as plastering the clay round a certain frame-work of wood, the pithos being too large to be turned on the lathe."

SALT.

Tim will buffalo frequents the salt licks of Northwestern America; the wild animals in the central parts of Southern Africa are a sure prey to the hunter who conceals himself beside one of the spring; and our domestic cattle run peacefully to the hand that offers them a taste of this luxury. From time immemorial it has been known that without salt man would miserably perish; and among horrible punishments, entailing certain death, that of feeding culprits on saltless food is said to have prevailed in barbarous times.

When Cook and Hunter landed in Otaheite they astonished the natives, who saw them eating white powder with every mouse of meat; and every one remembers Mr. Bligh's expressive repudiation of salt. But the savages who ate no "white powder" ate fish, and therefore found their food rich in salt. In several parts of Africa men are sold for salt; and on the Gold Coast it is the most precious of all commodities. On the coast of Sierra Leone a man will sell his sister, his wife, or his child for salt, not having learned the art of distilling it from the sea.

The properties of salt are manifold. It forms about the 200th part of the bulkes of human body. It renders aliments soluble, and is necessary for digestion, being decomposed in the stomach into hydrochloric acid for the gastric process, and soda for the bile. It has also a most important property of preserving the animal from putrefaction by fluids through the walls of the vessels, in accordance with the law of endosmose and exosmose of vital processes depend, but which we can not stop now to explain. So great are the services of salt that we may confidently adopt the conclusion of Dr. Bence Jones, that it is "a substance as essential to life as nitrogenous food or non-nitrogenous food and water;" and if so essential, then assuredly Food.

CONSECRATION OF AGE.

Old Solomon—old Mimnermus—old Theognis —old Sophocles—old Anacreon—old Sophocles—old Plutarch—old Heinsius—old Homer—old old Methuselah! What mean we by the word old? All nations agree to call it in three letters. Old is the raven age—long, long ago—and we heard tell of them in our youth. Their glory dawns on us like the first rays of life's golden prime—and far away seems now that dawn, as if in another world, before the deluge came! In the word of the word "old," far from us is all thought of dotage or decay. Old are those great personages as the stars which, in heaven there is no sense of growing, forever young, all the most ancient spiritual words of poetry. How full the expression "old boy!"—"old girl!"—"old Christopher North!" "old Shakspeare!" "old Ben!" which sayings age seems to give a consecration which youth reverses. —Recreations of Christopher North.

COMING TO CONSCIENCE.

A COUNTRY minister was about to leave his own congregation to preach in another church. A magistrate of the village who was by no means a pleasant attendant to beg on behalf of his place of worship. Previous to the minister's leaving the principal persons connected with his charge, and said to them, "Now I am going to preach where I am unconsciously done all that we can for the removal of this debt; what answer am I to give? Brother So-and-so, what do you suppose I shall say?" "Why, Sir," he replied, "if you come to conscience, I don't think you will." "Well, gentlemen, you are to a second and a third, and so on, and similar answers were returned, till the whole sum required was subscribed, and the debt no longer put a stain upon the pastor's wearing out his zeal in coming to the city on any such unworthy errand."

HELPING THE DYING.

It has often noted a difference in the sympathy with the dying in the rich and in the poor. With the former, there is generally great caution and that the sick should not think themselves going; with the latter, a disposition to tell them so. Under caution attention, a more affectionate look, which the sick may not understand, assurance in a different manner. The poor, on the contrary, tell the sick at once, and without any circumlocution, that they will never get out any more. The reason why is less to the poor—that they have fewer objects in this world for which life might be desirable? But this is sometimes dangerous. I was once going to visit a poor woman, and met the parish surgeon, and inquired for his patient. He told me the room was full of friends and neighbors all telling her she was dangerously ill; and, added he, "I suppose she will not, for she is sinking because she thinks she is going; yet I see no other reason why she should, and I could not get one to leave the room."

I entered; my authority had a better effect. I turned all but one out of the room, and then addressed the woman, who was apparently exhausted and speechless. I told her exactly what the surgeon had said, and that she would not die, but be restored to her children and husband. The woman revived, raised herself in bed, and said, with an energy of which I did not think her capable, "What, am I not dying? shan't I die? No! Then, thank the Lord, I shan't die." I gave strict orders that none should be admitted; and the woman's confidence in my falsehood thanked me for having saved her life. Clergymen should be aware of this propensity in the poor, that, when misdiscovery, they may counteract it.—Rev. John Eagles.

TURNING SMOKE INTO GOLD.

His pipe often furnished Raleigh with an opening for conversation, as he nearly will to the Queen. One day he was conversing on the singular properties of tobacco, which "it could not be carried by," said he, "that I have so well experienced the nature of it, that I can exactly tell even the weight of the pipe of any quantity of tobacco." "I doubt it much, Sir Walter," replied Elizabeth, who was thought of the impracticability of weighing smoke in a balance, "and I will wager you twenty angels that you do not solve my doubt." Raleigh accepted the wager, and he thoroughly smoked. Carefully preserving the ashes, Raleigh weighed them with great exactness; and what was deficient of the original weight he gave as the result. "Your Majesty," said he, "can not deny that the difference has evaporated in smoke." "Truly, I can not," answered the queen. Then turning to her treasurer, she said, in allusion to the alchemists, then very numerous—"Many laborers in the fire have I heard of who turned their gold into smoke; but Raleigh is the first who has turned smoke into gold."

An ascended family, as the legacy to each was read aloud, noticed with regret that the father had lived not to lay his own fortune. At last came the bequest to his heir: "I give and devise to him a shilling and a rope to hang himself with."

"Wait for God," said Tom, nabbing like the rest, "that my poor father had lived to enjoy it himself!"

Lord Norbury, when Solicitor-General, was singularly destitute. Once, upon the occasion of their meeting in London, Mr. Curran, seeing Lord Norbury enter a van attempt to give utterance to his usual hearty salutation, but he could not. He was in tears. "What is that ex-cur-rand ass?"

The following rich scene recently occurred in one of the courts in Chicago. The Judge and a Dutch witness at the stand were examined:

Judge.—"Do you understand the language?"

Witness.—"I go so outin."

Judge.—"Where is your mother tongue?"

Witness.—"Ich hab no mudder, Mynheer."

Judge.—"Have you any father?" "Yes, I vas got learn; I What language did you speak in the cradle?"

A late arrival in Boston, Mass., followed the example of his comrades, and landed his muskets. Having done so, he proceeded to the middle of his piece on his ground, and appeared to be anxiously endeavoring to draw his charge. A bystander, observing his difficulty, said, "Why don't you fire, and let 'em have it, boy?" "Because," replied the soldier, "I don't dare to; I shall accidentally, for get a ball in my gun, and can't get it out."

A love-smitten gentleman, after converting a while with a young lady, commenced the interesting topic of matrimony, concluded, at last, with a declaration, and put the very emphatic question of, "Will you have me?" "I am very sorry to disappoint you," replied the lady, "and hope my refusal will not give you pain; but I must answer—no." "Well, well, that will do, madam," said her pillowpeech lover: "and now suppose we change the subject."

A lady, apparently very solicitous before marriage, was heard to say to her younger sister shortly after, "Well, I wasn't time," remarked an intimate friend to her husband, "that I should not say so to you." "Why, my dear," he answered the husband, "but it's very long since; we've used upon another feeling now, as the song runs."

JERRY.—"Well, Annie, how did you get along with that stupid fool of a lover of yours? I see you succeed in getting rid of him?"

ANNIE.—"Oh, yes! I got rid of him very easily. I married him, and have no lover now."

Dr. Busby, whose figure was much under the common size, was one day accosted in a coffee-room by an Irish baronet of colossal stature with, "Hey-day! can to my soul, O glass!" when the Doctor, politely making way, replied, "Pon, O pigmy!" "Oh, Sir," said the baronet, "my expression referred to the size of your intellect." "Then," retorted the Doctor, "Sir," said he, "is the size of yours."

The will of Governor Blackhall, of Plymouth, Massachusetts, proved in 1833, contains the following singular clause: "I give unto my body to be kept as long as may not be offensive, and that one of my sons or lingers may be cut off, to see whether my body be dead. A further request my dear wife, that as she has been troubled with me so long, she will not think of marrying a second."

A German correspondent has been trying his hand upon rendering into English some specimens of American humor, and sends us the newspaper of his native city. He writes:

"On a Hudson steamer I came down at night, some Americans with me. After long and tedious and very animated narratives of a young fellow-merchant, which he, for entertainment of the society, communicated, was a part of California I never saw another. FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, April 12, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Apr. 10, 1858	$1,153,549	$1,587,959
Corresponding week, 1857	2,508,177	1,934,426
Decrease this year	$1,405,315	$346,517

The export of specie during the week slightly exceeded a quarter of a million, so that the Bank statement this evening will not, in all probability, show any change in the specie line. The most important feature of the Bank movement is the increase of the circulation to $4,000,000. Last week this item appeared to the extent of $3,870,031, and in consequence of the dullness of trade the deposits are still largely on the increase hand, of course, a growing ease to money. Money is low left on call with the brokers at 4 @ 5 per cent, and first-class paper at short dates is being done at 5 @ 6. There are no signs whatever of a renewal of the specie export.

The downward movement in the Stock Market was checked early in the week, and a very material improvement has since taken place. Monday last the improvement in the leading speculative securities amounted to about 6 @ 8 per cent. On Friday there was a further and decided symptoms of a fresh inclination, as outside orders again crowded the brokers' offices. In the absence of money, the prospect of increased traffic on the railroads and the dullness of trade, are favorable to speculative movements in stocks.

USE MEDICINE IN THE SPRING—

That those who are about to sicken are more sure to die than when the genial influences of spring relax the chill of winter, and invite to exercise. The system, suffering, if not diseased, attains a high state of purification, to be enervated, unless invigorated by a vegetable cleansing. DRAKENBERG'S Vegetable Universal Pills gently and invigorate the blood, and their good effects are at once evident. Being composed entirely of innocent vegetables, they do not expose those who use them to danger. They are daily and safely administered to females, to infancy, youth, manhood, and old age. The most extraordinary cures and generations has been given their present perfection as a general medicine. Principal Office and Depot, 241 Broadway, New York; also, 241 Market street and 241 Rodney Street; 115 Third Avenue; 175 Fulton street, Brooklyn; and 154 South Sixth Street, Williamsburgh. A LEGITIMATE GIFT ENTERPRISE DEFENDED.

EVANS & CO.,

In reply to a Libelous Weekly,

Merry Xmas tale their stand on, Attorney Dividends.

At intervals of a fortnight during the past ten weeks a paper, celebrated for the touching, confiding, and bad grammar of its widely-pulled stories, has seen fit to libel, unfactiously, all engaged in the Gift Enterprise of Evans & Co. It has sought to confound in public regard the

with the "pithy, pencil, and lottery swindles" against which we are glad to see Mayor Tiemann now taking such vigorous and effectual steps; and it has labored unscrupulously and persistently to create an impression throughout the country that all Gift Enterprises, of whatever kind, have been declared by the Common Council and Mayor to be on a par with our country friends to understand, as it is already understood by all in this city, that Mayor Tiemann has proved himself the best friend of the honest Gift Enterprise by avenging away those unprincipled and fraudulent concerns, through the agency of which a fair, respectable, and widely useful business was falling into disreputableness and disgrace.

We are sincerely thankful for the late vigorous measures of the Mayor, which have seemed to have been to please our business as a recognized legal feature, without subject to any interference from the law, nor has the Council as yet been so much slanderous as the editor of the libelous sheet in question has paid his damaged newsletter-writers, both male and female, to pour out upon us.

We say on us, though the attack was general—the libeller knowing his weakness too well to provoke a direct personal issue; but, as the inventors and originators of a system by which we claim to have done great public good in the diffusion of intelligence, we reply individually, and say that the charge is false, and that both the innocent and guilty with our common disgrace.

As stated very fairly in The New York Herald of last week, the real motive of the attack made by the wealthy and demoralizing journal in question, will be found in this: that certain "journals, standing on the same ground, though not so stupid or besotted as the libeling sheet, have lately put in practice the idea first conceived by Messrs. Evans, of getting patronage by occasional distribution of profit with the subscriber, instead of paying agents an enormous percentage for each subscription, or advertising through dishonored columns of the daily press an identical repetition of the request to "read Plato's New Book" "Hemo, and Hem hems easily," goes on The Herald, "and with this explanation, the public, even the intelligent public, is able to judge of the [illegible] of the value, honor, and disinterestedness of that paper's criticisms." Now, this is a system of the grossest dishonest literature which we did in defiance—being at present, beyond any doubt, the most extensive retail bookseller in the United States, and not having our text standard works in all departments of learning in our catalogue—competed with that system, and, consequently, declarations, and untruth trash resulted in swiftly drifts by the journal which her libeled us, we are not only willing but anxious that a just comparison should be made between the two systems, and that, through the agencies of the Gift Enterprises, victory here in the last resort of despotism, and this particular form of the periodical journal be performed. To make doing it a confession of as much imbecility: to confess liking it if my one over did that), would justify the most active interposition of solicitous friends! Our business stands on a broader and firmer basis to-day than ever heretofore. Amid all the prosecutions going on, the bestowery of our system has never once been questioned. We stand as the recognized peers of the first book-publishing houses throughout the country, and the Libraries in the States have testified their confidence in us by standing to us as patrons to be sold in our catalogue as our system has been their integrity, promptness, and honor with which we have of all times managed our difficult and onerous business.

IN OUR GIFTS OR ARBITRARY DIVIDENDS We share with customers the profits resulting from our sales of books at the regular retail prices—often below the regular retail prices—by allowing ARBITRARY DIVIDENDS of different values to each, and as the average retail price of books is full fifty per cent, more than their wholesale cost, where cash be paid, and the orders so large, as we are, we can thus establish, at every thousand sales, a list of books sold by us to divide JEWELRY, WATCHES, &c., graphical appearance is unexceptionable. It is destined, we think, to take its lead among what are termed family papers. All news venders have it throughout the United States and Canada for sale, and it is sold by canvassers in the people with whom it is a necessity.

The Sunday Press thus slinder to Smith's new story:

"* * * Mr. Smith is one of the most popular writers for the New York press. His pen is always wielded in behalf of the down-trodden and oppressed. This is the secret of his popularity and power as a story-writer: while he draws the characters of his story, as nature and circumstances make men and women, he never fails to inculcate truth, justice, and pure morality. The utensives circulation of such stories can not fail to do good."

The *Irish Americ*an says:

"Smith will surpass even the previous works of Mr. Smith will be pleased to learn that they are soon to have the gratification of perusing another story from his pen. The subject is one that can not fail to be effective in his hands. It is gratifying to find a man of his ability using the powers which God has given him to expose the wrongs of the helpless."

We clip a few more extracts from similar notices:

"If all story writers turned their talents to so good account as Francis S. Smith, there would be less a complain of in the works of fiction."

"He always portrays vice and virtue in their true light."

"It is one ever yet perused one of Smith's stories without being impressed with the importance of sin, and the happiness an upright course of conduct always confers."

"Like a skilful painter, he brings the characters before you in life-like proportions. You almost fancy that you have met them in your daily walks."

"Romance is a powerful engine for good or evil. We regret to say that it is too often made the vehicle for disseminating vice and immorality. With Mr. Smith, however, no such fault can be found. He has never written a line that a Christian father would hesitate to place before his children."

The subject chosen for this story is one that can not fail to interest every reader, and the author is a field in which Dickens has justly merited and well-deserved fame as a writer. That Mr. Smith will do it ample justice no one will doubt who has read his previous productions."

The announcement of a new story by Francis S. Smith has created a great stir among the newsmen. From what we gather from the rumors, we should not be surprised if the proprietor of the New York Weekly had such a demand on his resources as would stagger his enterprise. We know of no man now before the public as a writer equal to this talented author—at least one in the United States.

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY is now sold by nearly 1,000 Live Agents and Booksellers in all parts of the United States and British Provinces, and is sent by mail to all parts of the country for Three Cents.

SENATOR HALE, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE.

HON. JOHN P. HALE, a Senator from the State of New Hampshire, is one of the most prominent politicians and debaters in the present Congress of the United States; but the frigid etiquette of the "Upper House" has not succeeded (as the accompanying portrait shows) in banishing a genial expression of humor from his open countenance.

The Hales were among those men of iron will and stern determination who aided in founding the colonies of New England. Jonathan Hale (grandfather of the subject of this sketch) was a lawyer of marked ability, whose son John also followed the legal profession, and for years stood at the head of the bar at which he practiced. He married a Miss O'Brien, daughter of Captain Jeremiah O'Brien, who commanded the Americans at what has been called the "Lexington of the Seas."

When the news of the struggle with the mother country reached Machias, in Maine (then a province of Massachusetts), on the 9th of May, 1775, an armed British schooner, the Margaretta, was lying in port, with two sloops under her convoy, loading with lumber in behalf of the King's government. An attempt was made to capture the officers of the Margaretta while they were at church, but they escaped on board, weighed anchor, and dropped down the river. On the 11th a party of thirty-five volunteers was hastily collected, and, taking one of the lumber sloops, they made sail. The Margaretta, on observing their approach, weighed and crowded sail, to avoid a conflict; but the sloop proved to be a better sailer. As she approached, the schooner opened a fire with four light guns and fourteen swivels, to which the sloop replied with musketry, and soon the Americans boarded and captured the Margaretta. The loss of life in this affair was not very large, though twenty men on both sides are said to have been killed and wounded. It was the first blow struck on the water in the Revolutionary struggle, and it was characterized by a long chase, a bloody struggle, and a triumph.

There was originally no commander in the sloop, but, previously to engaging the Margaretta, Jeremiah O'Brien was selected for that station. Transferring the armament to a sloop, he engaged separately, and captured two English cruisers sent out from Halifax expressly to take him, and carried their crews as prisoners to Watertown, where the provincial Legislature of Massachusetts was then assembled. His gallantry was so generally admired, that he was appointed a captain in the marine of the colony, and afterward distinguished himself as a continental officer. Two of his brothers, uncles of Mrs. John P. Hale, senior, were also noted for their bravery.

John P. Hale, junior (the subject of this sketch), was born at Rochester, in the county of Strafford, New Hampshire, on the 31st of March, 1806, and there enjoyed such early educational advantages as the village school afforded. As he grew up, he was sent to the celebrated Phillips Academy at Exeter, where he was fitted for college under the preceptorship of Dr. Benjamin Abbott, who presided over that institution from 1788 to 1838, and counted among his pupils such men as Daniel Webster, Lewis Cass, Bushrod Washington, and Edward Everett.

Mr. Hale entered Bowdoin College in September, 1823, and graduated at that institution in 1827, with distinction as a scholar, and a high collegiate reputation as an original thinker, a logical reasoner, a ready debater, and a rare humorist. Among his contemporaries while in college, were Frank Pierce, Hawthorne, Longfellow, S. S. Prentiss, and the Rev. Professor Stowe.

After having graduated, Mr. Hale determined to follow the profession in which his father and his grandfather had distinguished themselves, and commenced in his native town the study of a science which has justly been styled the "perfection of reason." In the summer of 1828 he went to Dover (where he now resides), and entered the office of D. M. Christie, Esq., where he finished his studies, and was admitted to the bar in 1830. He looked at the law in a practical light, and when he commenced practice he rather chose to take a just, common-sense view of the cases intrusted to his care, than to hunt up musty authorities from which to eliminate subtle arguments. His winning manners, assiduous attention to business intrusted to his charge, and energetic pleadings, soon gained him a large practice, and afforded him frequent opportunities for the exhibition of his professional qualifications. So numerous were his clients that in 1834 he found himself obliged to take a partner, in order to carry on his business.

In 1832, Mr. Hale was elected to the Legislature of New Hampshire from Dover, and became prominently identified with the Democratic party. Yet the idea of blindly following the edicts of party leaders, or of submitting to party discipline, was never congenial to his feelings, neither would he permit himself to be diverted from the high path of duty which he had marked out.

General Jackson, in 1834, appointed Mr. Hale United States Attorney for the district of New Hampshire, a position well calculated to task his intellect and his legal attainments, but he discharged its onerous and exacting duties with marked ability and success. He was reappointed by President Van Buren, and was removed from office by President Tyler.

In March, 1843, Mr. Hale was nominated and elected to the United States House of Representatives, where a new scene opened itself to his mind. Signs in the political zodiac exhibited indications of a portentous character. He soon discerned that there was to be a struggle for supremacy between two sections of the Union, and lost no time in proclaiming himself a NORTHERN MAN.

He was renominated for Congress by the Democratic party of his district; but soon afterward (it was in January, 1845) he published a letter denouncing the annexation of Texas, which he had opposed from its first mention. The Democratic State Central Committee, considering this letter an unpardonable heresy, called a new convention in the district, at which Mr. Hale's nomination was reconsidered, and Mr. John Woodbury was nominated as the "regular Democratic candidate." A majority was required to elect, and there was "no choice" for all that Congress.

In 1846 Mr. Hale was again elected to the New Hampshire Legislature from the town of Dover, and was chosen Speaker of the House of Representatives. He presided with dignity and urbanity; and his independent, conscientious expression of opinion, in defiance of party mandate, gave him such a strong hold upon the popular sentiment, that the Legislature elected him United States Senator.

When Mr. Hale took his seat he was almost alone, and had to contest, single-handed, the political "giants in those days." Sometimes he was met with labored arguments, then subjected to bitter reproaches; at times those who were but "his peers" would affect almost to ignore his presence, and again they would mercilessly denounce him as advocating doctrines dangerous to the liberties of the Republic. But the Senator from New Hampshire was not to be intimidated, or diverted from what he considered to be his duty. Adopting the guerrilla tactics, he manfully held his ground, and with felicitous humor, pungent retort, or keen sarcasm, made an impression upon the phalanx against which he had to contend. So high were his aims, and so conciliating were his manners, that before the close of his senatorial term Mr. Hale had beaten down the barriers of prejudice, and fairly conquered sectional discourtesy. He was thus not only the standard-bearer, but the pioneer of the North in the Senate.

At the expiration of Mr. Hale's senatorial term in 1853, the Democrats were in the ascendency in New Hampshire, and Mr. Atherton was elected United States Senator. Mr. Hale, thus released from the responsibilities of office, resumed the practice of his profession, and devoted himself to the duties of his private relations. He was, however, frequently called upon to address public meetings, and his speeches were characterized by the same vigor and ability which had distinguished his senatorial career.

difficulties of public life, was urged by numerous friends in New York to locate himself in that city for the practice of his profession. So brilliant were the inducements that he reluctantly, and against the wishes of his home friends, commenced practice in the commercial metropolis. But he retained his house at Dover, where his family continued to reside, where his poll-tax was paid, and where he was run as a candidate for the State Legislature. His professional reputation immediately gained him clients, but the party claimed his services, and he was forced back into the political arena.

In 1855 he was again elected to the United States Senate from this State of New Hampshire, and it is unnecessary here to record his career, or his advocacy of those principles for which he so boldly contended when single-handed as now when supported by a large number of Senators. Yet he assumed no leadership, claims no prominence, but is content to advance, shoulder to shoulder, with those who last on a few years since were to be found in the ranks of his opponents.

Senator Hale is especially attentive to his constituents, and never neglects their interests for practice in the Supreme Court or other private business. He is nevertheless ever prompt to address public assemblages on subjects in which he takes an interest. The sullen will never forget his efforts in procuring an abolition of flogging in the United States navy, in consequence in which they presented him with a gold medal.

From the commencement of Senator Hale's career up to the present time he has been the leading advocate of whatever he viewed as powerful for good, as calculated to meliorate the condition of man, or as likely to advance the political interests of the American Union, without prejudice to the rights of the section which he represented. He has ever been refused to bow before counter-political images, or to stumble for place in the arena of party, but he has ever strolled in the pathway of the over burden of duty his friends counsel him to bear.

In person Senator Hale is burly, bluff-looking, with a clear eye, and a hearty grasp of the hand for his friends. His colloquial powers are of a splendid order, and he is a rare humorist, genial, munificent, and liberal. He laughs with the foibles and shortcomings of the world—not at them; and his laugh is pure and silvery. Married in early life to Miss Lucy H. Lamprell, of Berwick, Maine (a lady who combines rare attainments of mind, beauty of character, and personal charms), she has ever found his highest happiness in his own domestic circle, which is now graced by two accomplished daughters just budding into womanhood. The evening spent with this estimable family is an event to be remembered with pleasure.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, APRIL 24, 1858.

THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.

MR. BENJAMIN seems to have given this measure its quietus. The Senate may, of course, reconsider the vote by which it referred further consideration of Senator Gwin's bill till December next, but it is not likely. Small as the majority was in favor of Mr. Benjamin's motion, it is one of those majorities which time is likely to swell.

One very striking fact is apparent on a glance at the division which took place on the questions. All the aspirants to the Presidency voted against deferring the bill; both Republican and Democratic candidates for the White House registered their votes in favor of proceeding with the subject forthwith. The bonds of sympathy did not contain one name which is likely to suggest itself for the present, to any successful canvass; and, in fact, the Presidential "platforms" of all political parties are now identical on the question, all concur in giving their standard-bearers to the construction of the Pacific Railroad.

How, then, does it happen that the Senate so unceremoniously throws overboard this "plank," which forms a part of all political platforms?

Of course, the deficiency in the Treasury occurs as the most obvious reply. The United States Government is in the market as a borrower. It pays more for its money than the brokers of Wall or the first-class merchants of South Street. It is not likely to grow rich in a hurry, for the receipts are falling off prodigiously, in consequence of the retrenchment in expenditures and the curtailment of importations. Under the circumstances, this ought to be reason enough for the refusal of Congress to embark in a new enterprise which is likely to cost a couple of years' income.

But it is to be feared that there is yet another reason for the postponement of the consideration of the Senate. A Pacific Railroad is a magnificent project to ventilate in the press and on the stump. It is certain to command the enthusiastic approval of the people of California, Oregon, and the States bordering on the Mississippi. The very name of the thing evokes visions of fat contracts, a prospect by no means unpleasing to politicians of any party. No wonder, then, that the managers of all parties have made a rule of adopting the scheme as part of their programmes.

But to build the road is a very different matter. The enterprise itself is without example in the history of public works. It could only be likened to the great Wall of China, or the Pyramids of Egypt, which were built by compulsory labor. The great military roads of Russia, which are exhausting the means of the Empire, are bagatelles in comparison. It would require an army of workmen to build it, an army of soldiers to protect them while at work, and an army of settlers to see that the Indians did not tear up the rails when they were laid. Every foot of iron laid on the deserts, and every ton of Pennsylvania or Maryland coal burned on the locomotives would be as costly, in proportion to the labor cost required, by General Johnston's force—which costs $100 a barrel. Of the expenses of building the road there would be little, although the official estimate of a hundred millions would fall short at least by one-third of the sum which, judging from the cost of our railroads in the new States, would be required to place the enterprise in working order; but, if the road were finished right, the millions spent on it would not matter. No return could ever be expected; even in the Atlantic States no railways pretend to pay dividends which have not a large way traffic.

There is, however, another and a greater difficulty than any of these. There is a strong and a growing prejudice—based on thorough experience—against governments embarking in works of construction or improvement. We do not now allude to the constitutional question whether such works fall legitimately within the scope of the functions of our governments. We refer to the general opinion that whenever a government undertakes to build a road or to make a canal the work badly, and is tremendously cheated into the bargain. This has been the experience of the United States Government in the construction of vessels of war, and in works of internal improvements in a score of places. It has been the experience of the State Governments of New York and Pennsylvania in their canals. It has been the experience of every large government which has ever built or dug. Experience teaches that, in this country, at all events, Governments are not fitted to undertake works of extensive enterprise. This is the reason to suppose that the Pacific Railroad would prove an exception to the rule.

Of course no one will be understood as considering these objections finally fatal to the scheme. An Atlantic telegraph seemed a marvelous absurdity a few years since. And a few years hence all the difficulties in the way of an intercoastal road may be overcome. But they are quite valuable enough at present to justify a prudent administration in evading the responsibility of undertaking the enterprise, and beginning it as a legacy to their successors.

This is not the place to inquire into the relative merits of the various routes for a road from the Pacific to the Mississippi. There can be no doubt, should the road ever be undertaken, but that a branch or the main feature will be San Francisco on the one side and New York on the other. The best route therefore would appear to be that one which, from the nature of the country will permit to be built as nearly as possible to a straight line between New York and San Francisco. And whatever considerations may be made by sectional interests to such a route, the common sense of the country would probably have insist on its being adopted, were Congress prepared to undertake the work.

BANK UNION.

THE New York Herald has been urgently pressing on the attention of the city banks the expediency to some sort of union or association, with a view to the adoption of a policy in the event of future financial disturbance.

The difficulty in the way of such an incorporation seems to be the old and well-known influences which a bank consolidation would sacrifice. We have here between fifty and sixty banks, each of which has a president and a cashier. Each of these presidents and cashiers conceives himself to be better acquainted with the business of banks, and to have more skillful financier, than any of his rivals. Each wields, in his particular sphere, an amount of power which he would be very loth to resign. Hence, as a bank consolidation would consign to obscurity at least nine out of ten of the bank managers, it seems almost certain that any immense majority of that body would resist any change which would tend towards consolidation.

This is the argument against bank union. On the other hand, the public interest would unquestionably be greatly subserved by some sort of association among the banks. The existing rivalry is the cause of all the disasters which befall the money market. Each one of these makes bad debts in order to secure business. If the city banks were agreed upon some general rule of action, on what seem called for, as events were—as they are now—compelled to pursue a certain line of policy in consequence of the course of the remaining eighth, it is not likely that they would be any the less successful as pecuniary enterprises, and it is certain that they would do business with infinitely less risk.

As the case is at present, our fifty odd banks are striving incessantly to cut each other's throats. They are irreconcilably hostile to each other, and have a direct interest in each other's failure. Hence, when hard times come, each bank concerns itself not only about its own safety, but about the damage to be done to its neighbors. Such a bank is conscious that the losses it suffers by reverses are the far greater troubles which have befallen its neighbor. It calculates that these disasters will lend a certain number of depositors to its counter. Four or five large banks, by their weight and influence, impose the law upon all the others. A day's discount from any one may for how foolishly—all the other city banks must do the same or lose their customers. This was the principal cause of the commercial crisis which last year. If those great banks contract, all the other banks must do the same for safety's sake.

It appears that there is a great deal of good sense in the suggestion of the Herald, that the banks sh ould avail themselves of the present panic—the misery and stagnation of business—to extend the urtial association now existing at the Clearin, house to their entire business. So many of them, indeed, during the trying times of last , the great banks of England and France ca to the commercial community of those countries for more effectively than our fifty odd little c ncerns did here. It is a settled point that we have a great future before here. But there s no reason why our banks should not organize a mutual association, which would improve their future operations; and we shall be glad to hear that they have some such scheme under consideration.

ARE WE TO HAVE MASKED BALLS?

MR. ULLMAN, the impresario of the Academy of Music, seems to have got into a sea of trouble by his announcement that he intended to give a masked ball during the season of the prescient Mozart. The announcement of masked balls seems to have been a signal for a number of musical batteries to open upon him. Justice Welch has fulminated a sort of firman against any such scandal. Superintendent of Police Carpenter has declared that our immaculate Police will suffer no such infraction of the laws. And our truly moral Legislature, fresh from the consideration of lobby jobs, has passed an Act which will expose Mr. Ullman—as in case he perseveres in his design—if not to the penalty of fine and imprisonment which he runs, were he even a manager, would highly court. So that, on the whole, the prospect is decidedly adverse to any masked balls in New York this season.

Let us think for one. In Paris, at the Academy of Music, among a people bred to that sort of thing, and in a locality into which no public conveyances but private coaches can be had, masked balls may be given without danger. Here, under those favorable circumstances, they are productive of an amount of vice which is frightful to contemplate. In this city they would be very different affairs. No tariff of prices would exclude persons whose presence would taint the gambling-houses and disreputable scene. All the prize-fighters and the fancy; all that loose, idle, and disorderly youth which mingles in the gambling-houses and other improper places; all the women who have lost every thing that is worth preserving; all the pickpockets and jail-birds; and, generally, all that class of the population whom it is ruin to meet, would infallibly collect in great force at a public masked ball given in this city. Under cover of the mask and disguise, things would be said which would almost bring a blush to the cheeks of the marble figures on the outside of the Academy. Licentiousness and brutality—the peculiar characteristics of our rowdy population —would not be the only nuisance enjoyed. Personal dialogue, witty repartee, amusing mystification—all that forms the charm of masked balls elsewhere, would be wanting: in their stead the spectator would discover nothing but what he may see any night in the under-ground dancing-cellars of Water Street.

If it be true, as many believe, that we are gradually progressing in morality and intelligence, there may come a time when masked balls may be safely attempted here. When we can hear Governors invited with formal ceremony, and when native rowdyism is under some semblance of restraint, it may be possible to venture upon a masked ball without fear of a moral earthquake. But at present the thing is impossible, and a prudent manager will not attempt it.

PHOTOGRAPHIC PORTRAITS.

MR. BRADY, the great photographer of this city and of Washington, has initiated a new feature in the photographic art. He has begun to publish photographic likenesses of eminent individuals. These likenesses resemble steel engravings; differing from them only in their superior fidelity to nature. Their cost is the same. Already he has begun his series with a portrait of the Reverend Archbishop Hughes; he proposes to continue it with the late Colonel Benton (of whom we give an admirable likeness in our last Number), and to keep it up for some time, publishing a portrait a week. The subscriber to Mr. Brady's photographic gallery of portraits will thus be enabled to cover the walls of his library with reliable likenesses of the most eminent Americans of the day at a very moderate cost.

While we trust Mr. Brady will be as successful as he deserves, and indeed doubt not but he will find his new branch as profitable as the former one, we can not forbear contrasting the cost of his gallery of portraits with that which is presented to the subscribers of Harper's Weekly. We do not hesitate to say that our portraits will not yield to Mr. Brady's in point of accuracy and finish. They are invariably drawn by the first artist—in that line—in this country; they are engraved by the most practiced and skilful engravers of portraits; they are printed on as superior paper as illustrations have been printed in the United States. As a general rule, their fidelity as likenesses and their merit as works of art are admitted by all. They appear, on an average, in every number of the paper. Thus, the subscriber to Harper's Weekly will obtain, for two dollars and a half, a series of fifty-two portraits of eminent men, as choice and perfect as Mr. Brady's, for one-half the cost of one of Brady's photographs. We need not add that, in addition to the portrait, he will have, every week, a biographical sketch of one or more eminent men, together with the best stories, essays, poetry, and the illustrated news of the world. It may still be questioned whether two and a half dollars ever procured for any one so much instruction, entertainment, and wholesome reading.

THE USURY LAWS NULLIFIED AT LAST.

ONE must friends in the Legislature, who have so strenuously contended for the last modification of the Usury Laws, seem to have been entrapped into repealing them unawares. The Act legalizing time transactions in stocks, which obtained a large majority in the Senate and Assembly, defeats the Usury Laws as completely as any one could desire. For our reason we believe that its framers and supporters had this end far more directly in view than the suppression of Wall street stock-gambling.

For instance; A B desires to borrow ten thousand dollars of C D. Usury at the time is worth 12 per cent. Up to the passage time, however A B and C D managed the transaction, as was always in the power of any landed usurer when the debt became due; and many rogues did so with perfect success. Now, then, A B wants ten thousand dollars. He goes through the following operation: He will buy ten thousand Virginias, Missouria, or Tennessees, and sell to C D, at a very low given price; he will, at the same time, buy them back of C D on time, at an advance in price calculated to give C D a full interest on his capital. He will thus obtain the use of the money he requires, and C D will get the interest that he limits justly.

In this manner the absurd restrictions on trade created by the Usury Laws may be evaded. Until common sense shall prevail enough for the entire repeal of these laws this compromise must be accepted as a boon. The members of the Legislature are entitled to public gratitude.

We are informed that the Corliss Steam-Engine Company have contracted to introduce their improvements in steam-engines into the steamer Fulton and the New York, and that a fine illustration was lately given in this journal.

CRIME IN NEW YORK.

THE Congress of the United States, as the Legislature for the District of Columbia, have at length been roused to action by the frequency of riots, murders, and the crime of perjury within the precincts of the Federal capital. They are in the act of passing very thorough measures for the vindication of the laws and the repression of rowdyism. This help comes not a day too soon.

Can the same example be followed in this city? For many days past the average of reported murders has been one per day. Many of these cases of homicide have been accompanied by circumstances of peculiar brutality. Some of them have resembled the case of Mr. Swanson, who was murdered by a young villain who had never seen him before the moment he laid him in the dust. All these cases demonstrated the utter inefficiency of the police to preserve the peace of the city and to execute the laws against crime.

The worst feature in our social system is the difficulty of punishing obvious guilt. The only fault that we find in the community is from the newspapers. But for the press it is doubtful whether any crimes would ever be avenged. When the District Attorney publishes a harrowing account of a murder—as they do about six times a week in these times—the police are covered into confusion by, and, after a moment's outcry, certain arrests are made. Generally speaking, the persons arrested are the criminals. It is after the arrest that the difficulties begin. In the first place, blunders are apt to be made in commitments, and Judges are prone to accept bail when they ought to do nothing of the kind. Then, when prisoners are brought up for trial, juries are sure to disagree; and if by any accident a jury should be empaneled which contains no bigoted co-religionist or compatriot of the prisoner, who will vote to acquit him in the teeth of any evidence, the prosecuting officer or the Judge is quite certain to make some blunder which will offend the Supreme Court on opportunity of ordering a new trial. If, after all, the criminal should be convicted, a weak or ignorant Governor is sure to commute his sentence, or to pardon him altogether.

Governor Clark, after a very creditable performance of the gubernatorial function, ruined his fame by a general jail delivery on resigning his office. Governor King has not waited for the term of his official career to defeat the ends of justice. If he had done no other act during his Governorship, his commutation of the sentence of death passed on M'Connell, the convicted murderer of an old woman under the circumstances of unparalleled atrocity, would exclude him from the list of Governors of whom New York may be proud.

THE LOUNGER.

MUSARD, JUN.:

FOR, although Musard, père, no longer conducts an orchestra, we have no right to assume that he does not live, nor deprive him of the glory of his proper honours.

As for the young man, such a very loud blast was blown upon the trumpet of many types — the fact of his "world-wide" celebrity was insisted upon in such cephid letters — and the universal acclamation of Paris, while he played balls and cockerels with his orchestra, and its profound respect and despair when he delightedly deserted the Hotel d'Osmond for Irving Place, were so vividly described — that the sentient Lounger who fulfilled his duty as newspaper, and believes it — who also reads physbills, and believes them sometimes — was delighted, in the midst of the thunder, "If the French gentleman is so very famous, and if Paris, sans Musard, is Paris no longer, how happens it that I have never can knowledge of him is so limited?" There are, at the most moderate calculation, a million persons in New York who have been in Paris, and we might, therefore, seem to have some right to know something of the colossal reputation. But, apparently, Lennox, the Mission were overlaid with Musard. Musard came in suspicious contact with private houses. Musard wrenched the advertising columns of the newspapers. Musard fared and flamed upon the dead wall. Musard stood, at Goupil's, in the shop-windows and in the illustrated papers; and finally, Musard sank-ship, for the Concerts Musard and the Bal Masqué Musard, were hung temptingly before the longing eyes of young New York.

Now, if an obscure fact in the career of a distinguished company in full dress is marshalled and ushered by solemn lackeys in livery into the full dining-room where beef-steak and onions are served upon gold plate. It is good eating; but if you get out for the full dress, the lackeys, and the gold plate, what are you to do for the larks' tongues and nebulæ?

Some years since the Lounger was in London, where Mr. Hokey, a very second-rate French composer, had, in company with Mr. Jullien's success, just perpetrated an opera, founded upon Shakespeare, called La Jeunesse de Henri Cinq. Jullien's June, and the height of the London season; and at her Majesty's Opera-house, where the new work was produced, a gayer band of musical critics could not be found. A drove was loosed from the gallery; there were verses of welcome to Hokey and Parodi!

M. Musard, Jun., is the sole conductor of a fine orchestra which plays in the Hotel d'Osmond, in Paris, and at the Grand Opera during the carnival balls. He composes grotesque quadrilles for his concerts and balls are attended by the demi-monde of Paris. The company, where this class of "society" — no half and half — where there are no bal mariquis — there is promenade concert is not comprehended — M. Musard, Jun., is the conductor of a fine orchestra.

"Then all there is of it," Musard's music, as such, is not attractive. The grotesqueness of it has been introduced by Jullien in a triumphant manner, leaving to Musard, if he be not ignorant of the idea, "only that and nothing more." Jullien's ear essentially grotesque composer, and the magnificent conductor for the performance of the best music in the world, and a most amusing harlequin and charlatan in his mysterious, and at times terrific grotesque manic. Jullien standing in front, with that coat, that waistcoat, that shirt, that collar, that neck-tie, those curls, those gloves — Jullien patting, and pointing, and springing, and squatting, and triumphantly flourishing into arms, like a sweet, and splendid mass of swell-tailoring, into a gorgeous crimson sash — Jullien was himself the most grotesque test of the performance, when it was "Herman's Quadrille," or "An Affectionate Quadrille;" and when the music was itself good, as on the banks of Zohn and Beethoven nights, his conducting was so admirable that his personality was pardonable. Then, too, Jullien had a genuinely popular talent. His Prima Donna Waltz and Katerini Polka were favorites from the first moment they were heard. Shall we forget, too, his soloists?

The Lounger remembers these things simply in justice to Jullien. If M. Musard will give concerts of the best kind — of which, of mingled symphonies, overtures, polkas, and waltzes — he will find them the most popular. But a very little overture and a great deal of mouving and tossing, and rubrocal clatter, may extort a languid smile, but it will not attract an audience. The public may be a very great ass, but you must be very careful how you treat it as such. The concert on the first evening ought to have opened the ears of Young Paris to Napoleon to several things. The only hearty and universal applause followed Stallenge's playing. There was a suspicious sound of claque in all the rest where it was continuous or noisy; and there was no foundation of an unanimous kick at a solitary instance of the programme.

The Lounger, however, of the morning papers were very generous next day. But if some one of them would try the experiment of a Pre-Raphaelite style of description and criticism of musicals and other performances, the tale of his paper would be immensely increased on the following first appearance. How many thousands of people opened the papers to find out whether Musard was a success! And how many of them did read it?

THE OPENING NIGHT.

THERE is something fascinating, and in "a private view." We all hurry with eager pleasure to our own opening. It is so delightful to be distinguished from "the public" — that dull, dark mass, which is so abused, flattered, and denounced, to which every lady smiles, and writes, and of whose judgment every body is skeptical.

The private lecture, as distinguished from the public, of the National Academy, came through a pelting rain, and crowded the rooms of the Gallery. They were brilliantly lighted, and the air tapestried with pictures; music played in the long hall; every body looked cheerful and happy; there were all kinds of notable people, some of them poor and on the walls. There was crowding, and chattering, and laughing, and squeezing, and admiring, and rejoicing. Old friends came suddenly on each other, and acquaintances jostled; lovers went about hinted, and silently pressed; and authors looked indifferent; and young women, situated with friendly ease, looked as cheerily calm as if all worldly wishes were gratified. Early on the festival was Bigham, Nestor of Academicians — although we believe his relations with the Academy have been interrupted. The contemplative President, Durand, the gallant Huntington, the author of the disheveled locks; brisk Cafferty; Rossiter, with flowing locks; the calm Kensett; gentleman Darley; Secretary Richards; and Cropsey, the busy servants of beauty who spread every year fresh brilliant wreaths.

Of course, in a crowd and by gas-light, pictures look their best — But next week, when the Academy will have been visited and its works familiar, we will talk of them together. If any Gostics and Chadsleys, if the Gallitt Knights, if Sir Joshuas, if any Titians and Vandycks, are lying perdus upon the walls, we will try and discover them.

Yes, and if patience and pure impartibility — if delicacy, fidelity, honour, and grace — are hidden, as we vainly, here, we will try and find them, and applaud; not asking that any man shall be praised for any one that deserves to-day shall be duly three hundred years ago.

A SIMPLE QUESTION.

WHEN a hundred or two of the leading citizens of New York allow their names to be published as the committee of a ball, it is disgusting to see in all that the ball ends in the wildest riot and loss of property?

The Hunter Woodis festival is over, and a cloud of ridicule and shame rests upon it. But there will be scores more of these festivals, and they will be aided by advertisements supported by solid citizens' names. Then these names will be of the kind usually called "respectable;" yet every body will understand that the ball will be a disgraceful, and a dangerous riot. Every body will also understand that he ventures into it as a hunter ventures into the woods, and must be prepared to defend himself. He must expect to receive kicks and blackings, and to be at their mercy. He must expect to have his pockets picked, and his clothes torn off. All the Hons. and the Regs. who sign the committee will be probably lent their names to grace an indecent row.

Now the simple question is this: Is it impossible to have a ball without endangering the public city? Is it not perfectly notorious that the police are afraid of the rascals, and that the rascals know it?

At the Hunter Woodis Ball the Lounger learns that a gentleman's wife was sent to a policeman the man who had struck him, and had been trying to kick him, and said, "Please, sir, don't dare to kick him!" At the same moment the bully squared off before the officer, as much as to say, "Touch me, and I'll spoil that face of yours, in just try it on!" The gallant officer, of course, sneaked away.

Are democratic governments and civic disorder irresponsible? If the thousand policemen can not keep the city in order, why not have a thousand and? Why not have a standing army, if police decency will be laid upon other terms? Do you think that would be a despotism? Well; but why not have a despotism of good order as well as a despotism of riot? At this moment the police is not a "corps man" in New York who does not live on city corruption. He does not dare to do what he pleases to do, and despise the police as a pack of old women.

It is not altogether the fault of the police. For if they are weak in numbers they know it, and must behave accordingly.

Some years since, Punch proposed, as a prevent tive of railway disasters, that every locomotive should carry a director, strapped on in front. In like manner, let it be a rule that every "respectable" gentleman connected with the success of Hunter Woodis Balls is to go and serve as a policeman, and we have hope for less riot and drunkenness of those festive occasions.

MOUNT VERNON — GOING — GONE!

MR. EVERETT has been delivering his Washington oration in the Southern cities, and as he is thus about completing the tour of the country with his oratorical effort to secure the home of Washington, it seems that the object is about to be attained.

Mr. John A. Washington, the present proprietor of Mount Vernon, has written a letter to the ladies with whom Mr. Everett acts, and states that he has been willing to dispose of the estate only to Virginia or the United States. That was very natural and proper — provided they would pay enough. But he adds that the events of recent years show that neither of these "parties" desire the purchase. Under such circumstances, he continues, he is leaving that, after the two highest powers in our country (namely, Virginia and the United States), the women and the private guardians of such a spot, why, he is willing to hear proposals from the women. The ladies and Mr. Everett have now nothing to do but to offer sufficient money, and Mount Vernon is theirs.

It is a great pity that the home and tomb of George Washington should be exposed in the public market of this country, and shall be secured only by money skillfully talked out of the people. Congress every year wastes ten times as much as would have bought Mount Vernon, and made it a national possession entirely unique. What if Mr. John A. Washington should sell it to the very highest price? What is a high price for Americans to pay for Mount Vernon? It might have been had for a hundred thousand dollars, probably.

Now nay it is to dip into a pocket because an author unwilling to sell, and a public purchaser may have had some human characteristics; and how very hard to expect a cent in practical testimony of respect for the greatest American!

STOP THAT BALL.

MR. POLICE-JUSTICE WELSH has been acquaintance Napoleon Ulman, of the Grand Opera, "with the merest thread of the slightest acquaintance" on the subject of the public masquerades. The law decrees that they must not be. Mrs. Grundy may remain all the year round, and shake the trees — it false nose. The natural width of the black silk will never peep through dominos to disarm. The majesty of the law commands Terpsichore to unmask.

But we should be delighted to hear the learned Justice more at length upon "the moral sentiment of the community" in favour of any subject. We should be glad to know what are the more prominent symptoms of any moral sentiment at all. How — before there is a moral sentiment at present in this metropolis — its absence is to be ascertained. Whether the moral sentiment against any other fraud than the is severe reprehension of masked balls. Whether the moral sentiment is to be sought in the board of brokers. Whether it takes cognizance of every crime or of a private peculiarity of crime. Whether it is over strain at a gnat and swallows a caravan of camels.

MUSIC ABROAD.

WHILE we have among us so many good singers and musicians, we must not suppose that music is utterly silent. Tamberlik, the great tenor, even now is living, has just achieved "an extraordinary triumph" at the Italian Opera in Paris. He has been for some time absent in Brazil. Mr. Anthony has returned to Europe. Mr. Bristow, with a new prima donna, Mademoiselle Theresa Hamburg; another new prima donna, Mademoiselle Lucieni; and a fresh baritone, Signor Malvisi. Upon the last, as the most important, Fofo Signorelli — whose earliest characters are said to be her love Antonio Spezia and Ortolani, and Signor Giuglini, Bellini, etc. Giuglini is a very great favorite, and has saved an Italian translation of Balfe's Bohemian Girl, which was about to be ridiculous singing. Besides Rosati and Marie Taglioni; Mr. Anthony will enrich his ballet with Anetta Grahn, a new dancer from Vienna, who is not related to the late victim of the guillotine. Miss Louisa Pyne and Mr. Harrison, who have sung delightfully in London, and Mr. Harrison, her tenor, has been undergoing double exercise.

The new Opera House at Covent Garden is to open on the 15th of May. The architect is Mr. Barry, who is the designer of the new houses of Parliament. The exterior dimensions of the building will be 200 feet in height, 122 feet broad, and 240 feet long, about two thirds of the size of that in Milan. There will be three tiers of boxes, and an amphitheatre above the third tier. There will be a fourth arcade of glass and iron extending the entire length of the building, a chapel adjacent to the Crystal Saloon Flower-market, which will be lighted upon open nights for a promenade. Signor Mongini, a Welsh singer, and Mr. Lover are drawing crowds to Rory O'Moore, singing "William Tell." His prima donna is Miss Pyne. Signor Bosio is engaged for the New York, who is called "a good and careful singer, although some people think her delicient in expression."

A REGRET.

SOME time since the Lounger mentioned that Mr. Bryant had not been elected one of the Regents of the University. Although it was very difficult to find any man more peculiarly fitted, in every way, for such a post. But there were "political considerations" and they were always the out of argument.

At the last meeting, however, to fill a vacancy made by the death of Mr. Gelig, of Canandaigua, Mr. Bryant was elected. Such an appointment honors the man, perhaps, but certainly much a man honors the office. Mr. Bryant is not only one of our most illustrious authors, but one of our best citizens. He has never held that his literary talents and abilities gave him peculiar claims upon him for other duties as a citizen of a republic. His life has always illustrated the great truth — which every scholarly American should never forget, but which is nevertheless generally forgotten by scholars — that every man in this country, just in the degree of his intelligence, cultivation, and character, owes duties to his country which it is treasonable for him to shirk and omit.

Since there sometimes a peculiar regret expressed that so noble a post should also be a politician, and so deeply interested in public affairs. But it is because such men as he so often neglect politics that the word "politician" becomes a by-word of meanness. Aaron Milton was not less a politician he was a working patriot. Irving and Bancroft, who are not less distinguished as scholars and men of letters because they have filled high offices of trust. The poet or the author is no longer a minstrel sitting below the throne. He is a harranger and Diclem, is a power for base politicians to fear. His influence is the want of personal skill, ity kept him out of office. But his fidelity to his political convictions made him peculiarly the patriot of France.

BONCONI.

SINCE Mr. Napoleon Ulman has been officially informed that he must not give his masquerades — and how they would inevitably end every sensible citizen knows — and since M. Musard, with his grotesque orchestra, and his grotesque carpets, and and inverted servants, and hot coffee, and ice-creams have failed to make a successful impression upon the public mind — why should not Mr. Edmund Bonconi Napoleon give us a short season of Rouconi, the greatest of living singers? Bonconi is now singing in Philadelphia, where they praise his acting and his not praise his singing. But with Madame La Grange and Formes and Rosati and Bertucini, what a performance of Don Pasquale we might have — the best level opera-company, and the finest Opera, perfectly sung, would soon take the taste of Beef and Mutton Quadrilles out of our mouths!

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

— C. A. P., Iron Mines, Jefferson County, in the Lounger with a complimentary sonnet, and adds to it, "I am unique."

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER. — Please don't let your modesty prevent you from publishing this, for it is all true, every word of it, and I hope you will be tried before a jury of your readers if it is not so."

But the Lounger shrinks from the trial. He only ventures to express two of the lines:

"Therefore twice welcome is your page of sprightly wit and song,
When on the door-mat of our minds you wipe your feet so long."

"DEAR LOUNGER. — I am persuaded it is good to have an Art Convention, because the artists ought to know what they want, and undoubtedly do. I weighed when I heard that there were to be two conventions, and if it was only to give their countenance, for the time has not yet arrived, when the public can be left entirely to itself to decide whether we shall have an American School of Art or not — and there is no doubt that the advertisements in all but the Fine Arts. We do not apprehend the vast importance which would attach a proper organization of this subject, or the necessity of impressing the views of our practical artists upon the public mind, inasmuch as there is among us American School there are some who would not be willing to see such a school, but it is not to such, but unto the citizens generally, we must look for encouragement and support. We need show them that in no department of art is there a difficiency of merit which is not found in the works of some ever pressed a broader field for action, or possessed in a greater amount of material, that to us better way can we elevate our nation to an universality of position than by cultivating a true taste for the refining influence of art, and liberally encouraging the artist. It is true we should also discover that slowly the public taste has been strongly developed in favor of any thing of foreign importation, however inferior to that of home talent. We need but attend the Apollo exhibitions, and mark the eagerness with which Ethiopian performers are received, to be convinced of this fact. them, when they are acknowledged to be inferior to the works of our own native artists; while the latter are striving to thoroughly forgive that our painters are compelled to visit Europe to complete their studies, and that originality and become mere imitators, which is derogatory to the development of true American genius. We therefore hail the Convention cordially, in the hope that it will result in the establishment of a School of Art, and a more patriotic taste we may greet our long productive artists, and the conviction that it is a cause of congratulation to those who are truly interested, and be an honor to the nation."

— The Lounger sympathizes most heartily with his old friend V. de V., but he does not find in the Academy of Design and Academy of Fine Arts any kind have ever really helped its development. You can not make a school of art as you make a pair of shoes. In this country, at this moment, there are artists who are full of purpose, and who unite genius with study, and imagination, there will generally be an American school of art. And if you regard a convention of artists as an infusion of the conscientious of that spirit, then you may look for a school of art, but not otherwise. The facilities of study are abundant, and the public taste is every day more than balanced by the conventional standard of excellence in criticism. The tendency of the Academic influence is constantly to mechanical, not to imaginative or intellectual excellence; so that an "Academic" picture is usually a dull, cold, and careful performance. Nor must we put the cart before the horse. The public taste will follow, and not lead — national art. It is with art as with literature. Its superiority must be span out of the individual.

— J. L., Quebec, wishes to know how high or how low dresses may be worn. Just as high and as low as modesty will permit.

— A CHERRYCT poet leads off in this brisk style:

"DEAR MR. LOUNGER. — I have noticed that you are always ready to record the sentiments of others. Do you know of any sentiment better than the following?

"Should auld acquaintance be forgot
And never brought to mind?"

and several verses follow. But the Lounger is happy to join in the refrain of the song —

"Rise! rise! rise!"

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXXI.

Ephesus.—The Theatre.—Demetrius the Silversmith.—Scale of the Seven Churches.—Tyria.—Arrival at Philadelphia.—The City.—The Bishop.—The Successors of Paul and Gaius.—Sleep.—A wise Churchman.

Of the Ephesus that you have read and heard so much of, little now remains. In vain did we search for the temple of Diana, or even its ruins. Nothing whatever is there that one could by the utmost stretch of imagination make conform to our ideas of that grand fane that was once justly a wonder of the world.

But there is a ruin that possesses perhaps more interest to the Christian traveler than would the walls of the great temple.

In most of the ruins of ancient cities are found the seats and sometimes the walls of theatres. These were generally very massive structures, often dug in the sides of hills, or built on the most solid foundations. Hence where every other vestige of an old city has been carried away, it is not uncommon to meet with the sweeping circles of a theatre, silent, ruinous, melancholy, the more so that the place was accustomed to be the most gay and brilliant of all the public places in the city.

There are here, in much grandeur, remains of a theatre, which is probably that same one into which the people rushed with the cry, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" and in which Demetrius the silversmith made his attack on Paul, and stirred up the people against him. It is perhaps the only spot among the ruins of Ephesus at which the traveler feels any inclination to pause and recall the past.

The scene is before you. I will not endeavor to picture it as it came up to my imagination. But we found ourselves oftener in the theatre than in any other part of the desolation that once was Ephesus.

By-the-way, can you imagine the connection between the modern name of Ephesus, Ayasolouk, and the Greek words Αγιος Θεολογος? Because some persons say that the former is derived from the latter, and I am puzzled to detect the resemblance.

Miss Grandison was ill for a day or two during our stay at the city of Diana, and we used the time to discuss our route for the future. The tour of the Seven Churches would involve a complete circuit around Smyrna. A glance at the map will show you this. But we had some uncertainty as to whether it was best to go to Laodicea direct from Ephesus, or to go first to Philadelphia and thence to Laodicea, returning by the same route. We decided on the latter course, from the fact that the southern road was pronounced dangerous, and we heard of several robberies committed within the past month, which, with a lady in the company, it became us to avoid.

I must beg of you, if you would understand my route, to refer to a map of Asia Minor before going on with this letter. You will then see where Philadelphia and Laodicea lie with reference to Ephesus, and what I shall write hereafter will be more intelligible to you.

It is entirely impossible for me, in these letters, to give you even an outline of our journeyings. You may have before you our caravan, and that being fixed in your mind you must imagine the rest.

We have six large camels of the splendid breed of Smyrna, six mules, stout and sleek, and our horses and those of our attendants. Altogether we are fourteen persons—one, you know, is a lady. We have four tents, and the usual quantity of luggage.

Our camp at Ephesus was broken up on a sunshiny morning, and traveling along the bank of the Kaister through fields of grain and orchards of Eastern fruits, we reached Tyria in the evening, and rested there for the night. A false alarm of robbers in the night. John Steenburger distinguished himself by a valiant assault on one of the mules. The mule had, on the whole, the best of it. This was the chief incident of the way to Philadelphia, which we reached on the third day, in the afternoon.

THE INFIDELS AT BAY.

The city of brotherly love derived its name from Attalus Philadelphus, though who was the brother that Attalus loved I confess to you I am unable to say. My classical memory serves me no farther. I have an impression on my mind that he was brother to that Eumenes of Pergamus whose library rivaled that of Alexandria. But the history of his city sank into insignificance before that interest which attached to the city of the days of John. One ray of light from the sublime revelation of Patmos extinguishes the glory of all the kings and warriors who preceded the days of Christ.

The history of the city is but little known. Yet there are passages in it that would be worth relating; and there is a grand tradition of a battle in the crumbling times, wherein one gallant knight kept back a score of Paynims, that deserves lasting preservation and illustration among the deeds of brave men. Listening to that story from a Greek priest, in the gloom of a stormy evening, as I did, one could not but recall with a thrill of admiration the deeds of the warriors of the Cross, and acknowledge how vastly Christian soldiers in later ages have excelled, in valor and valiant work, the mighty men of more ancient renown.

It is to this day a place of considerable importance. The relics of its old walls are imposing and grand, but of their age it is impossible to guess. It is the seat of a bishopric of the Greek Church, and on the whole is a city of some note in these remote parts of the Old World. Its population must be from 10,000 to 15,000.

We obtained accommodations in a very decent house belonging to a Christian merchant, and having disposed of our effects, went out immediately to look at the remains of the old city and the ruins of the new.

Almost the first person we met was the Greek Bishop, with three attendant priests, and our appearance manifestly astonished him. He had not seen such a cavalcade in "The City of God" in his time. Philadelphia, by-the-way, is now called the City of God—Allahkshur.

The prelate was sailing up the narrow and dusty street with all his dignity of an English Metropolitan. We saw no horseback, but when we met him we dismounted and paid our respects to the representative of the Church in Philadelphia.

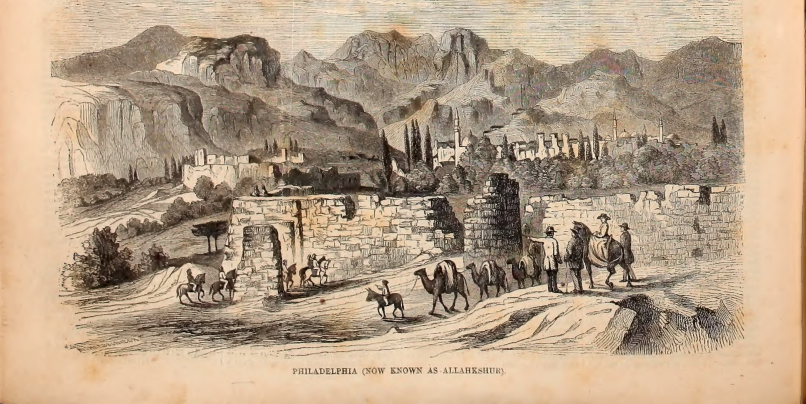
The glory has departed from the city that had once a canvas, which God hade her hold fast, but which she long ago let fall into the dust.

This filthy-looking lot of priests were the custodians of the Church of Paul, and Gaius, and Aristarchus. We accompanied them to the episcopal residence—a miserable, cold, turn of a house, in which we were hospitably received, but in which it was difficult to realize that we were in the hours of a Bishop of the Church to whom it was promised, "Him that overcometh I will make a pillar in the temple of my God, and he shall go no more out."

We had fruits and a glass of sherbet; and the Bishop tried to tell us of the splendor of the churches of the city, which are now in ruins—but I confess I could not believe his stories when I saw the ruins. They appear much more like remains of ancient temples of heathen gods. But the Bishop says they were churches, and he ought to know best.

Mount Tmolus stood up in the light of the setting sun, grand, magnificent, as the memorial of the faith that once blessed the city now lying in ruins below. Oh, holy faith of Christian hearts! When I remember how many have by it been sustained, even here where I now stand, in the long gone years, I thank God, and take courage. Yea, there were faithful men and faithful women, whose prayers went up from flame and torture, up above yonder serene mountain-top — up above yonder cloud lit with the red sunset glow—and whose dust is here now. They did overcome, and are pillars in the temple above!

All the afternoon, as we strolled about the ruinous town, these and like thoughts possessed our minds; and in the evening we heard vespers sung in the Greek Church, and then went home and slept.



Do you know what a luxury is sleep? Were you ever tired—physically tired out? If not, you can't appreciate it. And I sometimes think, in these Eastern wanderings, that no one ever was fatigued elsewhere. I never have experienced more thorough and absolute bodily exhaustion than at the close of one of these long days of riding and ruin-visiting. But Miss Grandison is an example of endurance.

"Where is America?" asked one of the Greek priests of me, at the Bishop's house.

"It is on the other side of the world," said I, in Eastern style of exaggeration.

"Has the world two sides?" demanded the learned Churchman, with a look of great astonishment.

"Verily they are not past the age of Galileo here!" said I to myself.

PHILADELPHIA (NOW KNOWN AS ALLAHKSHUR).

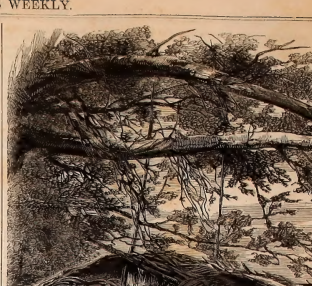
AN ANDAMAN ISLANDER.

THE ISLAND PRISON OF THE KING OF DELHI.

WHEN Delhi was stormed by the British, its King (whose portrait may be found in No. 33 of our first volume) fled across the Jumna, and, with a small train of women and eunuchs, took refuge in a strongly-constructed tomb, whence he issued only upon the promise of an impatient subordinate British officer that his life should be spared. It reflects no little credit upon the temper and self-control of his captors, who thus beheld one of the chief offenders in the rebellion escaping their just vengeance, that they scrupulously honored the pledge of one who might well have been declared irresponsible toward an individual who had himself violated every tie which could give him claims upon humanity. After serious deliberation it has been determined to exile the rebel king to one of the Andaman Islands, a small and unimportant group situated in the eastern portion of the great Bay of Bengal, between latitudes 10° 30' and 13° 40'. A lonelier prison could scarce be found. Lying full within the rango of the southwest monsoon, these isles are washed for eight months in the year by continuous rains. The inhabitants are a peculiar and most savage race, sunk to the lowest stage of barbarism—suspected to be cannibals, and known to be vindictive, treacherous, and hostile to all intruders. They seldom exceed five feet in height, have protuberant bellies, limbs disproportionately slender, skin a deep sooty black, hair woolly, nose flat, thick lips, small red eyes, and an expression of countenance made up of famine and ferocity, and indicating extreme wretchedness. They go quite naked, having no sense of shame whatever; and have made no efforts toward cultivating the ground, inhabiting only the sea-shores, along which they wander, preying and subsisting upon fish and other marine animals, snakes, lizards, and rats.

Their weapons and implements are of the rudest kind, but they use them with remarkable dexterity, particularly in spearing fish. They have no utensils that will resist fire; and cook their food, which is entirely animal, by throwing it upon the coals, and devouring it when half broiled. Their huts consist of four poles driven into the ground, and interwoven with branches of trees. Herds of a diminutive species of hog—supposed to be descended from a shipwrecked stock — are found in the forests, and with the skulls and bones of these animals the islanders are accustomed to adorn their rude huts. These remains, it is supposed by some travelers, first gave rise to the supposition that the Andamanese were addicted to cannibalism.

They are continually in a state of semi-starvation, which may account, in part, for their ferocity, and their very low physical and moral condition. Their chief trouble, however, is to protect themselves against the countless flies which swarm here as they do on the coast of New Holland. To evade this plague, the first care of the islander, on getting up in the morning, is to daub himself all over with a thick coating of mud, which, hardening in the sun, forms an armor completely insect-proof. He next paints his woolly locks with red ochre—and, this done, pays his respects to his neighbor; which salutation of politeness—said to be never omitted—is performed by lifting one leg and smiting the lower part of the thigh with the open hand.



The Andamanese are supposed to worship the sun and moon. During violent tempests they become much alarmed, and by various barbarous and disgusting ceremonials endeavor to avert the wrath of the storm-demon. Their language is peculiar, and has not the slightest affinity to any known to be spoken in India or on any of the Indian islands. It has been supposed that they are the degenerate descendants of a tribe of wandering negroes; but of this there is no certainty. When the great island of Papua comes to be thoroughly explored, it may be that the Andamanese will be found akin in manners, language, and race to the Papuan negro.

Great Andaman and Little Andaman are the chief isles of the group. Of these the first and most northerly is 140 miles in length and 20 miles in breadth, and contains in its centre a peak—the Saddle Peak—2400 feet in height, which forms a landmark for passing mariners. On this island was established, in 1793, a British penal settlement, called Port Cornwallis, where were sent convicts from Bengal. The harbor is excellent, but the situation proved so extremely unhealthy that the settlement was abandoned in 1796. Since then the islands have been visited willingly but once, in 1825, by a British squadron bound for Rangoon. On that occasion the natives attacked a peaceful watering party with such obstinate ferocity that they were not beaten back until the British lost three men, and two-thirds of the attacking party were slain.

Of animals the islands have, besides several snakes and lizards, only small hogs and rats. Timber for ship-building and cabinet purposes is found, but only one fruit, the mango. The cocoanut, which flourishes in the neighboring Nicobars, is not known to the Andamanese. The swallow, which builds the edible birdsnests so much prized by the Chinese, is found here in caves by the seaside.

Altogether, this prison-home of the inhuman exking is of the most desolate character; and, living there, he will have leisure, in the absence of opium, to rethink him of his past life, and prepare for that death which, in his case, can not be far off.

A few years ago an American Indiaman was cast away on Little Andaman. Half the crew were murdered by the natives, who made a sudden and ferocious descent upon them soon after they got ashore. The rest were immediately driven into a boat, which, fortunately, they had been able to preserve; and such was the inextinguishable hatred of the natives, who followed them along shore, and dartled spears at them whenever they approached near enough, that they were obliged to put off for sea without provisions or water. They were fortunately picked up a few days afterward by a passing vessel.

Now that a settlement is to be made on one of the islands, it is to be hoped we shall learn a little more of the savage and singular race, which seems so mysteriously separated from all its fellows, and planted here in the Indian waters.

H.S. Since the above account was written, further news has come to hand, from which it appears that the worst having in charge the future of the ex-king of India) has sent detachments to all the Andaman Islands as the locale of his imprisonment. The matter was still under consideration, and the probability is that the islands will be selected as the most convenient and eligible site.

LITERARY.

THE American Geographical and Statistical Society is an institution which has recently advertised itself somewhat extensively in connection with a series of lectures and an exhibition of pictures. In common with others we received an invitation, issued by their "Committee on Syrian Exploration," to attend a private exhibition of the illustrations to be used in these lectures, and in particular the pictures of Mr. Edward Troye, the well-known artist, who has been on Mount Lebanon, other, and has finished some elegant works while there. The invitation was in printed form and card, and he passed us in at the theatre entrance, whence, by a subaltern, we made our way through passages familiar in concert days to the lecture-room we entered.

Here all was darkness except behind a white screen which was stretched across the stage for the purpose of receiving "magic lantern" views. Some twenty or thirty ladies and gentlemen had found their way as we had to the room. Standing over stools and benches in the pit, we found a place we found a seat, and waited the Society's proceedings.

Ten or fifteen minutes passed, and then some one began spreading the screen with white, the occasional profile was visible on it, cast by the dim light in the rear. At last the lecture was pronounced to members of the Geographical and Statistical Society. If so, it was all we saw of them or their committee. It half a dozen persons behind the screen and this hall at making rabbits with the hands interlocked in an ingenious manner known to the boys as the wall done—on the whole, successful. Next, an occasional view of a tent with a stripe on it, which was thrown on the screen, and fresh showers of water were added. The effect on the dark air was not striking: on the contrary, rather the reverse. At nine o'clock the spectrum of the magic lantern was thrown on the curtain, and that is the last we saw—larger, smaller, more light, less light—for ten minutes. At 9.15 a view of a city, upside-down, was introduced, and the lecture began to be satisfactory: then a view of some trees was let down and put in (the fashion of drawing blinds), lifted, let down—lifted, let down; then both were withdrawn. Ten minutes later the city appeared, right side up, then wrong side up, then right side down. Five minutes more, and the same city reappeared and disappeared. Five minutes more, and the same. Five more, and the same. By this time the experiments seemed satisfied. There was a general shuffling up of the boys and benches were fixed behind the screen, and the invited audience, this orderly hall, could find its way to each other's faces, would doubtless have presented reminiscences of unlooked-for entertainment.

A self-organized committee of invited gentlemen now ascended the stage, and found a solitary individual in charge of the magic lantern, who was not a Geographer nor a Statistical gentleman, but our excellent friend Mr. Starr, who was managing the lantern once in a while for the public on his own account. Mr. Starr was shocked at the invasion, and wanted to spare the slide at which he was at which, for the first time, the lecture was pronounced to be going on. Mr. Starr, and recognized some of the most respectable gentlemen of the city.

"What are you here for?" demanded Mr. Starr. "We were invited," was the reply. "Well, you've mistaken the evening," said Mr. Starr. "Read the invitation." Whereupon the invitation was read and protested that he knew nothing about it; and so no one was present on behalf of the Society to explain the mistake, the company went home about ten o'clock, with no favorable anticipations from the lectures under such auspices.

As it afterward proved, they were not far wrong in their unfavorable opinions. The price of the tickets was fixed at a dollar a lecture, the audiences were slim, and the lecturers were choked off, when two-thirds through, to allow of the exhibition of pictures that might have amused children in a Sunday School, but which were out of place in a scientific body. Mr. Troye's paintings were, indeed, exhibited, and are magnificent works of art in the room where he now shows them; but they might as well have been hung in the dome of the Exchange as on the front of the stage at Niblo's. And to finish the chapter, when Mr. Troye came to remove his noble painting of The Syrian Pavesman on the Plain of Damascus, a careless workman so managed his ladder as to fall absolutely through the canvas, and nearly ruin one of the finest works of art which this country possesses.

We have given more space to this account than we intended, hoping that this is the last we shall hear of the American Geographical and Statistical Society, or its Committee on Syrian Exploration. Until they can manage a course of lectures in a New York saloon, it will hardly be safe to trust them with running a line from Jaffa to the Persian Gulf, or giving to the world any new information on Eastern Geography.

The death of little children is a subject of household interest in very many families. Dr. Prime's admirable work, published by Harper and Brothers, met comfort and consolation into thousands of homes. Carter & Brothers now issue an admirable volume of Life and Light, for Little Children. Dr. N. L. Rice, of Chicago, whose experience in sorrow has made him a fitting counselor of the afflicted. The book is a real large, but large enough to contain an abundance of instructive truth which mothers will read, and, reading, will find comfort.

Few good novels are published in these days. Guy Livingstone and Dead and Alive, by George Lee, fall on you with no rivals. It is a feature of the age, to which we have before called attention, that the republication of the old classics is well employed. Harper & Brothers have yielded to the demand for such reading by republishing the works of Miss Mary Howitt, Miss Edgeworth, and Miss Sedgwick, which are not only of standard value but of enduring freshness and interest. Harper and Brothers the same connection we may mention the continuation of Fielder and Fielder's elegant edition of the Waverley novels, of which the last number is the Fortunes of Nigel. Nor has the publication of such books of travel as Livingstone, Kelly's son, Bonar, and others have just issued, increased any degree the demand for the works of our American writers.

Mr. Cooper's new edition of Rev. Dr. S. I. Prime's "Europe and the East," one of the most useful books of the day, is to be issued by Harper, published by the Harpers, as well as a new edition of Mr. W. C. Prime's Boat Life and Tent Life.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, April 12th, in the Senate, a message was received from the President, accompanying his veto on the Kansas Bill, on which Senator Green gave notice that he would call up the bill for the admission of Kansas. A message was also received from the President of the United States of the Dedimus Appropriation Bill, which was also returned with a protest against the passage of the Military Asylum, complaining of abuses, and proposing for a substitute the Land Warrant Bill, referred to a special committee. The Senate then adjourned to attend the funeral obsequies of Hon. Henry Clay, delivered after the reading of the Journal.

On Tuesday, 13th, in the Senate, Senator Green, pursuant to notice, moved that in the House had disagreed to the Kansas Bill, and that a message to that effect be sent to the House. This led to discussion, in which Senators Douglas, Green, Bigler, Hunter, and others took part, and Senator Clayton, Senator Hunter, and Senator Wade Hampton, of South Carolina, spoke in favor of the bill. By the Utah Telegraph Bill, which was discussed by Senators Gwin, Brodhead, Bigler, Wade Hampton, Crittenden, Hale, and others. Senator Iverson moved that Senator Douglas's bill be made the special order for the 7th December, which was carried by 28 to 17. Senator Brodhead moved that the Senate adjourn over to Monday, and adjourn on the first Monday in June. After discussion by Senators Douglas, Bigler, Green, Hunter, and others, the motion was carried by 28 to 17. Senator Brodhead then occupied all day in discussing the Senate bill to establish a telegraph between the Mississippi and Pacific. Speeches against the bill were made by Messrs. Gwin, Douglas, Bigler, Green, Hale, Fitch, and Mr. Mason, Gould, Clemens, and Smith. The House adjourned without taking action.

On Wednesday, 14th, in the Senate, a Memorial from the Legislature of Utah, praying the Territory be made the Mormons, was presented and laid on the table by 32 to 19. Senator Brodhead presented a memorial from the Illinois Legislature praying for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution. The Utah Telegraph Bill was then taken up, and Senator Brodhead moved that the eastern terminus be "at a point on the Missouri River opposite Council Bluffs, in the State of Kansas (sic)," which, after discussion by Senators Douglas, Green, Bigler, Hale, Crittenden, and others, was lost. Senator Toln moved to substitute the words "the Missouri River" in lieu of Senator Brodhead's motion between the mouth of the Big Sioux and Fort Smith, on the Arkansas River, which was lost by 28 to 17. Several private matters. In the House, the Senate message asking for the Kansas Bill was received and referred. The Senate bill for the admission of Kansas was then taken up. The previous question having been moved and carried, Mr. English's motion to concur with the Senate was lost by 108; the Speaker then voted say, and it was carried. Some disagreement, which was promptly terminated by the Senate bill for the protection of life and property was then discussed by Messrs. Stanton, Bocock, Cobb, and Gilmore. No vote was taken.

On Thursday, 15th, in the Senate, Senator Pearce moved for returns of all contracts for Utah supplies which have been given without notice; agreed to. Discussion of Senator Hunter, the Diplomatic and Consular Appropriation Bill. Senator Douglas's bill to establish a Territorial Government for Utah was then taken up, and passed by Act of 1852. The Pacific Railroad Bill was taken up and discussed by Senators Bigler, Douglas, Wade Hampton, and Foster. A message was received from the House, announcing the appointment of Messrs. Stephens, English, and Howard as the Committee of Conference on the Kansas Bill. In the House, the Senate bill for the admission reported from the Committee on Commerce; by Mr. Millson, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, instructions; by Mr. John Cochrane, making an appropriation for the improvement of the Hudson River; by Mr. Bocock, for the relief of 1812; ratified on the 3d March, 1857; reported from Mr. Cobb, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported adversely on the bill to establish a bureau of agriculture and mechanics.

On Friday, 16th, in the Senate, several thirty-two private bills, and then adjourned. The House was likewise engaged on private bills.

On Saturday, 17th, Senator Pest introduced a bill providing for the organization of Oregonia and Nebraska. Monday to November. An effort was made to take up the Deficiency Bill, but Senator Douglas objected, and the Pacific Railroad Bill was taken up. Senators Douglas, Bigler, Foster, Brodhead, Green, Johnson, Hunter, Broderick, Green, Wilson, Crittenden, Hale, and Fitch participated in the discussion, which, further consideration of the bill was postponed till Monday, December 7th. In the House, the time was occupied with private bills. The bill to refund duties on railroad iron, which was first at the House in 1856 was discussed by Messrs. John Cochrane, Clemens, and Stanton; no vote was taken.

THE CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The Conference Committee have met twice; but thus far no result has been arrived at. Mr. Stephens is seriously indisposed, and did not attend the two last meetings of the Committee. It is understood that Senator Douglas has had an interview with Mr. Stephens and Senator Hill, and the admission of Kansas under the act of 1854 is the basis proposed. It is said that Mr. Stephens has not objected, and that an amicable arrangement which does not submit the Constitution to the popular vote in Kansas.

DIPLOMATIC CORRESPONDENCE OF THE SLAVE-TRADE.

An interesting and important diplomatic correspondence, lately carried on between the British Minister, Lord Napier, and General Cass, relative to the slave-trade, has reached the climax is a long, able, and convincing note from the venerable Secretary, addressed to Lord Napier, reviewing the whole subject, and furnishing a complete refutation of the demands and pretensions of the British Government. Several notes had previously been exchanged between Lord Napier and the late Government, in which the former had charged the United States as a lenient observer of slavers of all nations, and maintaining that the United States and Great Britain, between the African coast from there, the present number of vessels, to four, or, at the most, six. In the communication to Lord Napier the views of our Government at length, and in a manner which must be considered as satisfactory, had been and his Government. General Cass, however, ended on the subject. He had, in his previous notes, dismissed with great and deserved severity upon the British treaty, and the right of search, which Lord Napier had claimed, and even with equal justice upon the African agencies system, by Lord Palmerston.

NEWS FROM SAINT LAKE CITY.

We have news from Salt Lake City, by way of California, to February 6.

Mass meetings have been held in all the various districts and towns of Utah, expressive of the people's entire confidence in Governor Young, and their approval of his acts and policy. The Territorial Assembly, in a unanimous meeting, called for this purpose, was held at Salt Lake City on the 4th January, Governor Young presided. At this meeting Committees reported resolutions, approving of the late President of the United States, and the votes to Congress. The Address to the People set forth the policy of the Mormons, and the reasons for the charges of rebellance to law.

The Governor's Message to Congress is noticed in our report of Congressional proceedings.

FOREIGN.

The Legislative Assembly of Utah adjourned on the 23d January. A memorial was presented to Congress, and the presidential may be gleaned by the following sentences, extracted from the Governor's Message, dated January 17:

"The Legislative Assembly adjourned on the 23d inst., without the occurrence of a sequence rule on any portion of the code of practice, and the Supreme Court of the Territory, under the impression that the conduct of their offices would be suspended throughout Christendom! If the world is to be a standstill, and the Legislature is to be idle, the judiciary would most heartily commend and drive it inflate the worthy example. Let the lawyers, doctors, the passions, counsellors, pig-skipping, wire-working, lobbying, quarrelling, and other kindred ability cease from unchecked selfishness, find no place in our legislative halls. Then, and then only, will we be able to say that we install the devil a standing member in our Legislative Assemblies, or that the Legislative Assemblies of our country indisputably prevail over all the devils in creation. Then, and then only, will we be able to say that we have not brought the devil into our Legislative Assemblies, and that people proceeds from above, while the main-spring of our conduct proceeds from beneath."

APPEAL IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Nearly all the members who, after the House adjourned on 12th inst., left the city for their homes, are back in groups or in their seats, were startled by a cry from Mr. Hopper, of New York, and Mr. Hopper, author of the Southern Address, that Mr. Hopper was the author of the Southern Address. They had just before been attending regular business. Crowds of spectators and others rushed in and separated the combatants while they were engaged in a personal struggle. Mr. Hopper was temporarily taken in charge by the Sergeant-at-Arms. A number of Members left the House before the conclusion of the proceedings, were much frightened. A pistol and bowie knife were found in the possession of the man who was thrown. An investigation was held, and Senator Hale and Montgomery Blair, who were present, and Mr. Mr. Creigh refusing to appear against the assailant, the matter was laid over for the present.

MRS. OWEN'S FANCY BALL.

Mrs. Owen gave a fancy dress ball at Washington on the 8th. Every body was there, and the affair went off with great éclat. We subjoin a few descriptions of the characters:

Mrs. Webb's dress was that of a Lady of the Court of Louis XIV., consisting of a skirt of white satin, richly trimmed with flounces of pearls of quality; bodice of the same trimmed with pearls of quality; overdress of cherry satin, trimmed with a ruche of white satin; point lace of rare value; XIV., which added much to the effect of the costume, so admirably adapted to the face of the lady who wore it.

Miss Grin, who aided in 'doing the honors,' looked charmingly in a Costume of a Greek Girl. Her dress of white and full white satin pantalets; boots of silver and blue satin, which fitted perfectly to the ankle, trimmed with stripes of cherry satin, was a skirt of tulle trimmed with a ruche of white satin; a bodice of white satin, with cross of cherry satin, upon trimmed with pearls and blue ribbon.

Mrs. Bigler, of New York, Indian Princess. This was perhaps the most perfect costume worn, and every thing was in keeping with it.

"Hon. Anson Burlingame, of Massachusetts, Julius Cæsar. Perry, a costume of white satin and velvet.

"Mr. M. B. Brady, of New York, looked magnificently as Count Fiesco, the Genoese. Costume of white satin and velvet.

"Mr. Lamb, of Kentucky, was dressed with great taste and elegance as a Spanish Cavalier.

"Mr. Ely, of Georgia, one the ball-dress of Count Robert of Paris, in the Crusades. Court, at the time when President Washington's opening address were commenced efforts. Lord Napier and Lady Napier were one of these most admired—perhaps on account of the affability of the wearer.

"Mrs. Senator Douglas, of Illinois, as Ancient, was dressed in a style of beauty and elegance worthy admiration.

"Her presence was as glorious as her state;
To mortal eyes she did all grace exceed;
Whose face destruction only would shield;
Her looks were like the sun, which none can read,
Then looked by what I can relate.
To tell her hair, full many a would strike you blind
Could I do justice to the full detail.
Her dress was of white satin, richly trimmed.

"Hon. Mr. Clingman, of North Carolina, as a Gentleman of the Court of Louis XIV., looked most handsome, fared and lined with white satin, except the velvet collar. The breeches were of white satin, trimmed with the court sash too, also lace at the wristbands. White silk stockings, with red clocks, and shoes with red heels, and buckles. The hat of old time form, with red feathers. The tremble Lady Napier took as old friends and old and distant member from North Carolina, the appearance of ball-rooms will be improved.

"Miss Hale of New Hampshire, as Scarlet, scattered bright and joyous glances wherever she moved.

"I marvel not, O Sun! that unto thee,
In adoration, man should bow the knee.
Since thou dost shine on him with joy and love!

"Hon. L. M. Kutt, of South Carolina, was Buckingham in the days of Queen Elizabeth, and looked the part to the full act. His was one of the best sustained characters in the room.

"Lady Oakley, as a French Marchioness, would have been an ornament to the Court of Versailles.

"Miss Oakley, as Indian Peasant Girl.

"A lovely being, scarcely form'd or moulded
A rose with all its sweetest leaves unfolded."

"Mr. Foote, of Massachusetts, The Merry Monarch, and, later in the evening, as Major Jack Downing, enlivening for the Utah army.

PERSONAL.

The funeral review of Mr. Benton was attended, among others, by the President, members of the Cabinet, Foreign Ministers, and members of Congress. The corpse was conveyed to the vault in the Congressional Cemetery.

Colonel Benton's will was opened the day after his death. The instrument was drawn up by himself, but previous to the surgical operation which threatened his life. It is written entirely in his own hand, and is dated December 1, 1856. The estate is bequeathed to Mrs. Jones, and William Carey Jones is to have the library and the manuscript. The rest of the estate is distributed among the surviving children. The executors are Messrs. Montgomery Blair, Preston King, Richard Y. Jacob, Montgomery P. Blair, and Philip Lee.

Mr. Preston Brooks, of Carolina, is about to leave New Orleans for Kentucky, and will arrive here before the end of this month. He will be met at the depot of cars with different schemes; and especially republicans all the Democratic Members of Congress from the said confederacy.

Lord Elgin and Kincardine has had a public reception in Canada, and has left for America, on his way to London Mr. Young addressed him as "Oculus, Patriot, Sage, Citizen of America, Lieutenant of Wodenshire, High Priest of the Union, and Friend of Mankind."

Queen has been celebrating the birth-day of the deceased J. Addison Thomas, of this city. He died at his residence, No. 48 Clarendon Hill, on the 17th inst., and was interred by the former Member of that Government with the usual military honors.

The Swedish Envoy has also been transferred from Washington to Constantinople.

The Russian Legation will forthwith return to Costa Rica.

The British Advertiser, having been led by an error of the telegraphic reporter to suppose that the Hon. William L. Dayton, U. S. Minister from that country, had left a Lecompositis in the important division to the name of Lecompton, has the following: "Mr. Dayton makes the following statement:

"I left Paris on the 7th of June, nor shall I see any such vote from the Senate. I am not aware that I have been in any way connected with the Lecompton Constitution, or with the Kansas question, since I have been here on record. Soon the final struggle on Lecompton will come, and the people of Kansas will have the opportunity to be heard on, as usual, you will please contradict the report, in answer to any letter that may be addressed to me."

Here Forney was thrown from a carriage on Monday, and falling over a hedge, was quite severely injured. Mr. Gorchie, and injured his leg so seriously that it was found necessary to amputate the limb above the knee.

The Rev. Mr. Kellock, of Boston notoriety, is said to have received a call to the pastorate of Trinity Church, and is expected to take charge of the parish.

It is reported that John W. Seymour, the defaulting ex-cashier Post Office, is living in Canada, keeping a silver store.

General William Marks, who was a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature as early as 1810, and for six years a member of Congress, died at Lowell on the 5th ult. He was elected to the United States Senate, and was the author of the bill which, if it had been adopted, would have been contemporary with Webster, Calhoun, and Clay. He was also the author of the bill which established the Court of Claims. He was a regular contributor to the Democratic Review in the days of Langdon Cheves, and was for many years on the Committee on Military Affairs, and was known when he left Congress as the gentleman who was called the Cincinnati Pennsylvania.

The New Hampshire Patriot and Gazette is looking over the list of members of this Congress (thirty years ago), and published in Alden's Register, of December, 1857, we notice a curious circumstance. The list contains the full names of every member of the House of Representatives but one. There was a new member from Tennessee, whose Christian name was not given in the report by the compiler, and as he put his name down in the list of members he signed it with the short for gentleman, of whom already there was another in the House, and was elected President of the United States.

General Lewis Cass, formerly of this city, has been appointed United States Commercial Agent at Florence, in Tuscany. Our foreign government has a large proportion of Florence.

Mr. Frederick Rasmacher, of Indiana, Pennsylvania, was shot a day or two ago by a tenant of his, named Bennett, from whom he attempted to distrain for rent. He later settled the case by killing the landlord, whose age is not mentioned.

Miss Matilda Hyde Crim, of Baltimore, Tuesday morning, the Rev. Dudley A. Tyng, the eloquent and popular Rector of that city, and his sister, Miss Anna Maria Cruikshanck, to look at the operation of a corn-shelling machine in the Patent Office, and while engaged there, he placed his hand on that portion of the instrument which was in motion, which crushed his hand. His dressing-gown became entangled in the wheels of the apparatus, which caused the arm to be drawn in the right manner, from the elbow to the shoulder, severing the main artery and bone, and otherwise badly and severely injuring him.

Mr. Cruikshanck, with great presence of mind, ordered the machine to be stopped, or Mr. Tyng would have become very much exhausted by his great loss of blood. The wounded gentleman was at once taken home and was from Norristown, who remained with him all night, and rendered every assistance in his power.

This morning Mr. Tyng was doing as well as it was at any reason to expect, but he can not be considered fairly out of all danger from the wounds.

Dimmick, of Pennsylvania, a Lecompton Democrat, is at that time in Washington, D. C.

William Knapp, Jun., Esq., for the past two years a resident of this city, and a member of the Philadelphia bar, has been appointed Consul to Belfast. Mr. Knapp's recognition only next week on business connected with the duties of his office.

Lady Napier has expressed her intentionally to post a visit to Mount Vernon. Lord Napier remains in Boston on the 19th inst.

General Cass has left, as has been stated, for Washington, but is awaiting orders to join his command in Utah, if necessary. His health has slightly ill, is proved, but he equips yet to be quite feeble. It is likely his brothers pass will contribute to revive and strengthen him.

The United States frigate to present a magnificent set of bound and colossal.

The Wilmington (North Carolina) Herald says: "Lieutenant Maury, of the Observatory at Washington, has ordered the stage for the purpose of opening a wine and liquor store in Lodge."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

THE NEW INDIAN LOAN.

The London Times of the 2d says: "The biddings for the India loan of £5,000,000 in four per cent. debentures were handed in on Thursday, and the result has been more satisfactory than was generally anticipated. The minimum price fixed by the India House was 97, and the tenders at and above that point amounted in the aggregate to £4,800,000. They ranged from 97 to 102, two or three persons having offered the latter price for some moderate sums. It is believed that the average will prove to be about 98. There were some large offers under 97. As soon as the adjudication of the £4,800,000 had taken place, the new security was negotiated in the Stock Exchange, and numerous transactions were effected at 98 @ 98¼, the final quotation being 98. The first payment of 20 per cent. will be due on the 8th inst."

PROGRESS OF THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH ENTERPRISE.

The work of taking in the Atlantic cable was, at latest dates, proceeding with dispatch on both the Niagara and Agamemnon, and the whole was expected to be on board by the 10th of May.

It is intended that the two vessels, which are expected to be completely ready by the end of May, shall, before commencing to lay the cable, proceed to sea, and in deep water, about 300 miles from the Irish coast, rehearse a series of experiments in paying out and hauling in, and put to a practical test several suggestions and appliances that have been proposed by various ingenious persons. The two ships will then return to England and report progress; and should the experiment show that improvements or alterations are desirable, there will be time to get them effected so as to enable the expedition to make its final start at the most favorable time of the year.

FRANCE.

THE EMPEROR AMONG THE PEOPLE.

The Emperor, on horseback, went to visit the new Boulevard de Sebastopol, a few days ago. The crowd of workmen, masons, and stone-cutters engaged in building the houses of the new thoroughfare crowded round his Majesty, and cheered him most lustily. The Emperor went home through the heart of the city by the Rue de la Ferronerie, the Rue de Rivoli, the Rue Croix des Petits Champs, the Rue Vivienne, and the Boulevards. In the Rue de la Ferronerie his Majesty reined in his horse and stood for some time looking at the bust of Henri Quatre, which is fixed up in the front of a house exactly opposite the spot where he was murdered by Ravaillac. Late events must have occurred to his mind as he gazed upon it; and he could hardly avoid reflecting on what might have been the fate of France had he met with his Ravaillac on the 14th of last January.

THE NEW EMBASSADOR TO LONDON.

M. de Persigny has returned to Paris. Marshal Pelissier was to leave for London on the 12th inst. The Marshal's income will enable him to make a greater display than any embassador since the time of Louis Philippe. 300,000f. ($60,000) a year is the salary allowed to the diplomatic representative of France in England; 100,000f. installation, on an average stay of three years, making about 33,000f. a year; a sum of 100,000f. a year which was voted to support his rank as Duke de Malakhoff; his pay as Marshal, 40,000f.; and his salary as Senator, 30,000f.—which make a total of over 500,000f., exclusive of his allowance as Knight Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor. The Duke has, therefore, a sufficient income to support his rank liberally.

DUEL BETWEEN AMERICANS.

The Commercial gives the following extract from its Paris correspondent's letter: "A duel took place here three days ago between Mr. Calhoun, of South Carolina, the secretary of the American legation in this city, and Mr. Brevoort, of New York. They exchanged shots with pistols; and then, on account of an informality, the seconds stopped the fight for explanations. No meeting has since taken place, and I believe the affair is to be published."

ORSINI'S WILL.

We read in the Paris correspondence of the Independence Belge—"M. C——, who took part in the Roman revolution, and who is now an employé of the Credit Mobilier, was summoned the other day to the office of the Procureur-General, and asked if he had known Orsini. 'I knew him very well by reputation,' replied M. C——, 'but I have never to my knowledge seen him, though we may have met in the Roman Constituent Assembly.' 'That's what Orsini said,' replied the Procureur-General; 'but he has nevertheless appointed you his executor.' M. C—— replied that he was ready to accept the mission if they would show him the will. 'The will we can not give you,' said the Procureur-General, 'the law not admitting those who are condemned to death to make a will; but I undertake to acquaint you with his last wishes.' M. C—— went at once to Madame Orsini, who is at Paris, with her two young children, and offered his services to that Lady. Madame Orsini, who has been living in Italy, had not seen her husband for three years."

TWO MORE DEATHS FROM THE ATTEMPT OF THE RUE LEPELLETIER.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says: "We have to record this week two other deaths, victims of the attempt of the Rue Lepelletier. But the causes of their death were quite opposite. A young girl, who was wounded in front of the opera by the explosion of the bombs, has just died in the hospital Lariboisière; while a soldier who was at the execution, near the guillotine, has just died from the effects of the impression he received at the moment the heads of the prisoners fell under the axe."

CAUTION TO YOUNG LADIES.

A case has just been decided at Boulogne-sur-Mer, to which the attention of young ladies about to marry should be seriously directed, as it may prevent a great deal of misery and distress. Miss Baron, a young English lady, made the acquaintance of a young Frenchman, M. Albert de Coupigny. The young people, both of whom were of age, fell in love with each other, and agreed to take each other "for better for worse." They stepped on board the Folkstone packet, and duly exchanged their vows before the registrar of that place. The little domestic drama now commenced. There were "stern parents" in the case, but, on the side of the young gentleman, unlike their prototypes in the song, they only interfered after their son brought his wife home, and then applied to the tribunal to have the marriage quashed on the plea that, first, their son had not asked their consent, and, secondly, that the formalities prescribed by law to validate the marriage of a Frenchman abroad had not been performed. As a caution for any young ladies who might be tempted to follow Miss Baron's example, it should be told what these formalities are. Three weeks before the performance of the ceremony the banns must be posted up at the mairie of the place where the bridegroom habitually resides. No matter what his rank and position may be, this formality must be complied with. When M. de Morny was married to Mademoiselle de Troubetzkoi, at St. Petersburg, the banns were put up according to the usual form at the mairie of his arrondissement in Paris. Let all girls intending to bestow themselves on a Frenchman take care that this precaution is not omitted. The consent of the parents of the bridegroom (supposing him, of course, to be no longer an infant) must also be asked, and, if refused, the intentions of the son must be thrice notified to them by a notarial act. If these precautions are not taken, what has occurred in the case of Miss Baron may again take place. Should the parents of the bridegroom apply to the law, and though the court may, as in the case in question, express deep regret that their authority should be called on to dissolve, against the wishes of the parties most interested, a marriage duly solemnized and consummated, the letter of the code is so precise that they have no alternative, and must apply to Miss Smith, Jones, and Robinson the sentence which "annulled the marriage between the parties, and condemned Miss Baron never to assume the name of Madame de Coupigny under pain of fifty francs fine for each infraction." There are some ugly features about this case, which it is painful to dwell on. M. Albert de Coupigny made no opposition to the application of his parents, and it is extremely desirable that the final dénouement of this matrimonial romance should be clearly understood.

THE EMPEROR AND LAMARTINE.

A number of the friends of Lamartine, without distinction of party or profession, have united in a plan for honorably relieving him from his oppressive pecuniary embarrassments, and securing his last days from further disquiet on that score. A deputation from the Maconnais Committee, who had undertaken the execution of this plan, went up to Paris a few days ago to ask of the Minister of the Interior permission to open the subscription in favor of their illustrious fellow-citizen. The Minister replied to their petition as follows:

"Gentlemen,—I have had the honor of communicating to the Emperor the object of your yesterday's visit. His Majesty is deeply touched at M. de Lamartine's actual position, and earnestly feels that the honor of France is engaged in preventing the aggravation of this position by its continuance. None of us can be indifferent when there is question of coming to the assistance of one of the greatest literary glories of our time, and no one can appreciate more fully than does the Emperor all the claims of your distinguished countryman (glorieux compatriote). The prince who has been opposing for these ten years the excesses of demagoguism does not and never will forget the services rendered by M. de Lamartine to the sacred cause of order in 1848, and all the wretchedness and shame from which France was saved by his glorious energy. I authorize the subscription which you, gentlemen, so nobly undertake, and am happy to inform you that the Emperor desires to inscribe his name at the head of it. Accept, etc., Espinasse."

DUMAS COOKING AGAIN.

A correspondent at Marseilles writes to the Post: "The prolific play-writer, M. Alexandre Dumas, is now residing here, to superintend the production of a new drama, Les Gardes Forestiers, which he has just written, and which is to be acted for the first time on Monday next. This drama, as I am credibly informed—represented to be one of the best of that writer's genius—was composed and completed in the very short space of time of four times twenty-four hours; having been commenced on Monday, February 22, and finished early on the following Thursday. M. Dumas forestalled the completion of the drama by one day, as he had entered into an engagement with the director of the theatre to write it in five days. My informant, on whose testimony I can implicitly rely, assured me that if he had not been an eye-witness he could not have believed it possible for the most gifted writer to compose so rapidly and under such circumstances. My friend found M. Dumas composing the drama, seated between his secretary and copying clerk, to either of whom he alternately turned, to indite, or to look over the MSS.; while, at the same time, there were from eight to ten persons in the apartment, with whom the writer entered actively into conversation. But what astonished my informant most was to find that, as the dinner hour approached, M. Dumas, stripping to his shirt sleeves, entered the kitchen, and handling the casseroles with the skill of a professed chef, prepared with his own hands that all-important repast. I am told that it is a habit with M. Dumas that when his mind is intensely engaged in study, he takes for a short time to the fumes of the kitchen by way of recreation."

GERMANY.

A NOVEL USE OF CHLOROFORM.

Hans Zocher has discovered, by means of the sleep produced by chloroform, the deception produced by a pretended mute, who attempted to quarter himself upon the cantonal hospital at Munsterlingen, during the winter, under false pretense. A full dose of chloroform betrayed his power of speech. His involuntary vociferation was of the most distinct and articulate character.

HUNGARY.

A TALE OF HORRORS.

An atrocious crime has just been perpetrated in Szikszа, in Hungary. A hawker who had long been in the habit of traveling about the country selling linen, stopped for the night at the house of a peasant. After taking his supper quietly with his hosts, he retired to bed. In the middle of the night the wife awoke her husband, and proposed to him to go and murder the hawker, in order to get possession of his property. The husband positively refused, on which the woman, calling him a coward, went and plunged a large knife into the heart of the sleeping hawker. The husband then, by order of the wife, put the body into a sack, and threw it into the river, while she set about removing all the marks of the blood. In the morning her son, a boy of five years of age, asked his mother for a piece of bread, when she took a knife to cut him a slice. Seeing this, the child cried out, "Do not cut it with that knife, for you used it to kill the hawker!" On this, the woman fearing that her crime would be revealed by the child, seized hold of him and threw him into the oven. It so happened that on the very night of the murder the house of another peasant had been robbed of a quantity of meat and bacon, and the owner had been prowling about in search of the thief. In passing near the house of his neighbor he smelt an extraordinary odor of something burning, and gave an alarm. While persons were entering the house to search for the cause of the smell, the mother pulled out the half-consumed body of the child from the oven, and endeavored to carry it away in her apron, but one of the feet was seen protruding, and the whole affair was discovered. The peasant and his wife were arrested, and the woman made a full confession of her guilt.

ITALY.

MASSES FOR ORSINI.

At Padua, a collegiate row has ended in the handcuffing and imprisonment of two hundred or three hundred students of that university. There is, on the outskirts of the town, a very picturesque and spacious church, dedicated to St. Antonio, called "Antony of Padua." To this shrine the Paduan youths came with a request for a requiem mass in favor of Orsini. The monk refused, but consented to officiate for an "unknown soul." The attendance was numerous, and at the close a grand de profundis was chanted by the disaffected lads, who were set upon and seized on their return.

INDIA.

THE SCENE OF THE MASSACRE AT CAWNPORE.

Mr. W. H. Russell, the famous Times correspondent, has arrived in India, and has begun to write home. After describing his entry into the ruined town of Cawnpore, he says: "A few yards beyond this mass of the ruins of what had once been a house there rose a ramp or sloping mound of earth from the level of the ground to the edge of a circular brick well, the top of which was covered in, and close by the well stood a monumental cross. It was scarcely necessary for my companion to say, 'There is the house and just beyond it is the well.' We passed on by the blackened wall of an absurdly fine masonic lodge, and by the ruins of a very spacious building called the Assembly-rooms, just opposite the scene of the butchery; by a house close to it, in which the Nena lived after the occupation of the place by the Sepoys; and then through the remains of mud houses and bungalows, till we reached the ruins of the Cawnpore hotel. Every thing around us was dilapidated—not a pane of glass in the broken window, the doors and ceilings broken, and here and there the holes made by cannon shot; but we were glad to find that some of the rooms were unoccupied, and that such things as breakfast and dinner were not unknown. The scene from the hotel—you must dismiss from your mind all associations connected with the use of the word in Europe, so far as the outward aspect of the place is concerned—was curious. Ruins, ruins, nothing but ruins, amidst which troops of vultures were gorging themselves, mingled with buzzards, kites, 'adjutants,' and carrion crows; a few tents pitched inside the compound by travelers en route, vast processions of carts drawn by oxen, and files of elephants and camels passing along the dusty plains which were swept continually by blasts that whirled before them clouds of fine earth, brick-dust, and the powdered surface of the compounds.

REMAINS OF THE BUTCHERY.

"Before breakfast we walked over to inspect the site of the horrid butchery which has rendered the Sepoy mutiny infamous for ever. The house in which it took place is now in ruins; it was pulled down to clear the ground for the guns of the tête de pont across the Ganges, and the very outline of the walls is scarcely traceable. It was originally built for and used as a zenana, an inclosed residence, with a court-yard in the centre, in which the stump of a tree was still standing: and off this open space were the rooms in which the massacre took place. The plaster of the walls was still lying about in patches, but I could not detect any trace of blood. Bits of cloth and of women's dresses were still visible amidst the rubbish; but there were none of the more painful tokens of the dreadful tragedy which had been enacted where we stood. There is reason to believe that the writing on the plaster, the purport of which you know, did not exist when Havelock's force entered the place. I have spoken with officers who examined the walls, and every scratch in the sides of the rooms, and they declare that the appeal to vengeance, which is attributed to one of the wretched victims, was not to be seen immediately after we returned to Cawnpore, and that it had been traced on the wall by some person who visited the place subsequently.

THE WELL.

"We walked a few paces further to the well in rear of the house, into which the bodies of the slaughtered women and children were thrown by the murderers. It is now bricked over, and there only remains a small circular ridge of brick marking the wall of the well, which was not more than nine or ten feet across. Beneath rest the mangled remains of our poor countrywomen and their little ones, and standing there we could well realize the strength of that indignation which steels the hearts of our soldiers against the enemy. Within a few feet of 'the well,' surrounded by a small wooden paling, there stands a stone cross on a flat slab, on two courses of masonry, the inscription on which tells its story:

"'In memory of the women and children of Her Majesty's 32d Regiment, who were slaughtered near this spot on the [illegible] of July, A.D. 1857. This memorial was erected by [illegible] men of the same regiment, who were passing through Cawnpore, November 21st, 1857.'

"This inscription is engraved on the upright part of the slab, which is in the form of a Maltese cross, within a circle of stone. In the quadrants of this circle are inscribed, in red letters and in the old English character, 'I believe in the Resurrection of the Dead.'

HOW THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF LIVES.

"Certainly the Commander-in-Chief does not set an example to his officers by any extravagance in baggage. He lives in a small subaltern's tent, and his chief of the staff is equally moderate. I believe his Excellency's personnel is contained in a couple of small portmanteaus, and during this short campaign he has slept on the ground among his men on more than one occasion without cover of any sort. He is apparently in excellent health, although his labors are arduous and incessant, as he and his chief of the staff manage all the details connected with the disposition of his force, and to a great extent dispense with the usual services of Adjutant-General and Quartermaster-General."

TRIAL OF THE KING OF DELHI.

The trial of the King of Delhi was not, as announced, concluded. The correspondent of the Times writes:

"The trial has now lasted fourteen days. The King, seated on a camp bed, listens to the most damning evidence without attention, but wakes occasionally into fierce excitement as a favorite approaches. I inclose a most singular and somewhat unexpected piece of evidence given by a Christian half-caste woman. It is fatal, and the trial, wretchedly reported, certainly proves three things: First, The revolt was instigated by the Shah of Persia, who promised money and troops. His proclamation to that effect was posted over the Mosque gate, and was taken down by order of Sir Theophilus Metcalfe, who, moreover, was warned by John Everett, a Christian Rissildar, very popular with the natives, that he had been warned to fly, as the Persians were coming, and that the Mussulmans were exceedingly excited. Sir Theophilus thought the matter one of no importance. Second, A paper was produced, addressed to Mr. Colvin by Mohammed Dervish, revealing the whole plot six weeks before it broke out. Mr. Colvin treated the warning as unimportant, and never even reported it to Government. Third, The murders of the Europeans in Delhi were committed by order of the King, in the presence of the Royal family, and by means of the Khassburdars, his special personal guard."

CHINA.

THE PLACE OF EXECUTION.

The special correspondent of the Times furnishes the following account of the execution-ground at Canton:

"Threading our way, under the guidance of some experienced friend, we come to a carpenter's shop fronting the entrance to a small potter's field. It is not a rood in area, of an irregular shape, resembling most an oblong. A row of cottages open into it on one side; there is a wall on the other. The ground is covered with half-baked pottery; there are two wooden crosses, formed of unbarked wood, standing on an angle, with a shred of rotting rope hanging from one of them. There is nothing to fix the attention in this small inclosure, except that you stumble against a human skull now and then as you walk along it. This is the Alcedama, the field of flood, the execution-ground of Canton. The upper part of that carpenter's shop is the place where nearly all the European residents have, at the price of a dollar each, witnessed the wholesale massacres of which Europe has heard with a hesitating skepticism. It was within this yard that that monster Yeh has, within two years, destroyed the life of 70,000 fellow-beings. These crosses are the instruments to which those victims were tied who were condemned to the special torture of being sliced to death. Upon one of these the wife of a rebel general was stretched, and, by Yeh's orders, her flesh was cut from her body. After the battle at Whampoa the rebel leader escaped, but his wife fell into the hands of Yeh—that was how he treated his prisoner. Her breasts were first cut off, then her forehead was slashed and the skin torn down over the face, then the fleshy parts of the body were sliced away. There are Englishmen yet alive who saw this done; but at what period of the butchery sensation ceased and death came to this poor innocent woman none can tell. The fragment of rope which now hangs to one of the crosses was used to bind a woman who was cut up for murdering her husband. The sickening details of the massacres perpetrated on this spot have been related to me by those who have seen them, and who take shame to themselves while they confess that, after witnessing one execution by cutting on the cross, the rapidity and dexterity with which the mere beheading was done deprived the execution of a hundred men of half its horror. The criminals were brought down in gangs, if they could walk, or brought down in chairs, and shot out into the yard. The executioners then arranged them in rows, giving them a blow behind which forced out the head and neck, and laid them convenient for the blow. Then came the warrant of death. It is a banner. As soon as it waved in sight, without verbal order given, the work began. There was a rapid succession of dull, crunching sounds—chop, chop, chop, chop. No second blow was ever dealt, for the dexterous man-slayers are educated to their work. Until they can with their heavy swords slice a great bulbous vegetable as thin as we slice a cucumber they are not eligible for their office. Three seconds a head suffice. In one minute five executioners clear off a hundred lives. It takes rather longer for the assistants to cram the bodies into rough coffins, especially as you might see them cramming two into one shell, that they might embezzle the spare wooden box. The heads were carried off in boxes; the saturated earth was of value as manure."

WHAT THE CANTON PRISONS ARE LIKE.

He adds: "I approach with reluctance the task of telling what we saw in these places, and shall dismiss the topic as briefly as I can. It is not, however, sufficient to say that all the inmates were squalid and half-starved, swarming with vermin and covered with skin diseases. This condition is common to all the Canton jails, and to all their inmates. But there are horrors which one mind can not convey to another, and such we saw again and again during those two days. A Chinese jail is a group of small yards inclosed by no general outer wall (except in one instance). Around this yard are dens like the dens in which we confine wild beasts. The bars are not of iron, but of double rows of very thick bamboo, so close together that the interior is too dark to be readily seen into from without. The ordinary prisoners are allowed to remain in the yard during the day. Their ankles are fettered together by heavy rings of iron and a short chain, and they generally also wear similar fetters on their wrists. The low-roofed dens are so easily climbed that when the prisoners are let out into the yard the jailers must trust to their fetters alone for security. The places all stank like the monkey-house of a menagerie. We were examining one of the yards of the second prison, and Lord Elgin, who is seldom absent when any work is doing, was one of the spectators. As it was broad daylight the dens were supposed to be empty. Some one thought he heard a low moan in one of them, and advanced to the bars to listen. He recoiled as if a blast from a furnace had rushed out upon him. Never were human senses assailed by a more horrible stream of pestilence. The jailers were ordered to open that place, and refusing, as a Chinaman always at first refuses, were given over to the rough handling of the soldiers, who were told to make them. No sooner were hands laid upon the jailers than the stifled moan became a wail, and the wail became a concourse of low, weakly-muttered groans. So soon as the double doors could be opened several of us went into the place. The thick stench could only be endured for a moment, but the spectacle was not one to look long at. A corpse lay at the bottom of the den, the breasts, the only fleshy parts, gnawed and eaten away by rats. Around it and upon it was a festering mass of humanity still alive.

MISERABLE APPEARANCE OF THE PRISONERS.

"The Mandarin jailer, who seemed to wonder what all the excitement was about, was compelled to have the poor creatures drawn forth, and no man who saw that sight will ever forget it. They were skeletons, not men. You could only believe that there was blood in their bodies by seeing it clotted upon their undressed wounds. As they were borne out, one after the other, and laid upon the pavement of the yard, each seemed more horrible than the last. They were too far gone to shriek, although the agony must have been great, the heavy irons pressing upon their raw, lank shins, as the jailers lugged them not too tenderly along. They had been beaten into this state, perhaps long ago, by the heavy bamboo, and had been thrown into this den to rot. Their crime was that they had attempted to escape. Hideous and loathsome, however, as was the sight of their foul wounds, their filthy rags, and their emaciated bodies, it was not so distressing as the indescribable expression of their eyes; the horror of that look of fierce agony fixed us like a fascination. As the dislocated wretches writhed upon the ground, tears rolled down the cheeks of the soldiers of the escort, who stood in rank near them. A gigantic French sergeant, who had the little Mandarin in custody, gesticulated with his bayonet so fiercely that we were afraid he would kill him. We did not then know that the single word which the poor creatures were trying to utter was 'hunger,' or that that dreadful starting of the eyeball was the look of famine. Some of them had been without food for four days. Water they had, for there is a well in the yard, and their fellow-prisoners had supplied them, but cries for food were answered only by the bamboo. Alas! it was not till the next morning that we found this out; for although we took some away, we left others there that night. Since the commencement of this year fifteen men have died in that cell.

CHILDREN CRIPPLED FOR LIFE.

"This was the worst of the dens we opened, but there were many others which fell but few degrees below it in their horrors. There was not one of the 6000 prisoners we saw whose appearance before any assemblage of Englishmen would not have aroused cries of indignation. 'Quelle société,' exclaimed Captain Martineau when, in the first yard we visited, he saw a little boy confined here because he was the son of a rebel, 'Quelle société pour un enfant de quatorze ans!' Alas! we saw many, many such cases in our after experience. In one of the dens of the Poon-yu, the door of which was open, some one pointed attention to a very child—rather an intelligent-looking child—who was squat upon a board and laughing at the novel scene taking place before him. We beckoned to him, but he did not come. We went up to him and found he could not move. His little legs were ironed together; they had been so for several months, and were now paralyzed and useless. This child of ten years of age had been placed here, charged with stealing from other children. We took him away.

THE PRISON FOR FOREIGNERS.

"It was not until our second day's search that we were able to discover the prison in which Europeans had been confined. Threats and a night in the guard-house at last forced the discovery from the Mandarin, or Jail-Inspector, in our custody. It consists of four rooms, each containing four dens. The hardest and most malignant face I ever saw is that of the chief jailer of this prison. The prisoners could not be brought to look upon him, and when he was present could not be induced to say that he was a jailer at all, or that they had ever seen him before. But when he was removed they always reiterated their first story, 'The other jailers only starve and ill-treat us, but that man eats our flesh.' How, step by step, we followed up our inquiries, and how we cast about hither and thither for a clew, and at last found one, which was often lost and refound, would be too long to tell. Mr. Parkes conducted this business with a vigor and intelligence that can not be overestimated. At first they had never heard of a foreigner, then a heavy box on the ears, administered by one of the orderlies, in punishment for a threat to a prisoner, produced a recollection of one European prisoner. Then the jailers were roughly handled in sight of the prisoners, and together with the Mandarin were taken out in custody of the soldiers. Gradually the prisoners began to give credence to what we said, that we were now the Mandarins of Canton, and could protect them if they spoke out. One produced a monkey-jacket from his sleeping place at the back of the den; another had an old Jersey; all of them soon had stories to tell. It appears quite certain that, within a period dating from the commencement of the present troubles, six Europeans, two Frenchmen and four Englishmen, have found their death in these dreadful dens. Many different prisoners, examined separately, deposed to this fact, and almost to the same details. The European victims were kept here for several months, herding with the Chinese, eating of that same black mess of rice which looks and smells like a bucket of grains cast forth from a brewery. When their time came—probably the time necessary for a reply from Pekin—the jailer held their heads back while poison was poured down their throats. The prisoners recollected two who threw up the poison, and they were strangled. We asked how they knew it was poison. There was no doubt on this score. It is a curious circumstance, illustrative of the prostrate state of terror that exists here, that the jailer's fowls scratch about untouched among all the famishing men within the Canton prisons, and feed upon the vermin. It was remarked that the fowls fed upon the vomit of those two Europeans, and died."

POLITICAL AFFAIRS.

He adds: "I have great reason to believe that the overtures made by Lord Elgin and Baron Gros were at once frankly and cordially accepted by the representatives both of America and Russia, and that every act yet done by the belligerent allies is now adopted and approved by the two hitherto neutral Powers. I believe it has been agreed between the Four Powers that they shall proceed in the first instance to Shanghai, and there, if possible, make one general treaty. If the Court of Pekin should remain unimpressed by the union of the four first-class Powers of the world, reinforcements are coming out. Russia will not be long represented by a single ship; America is sending; France has vessels on their way; and England, if she is to keep the lead which she has so worthily assumed, and hitherto so wisely maintained, will also strengthen her force. It is, however, to be hoped that no further act of conquest will be required."

AN ARMY TRAIN CROSSING THE PLAINS.

THE BIVOUAC.

THE WAR IN UTAH.

THE pictures which are herewith presented illustrate some of the most striking scenes of the experience of our army in Utah. They may be relied upon as faithful representations of the scenes they purport to depict; of their artistic merit it is unnecessary to say any thing. We doubt whether any newspaper has ever contained finer woodcuts.

The large picture illustrates the march of one of the great army trains across the prairie wilderness. The event itself is, we believe, without example. We read in the history of Russia of immense journeys across the steppes being undertaken at various times by enterprising generals. One or two other instances of long marches by armies across deserts are on record. But if there be a precedent for the march of an army, completely equipped, and provided with the multifarious and cumbrous appliances of modern warfare, crossing a desert of one thousand miles in extent, we do not recall it. In the foreground will be seen a bullock-wagon, with the animals in better condition than they are likely to have been when they reached the end of their journey. The size of the wagon will enable the reader to judge of the labor which they will have to perform before they earn a few days of rest. On the other side, a couple of officers are discussing the mail to be pursued. Mounted men are seen galloping out of the line of march, here and there, to race their horses, or to observe some unusual phenomenon on the prairie. The train itself, several miles long, may be traced like a river undulating through the plain until it loses itself under the horizon, or is concealed from view by the smoke of the fire at which a portion of the last breakfast was cooked.

The other two pictures illustrate passages in a letter from General Johnston describing his march to Camp Scott. In that letter he said:

"On the 10th of November the animals were reassumed, and then commenced the storm of snow, and wintry cold, racking the bones of our men and starving our animals, and mules, and horses, which had strayed. They died on the road and at our camps by hundreds, and so diminished were the numbers that from camp to camp, only four or five miles, as many days were required to bring them all up, as it was necessary to give time to rest the animals, now incapable of protracted efforts, and to hunt for food. In this way fifteen days were consumed in making thirty-five miles to this place, the nearest and best place of shelter and fuel for the troops, and for shelter and grass for the animals. The struggle, then, amidst snow and Arctic cold (the thermometer at sixteen below zero), was enough for a place of safety. If my doubt existed before this storm of the propriety of risking the troops on the mountains before us before spring, that of the ability to accomplish the march, the destruction among our draught animals, the necessity of saving all the oxen left for food, even if capable of further exertion, now dispelled that doubt and solved the question."

The other picture illustrates the night-service of the camp-guard. General Johnston says:

"The winter thus far has not been so rigorous as to prevent often the full instruction of the troops; they have proved themselves to be warm enough for any service, a few only—as many as thirty or less—have been frostbitten, and not one assumes disease, when necessary, in the passes without exposure."

These pictures will, we think, give the public a better idea of what is going on at Camp Scott and in the vicinity than all the letters which are being published in the papers.

TEN MINUTES IN A FYKE FENCE.

I AM not a literary man. If such were my vocation I should have called this humble sketch by some other name. I am simply a country attorney, and writing a little reminiscence of the past in an truthful a way as possible. I shall write it without an apology for my want of mechanical construction, or even my faults of grammar. It is a favorite theory of mine that none but literary men and schoolmasters know any thing about grammar. In fact, judging by myself, I am inclined to doubt whether the power to define a common noun comes with the after our schooling. I believe, however, that this is not coming to my story.

It is a great many years ago—how many I am not prepared to say; but if I may judge by my wife's assistance in counting out the years on her tiny thinly-clad skull, it must be a considerable number. I was a lad of fourteen, possessing all the attributes that lads of that age are generally supposed to possess; the most prominent of them to her a cricket-bat sanguinary. Well, it is scarcely a great superiority over every affair, both public and private, but triangular is the village that has the honor at that time of claiming me as a dweller.

I come of a very respectable family; my father—I just remember that this has no connection with my story, and is not, therefore, evidence. Well, then, I have a mother—in fact, I had at the present time; and it may be interesting to those who read this to know that they are all still unmarried and in a respectable walk. It is scarcely a week since I had the pleasure of complimenting my eldest, Harriet (about the age of forty-five), and urging on the attention of my younger, Lizzie, that she looked even better than twenty years ago. My sisters had a friend—Caroline Watts by her name. She was a remarkably fine girl. I remember her ideal exquisite beetle, and, having more than ordinarily jolly disposition, there was no lack on her part of opportunity for displaying them. She also had very fine eyes—grey-blue I think my memory serves me. Carrie was very fond of fun; took considerable pleasure in seeing me at my cricket bat; and I must confess it always seemed to me that her exhibitions would have led her to take a hand if she had been invited. Unfortunately, I never asked her, for somehow, if she did my thing in her line, she would do it so much better than myself that I was nobody. We had a very pretty little secret among us—Carrie and I—but no one dared mount her but myself. But when Carrie Hurst came," a long farewell to all my greatness." She not only overpowered him and, to all appearance, her arrival, the beast would cease at her call, and no matter for the wool flung from the sitting-club, rush after and bring it to her, like a dog. I remember liked that part, but I must admit that I was jealous in a slight degree. The truth was that I didn't like to play second fiddle to a woman, and she only three years older than myself.

And now I think it all over, she was a kind of general favorite. My quiet mother looked rather astonished the first time the young lady mounted a cherry-tree to show us how to pick with both hands; still she affirmed that Miss Hutton was a very lady-like girl. I remember that my sister Harriet was considerably amazed when Miss Hutton proffered her assistance to lift a basket of fruit to the shoulder of an old fisherman on the beach before the house. Very funny that was, the old man, in the excess of his admiration, set the basket down again to bless his new-made friend; and having no other means handy by which he could show it, proffered for her acceptance the finest shad in his basket. And what was funnier still, she took it; and removing from her finger a little plain ring, squeezed it on to the tip of the old shad man's. All this struck me at the time as being remarkably comic; perhaps I do not think so now. But I remember cogitating that night after going to bed on the probability of the old fisherman's coming round to the house in the morning, proposing for Miss Hutton in the form of a solitary herring, and declining in disgust, living in seclusion in this country for the purpose of securing our bits old clothes. I remember dreaming that night of being present at their bridal, and seeing the lady put the ring on the finger—the right hand—of the old groom.

I think I said every body liked Miss Hutton, I merely re-assert the fact to say that, according to my estimation of the thing, all their likings compressed into one great love could not half equal that which any one boy gave to Carrie. She was a favorite with every body, all their likings compressed into one great love could not half equal that which any one boy gave to Carrie. She was a little too effeminate to please boys in general. She arrived since at a better estimation of his character. He was all things to all men, but only as a way to ensure popularity. "Will you come to go cry, or his horse lame? Phil always could give a good help." Phil was fonder of fun than of any particular that never failed. He was like a businessman who performs miracles as a clerk, but is utterly lost directly he commences on his own hook. He did not dislike to show the boys how to build kites on scientific principles; he delighted in mechanical riddle; to mend a broken doll; write a prologue, in verse, for a school exhibition. But equally as well as any of these things he could fix a canoe who, in the summer season, was our village to rating-club. He more shrewdly noted the combinations and attractions, relations of matter, and such other little affairs as across generally love to talk about.

I do not know whether I am writing nonsense; and if not, I shall have to further apologize for it made at first. Every body knows what I mean; and that, I take it, is quite enough.

Phil loved Miss Hutton—there was no mistaking that fact. If nobody else knew it, I did. It was impossible to miss the signs—and as for me, I could not go down to fish without finding them sitting by the shore, just on the very spot I wanted to be. Every time I looked I found them sitting. They got up and moved away as I came down the hill. Miss Hutton was very sorry about it each time. She did not seem very happy in her love. For my own opinion in the matter, I cared more for Phil than for her. I had formed a rash declaration from her lips that she must marry which men, as a matter of fact, I could not say; I knew Phil was not a rich man; so that I could see further into the matter than he. Were I an artist I would paint the picture of Love. Two people of making him a chubby little boy, wondering about with bow and arrow, and the other a fine-looking imbecile, born without eyes, and seeking, as it were, every dangerous spot that, by the common laws of nature, is sought to be have escaped.

I do not wish to convey the idea that Miss Hutton was heartless and fickle because I believe I can show that there was some excuse for an assertion of this kind with her. She had been bred in the highest circle of aristocratic indulgences. Her father, the head of a very heavy shipping-house, was reputed to be a man of enormous wealth. She was no boarding-school debutante, her education had been acquired at home under the most approved systems and masters. Her mother, an only child, it had been a matter of continual fashion that she should be considered a beauty; and feel that money was an imperative necessity in life, and that all her graces and accomplishments, her physical and mental advantages, were intended to shine, and dazzle society in its most exalted sphere. She was not a girl of twenty years before the date of my story, and the discovery that the old gentleman was not going to leave up to all his income, did not alter her views, and Cecilia Hutton and her mother, living modestly on their revolve landed property could not be expected to assist in their matrimonial aspirations than when the unknown object of their love had the supposed heiress the greatest catch in the city.

I can not say that I altogether disagree with this view of the case. Still we have to do with a queer wife for a poor man. She was well up in the Italian Opera, could have been a very good substitute for sitter ignorance of the accomplishment of dancing. Her music was faultless; her rendering of "Il Bacio" followed her, as the respective critics say, to possess a contralto organ of superior quality; but as for playing the piano, she knew about broad-making, and as to that girl's ignorance of cooking, it was perfectly laughable. To learn, we presume that I have said that Miss Hutton since could handle a pair of horses as Carrie Hutton did, I will not say anything to the contrary account, she must have married an omnibus-driver or a horse-dealer.

I shall not enlarge any more on this subject. It is sufficient to say that I knew well that, notwithstanding all the artless flirtations that was going on between this pair, it would never amount to any thing; or rather, that it would amount to something more than a mere episode. I was very sorry to Phil in my own way, and I expect it was rather a queer way. I was a boy, and I was not very attractive, astonished, and then, as though the matter struck him in a very ridiculous light, burst into (for him) quite a loud laugh, and patronizingly clucked me under the chin. I remember I was not much pleased, and did not again proffer my advice.

It was a nice night in the last of June. I had just got myself into a scrape in the house for throwing dirty water over my sister's freshly done up linen, and was adding my reputation and my person by lying on my back under a tree in the orchard. I had my knees, and, looking at my left figures approaching. Not knowing to a certainty whether they were friends or foes, I lay still. They came toward the very tree under which I had taken quarters, and in a few moments were standing on the opposite side. It was Carrie Hutton and Phil Bartlett. I did not consider it entirely in the line of my duty to make myself known; in truth, I dare say I lay as still as possible—so still that I could hear her soft, as though she had just got over what women call "having a good cry." It was Phil's voice I heard first. He said,

"Oh, Carrie, why do you act so? You tell me that you love me, and then at some dark opposition that must separate us. If you love me, you will give up your engagement."

"Mr. Burdett, I have confessed to your ardor, to-night, what I thought I should be gainted enough to have died before I could do so. I love you; but to me you could have been nothing but a friend. And now, after all this night we are not even to that, and meet; when we part, we must part to meet no more forever. I have told you there is a barrier between us which can not be removed. I shall bear your memory with me through life, but I can not be mere to you than a memory—no more."

"Miss Hutton, will you listen to me?"—and I could see him sink on to and convulsively. "Without you I am lost. I have never before wound my heart on any one thing human. I have never known a mother's or a sister's love. I have never loved any thing in my life until I loved you. I can tell for you I can give the world and best against it; I can live for you alone; I can wait for you, bet it be years, centuries. Give me hope, or I die!"

How grand he looked—his fine form against the clear sky, his head slightly bent over the head he held. I could see his black eye flashing in the moonlight, and I could see his lips close, as though his mouth were sealed after the last word, and he stood waiting persuasion to live or die. There was perfect silence for a moment. Then Carrie spoke. In a moment her hand was withdrawn from his. Across the sentence; it needed not the words that followed.

"Mr. Burdett, let us not meet after to-night. To-morrow I shall expect to return as a friend; but as think of each other only as a dream—our wakes in life will run naked. You have told me that you intend to find a way to fame and wealth in the Far West. If I hear of you, I shall thrill with pleasure at your remembrance. If I do not, I shall still believe that you are happy; but I can give you no better proof of my love and esteem than by refusing to become your wife."

The wretch—how I hated her at that moment! What would I have given that Phil should have known her as well as I did! Before I could receive this in a mask we was on his knees before her. Then how I hated him!

"Miss Hutton—Carrie—love—hear me, see me! I am human; I am a man; I am not a woman. I am suing for more than life: I am asking for eternity. Carrie, I love you, I love you, I love you! I am also to hope. I am proud—to all the world I am proud—but to you I will be but as an atom of dust. Do not crush me forever."

And then she sobbed aloud. I felt as if I wanted to get up and help, and felt for the moment I was ashamed; but I knew it would do no good. I knew well how it would all end. Now she spoke:

"Mr. Burdett, Sir, rise; do not the humble yourself before me, a poor girl. Think if any one should see you. Rise, sir, I beg you, entreat you. I love you me, Sir, as dearly as you say, leave me and prove it by not attempting to see me again." (Sentence of death.) "I must leave you."

He rose; I could see his flushed color go from his face as he hastily arose; I could hear his teeth as he clenched, and the light go out of his eyes. I could see the sentence carried into effect, and could even risen to my feet and uttered with the heart, "God have mercy on your soul!" There was no mistaking the fact that I was a murderer. No moonlight could produce that look. I think he stood in this way perhaps ten minutes; and then he turned slowly from her, without a word, and strode away toward the road. I watched his figure till it grew so dim that it could not be seen, and then Miss Hutton watched it too. She stood under the tree a long time, how long I can not say, but I know I wished her gone that I might look at her. She cried, and sobbed, and occasionally I could hear a sort of moaning. She was not a heroine enough for her feelings; my sympathies had all gone off with the last figure in the distance.

The next morning at breakfast I watched the countenance of Miss Hutton attentively, as she announced to us that her intention of returning to New York that afternoon. She did not look at all like a heroine. She was very much pale, and in her manner of address made my quality more suggest that she was conscious I had overheard the interview of the previous evening; and she rode was a cloak for an opportunity to entreat my secrecy, or rather, into some justification of her course. It was not exactly to my taste. Had I been six years older, and she remained the same age as at that time, I think I could have had the style of girl I should have delighted to have got up a flirtation with, and seldom my heart for at night, but at fourteen, a boy's taste in women is fastidious, and nothing would strike him more harshly, next to her looking upon him as too young for her notice, than her being necessary in any affair of the heart whatsoever. I was therefore rather obliged to temporize, by pleading an engagement for a bathing party; and finding this overruled, I stipulated that I should be the rider of Fanny, the sorrel mare, while she should take the next choice. This being arranged, the matter was dismissed, and the course—my desire was for the road, Miss Hutton's the woods. I yielded. In an hour we were off. It required but a few minutes on our route to show me the motive that dictated it. She suspected me of a knowledge I did not possess, and desired to sound me. How she could have so much lacked an estimation of his character I can not tell, but it was clear to me that she thought I possessed Phil Bartlett's confidence. What folly, a boy of fourteen the confidant of a man of twenty-five! All the skill and all the diplomacy of a woman was brought to bear upon me; but I flatter myself that the same point of character that has since served me so well in my profession was then in force. I was as close as the grave. I heard every thing, and insisted upon proof.

I was right. Every thing that I had stipulated to ride Fanny. I am sure if Miss Hutton had ridden her she would never have reached home alive. I would have taken a bottle for fifty dollars between them. The gray bore her whipping nobly, and cut to her grounds as a staid old horse should cut; but still it must have been very trying to his feelings. It required all my skill—and I am not a bad horseman—to keep Fanny from bolting from sympathy. When we reached the house Miss Hutton had loosed the gray into a loose and box, self into a high flush, and a very irritable state of mind. We arrived just in time to meet at the gate two brothers, and a particular friend of the family, and likewise friends of Miss Hutton's, English gentlemen, who had been educated at the German University. Doctors John and William Tenbold enough, and poor enough, to be out of the range of matrimonial chances; and young enough, and rich enough, to be pleasant fellows and good companions. They were staying with some cousins very where, the joy of their coming made the departure of Miss Hutton, in the eyes of my sisters, a thing double to be deplored. She must stay. All joined in that prayer. I say all. I do not include myself. I was only a boy. My opinion did not amount to much; and yet my vanity told me that Miss Hutton would have cared more for my voice in the matter than all the rest. She was accompanied finally by a consent to remain until the following day, when Fanny was to be taken over to the city. That night was appointed for a moonlight excursion. The echoes of the Palisades were to be awakened with "Carrie Hutton to you." In the days when we went gipsying" for the last time, and altogether we were to have a jovial jolly time. I knew better. Not a word was said about Phil's going. Once or twice I felt I could be spiteful enough to assert that he should be there. But as my sisters said nothing, I thought my better course was silence. Carrie Hutton went over the sallies of the brothers, and toward afternoon was deep in a chess flirtation with Doctor John. I observed about five o'clock with a look that I knew my presence had become unpleasant to her. Sir, Yes, I determined to give her a piece of it! She was my first study in the intricacies of a woman, and I was fascinated by it. I watched her every look. I wished to hear every word she spoke. I weighted it and counted it; and then I got up and walked off. Then the moon did show, the water was beautiful; just enough of wind to make a wave that might be rolled back alive and ridden by an imaginary sprite. A specific, like stemboat crept up the opposite side, and the white sails of the village, like ghosts, floated on their silent way. A bugle sounded from the deck of one, and the echoes of the waters. It ceased, echoed and answered from boat to boat, contributed to give the river a solemn and quiet appearance, such as it should have. There is something, to me, mournfully beautiful in that cry of the fishermen, lifting their nets, on a Sunday on the Hudson. Away off, like a speck, lies the little boat; the light at her bow swaying with the rising of fishing-net, and the melodious sound call, peculiar to shad-fishermen since shad were first invented, come floating on the watery. It strikes the shore, and, with a hundred echoes, it flies back to the dancing lights on the river; it is caught in another voice, and so it goes on and on, to the boat, from voice to voice, up the river and down, from Spyder Zee to the Narrows. Every thing is in it.

The boat is ready; but, somehow, we did not seem as merry a party as should be; there is a shade, which I can not even account for, cast on the Doctors. Miss Hutton has her guitar; Doctor William made a flageolet; Doctor John, finally, to trail out an old Burchen song—a memory of the German school-days; Miss Hutton touches the guitar, the trespass the accompaniment on the flageolet under mechanical; no matter, the water will set all right. There is something in the movement of a boat upon the water provocative of music, and one time so suitable or beautiful for the human voice as moonlight and the water. We started, pleasantly away from the shore; the fishermen were coming in, bargaining for their morning's sport; we shot into the stream, the tide was flood, and as we were to go up, the farther we got into the stream the easier would be our work. We sang "Row, brothers, row;" we sang "Oft in the stilly night;" we let the oars rest and sang "Sweet and low" with the tide, dipping our hands in the warm and sparkling water as it murmured by the boat. I think any nature that has poetic feeling must agree that the true dolce far niente is floating idly in a boat, on a moonlight night, with the sweetest feeling of idleness, that can reach you nowhere else; that coolness that rises from water in the night, though there be not a breath stirring elsewhere; the excellence posture; the hand laving in the liquid silver; the hum of the insects on shore; the phosphorescent sparkle of the wave; the delicious drowsiness; all combine to make the perfection of abandonment.

The spirits of our little party had become somewhat elevated by a dust of the Doctors', in which

Miscellany.

—Very strange, and almost paradoxical, is the capability nearly every substance has of assuming, under certain conditions, certain changes which entirely alter its aspect, and to great extent change its uses and effects. Ice especially is this so with Food.

The tea which we daily drink, with health and pleasure, produces palpitations, nervous trembilings, and even paralysis, if taken in excess; yet the peculiar organic agents, called bioplasts—which tea owes its qualities—may be taken by itself (as theine), and as tea) without any appreciable effect. The water which will allay our burning thirst, augments it when congealed into snow; so that Captain Scoresby declares the natives of the Polar regions 'prefer enduring the utmost extremity of thirst rather than attempt to remove it by eating snow.' Yet if the snow be melted it becomes drinkable water; and it must be melted in the mouth. Nevertheless, although it be thus the most effective to moisten the mouth, it assuages thirst like other water, when it is melted in it like the rest. Experiments which render this paradox more striking, we have only to remember that ice, which melts more slowly in the mouth, is more effective in allaying thirst.

—The profoundest differences in effect may, and do, result from simple differences in the State of Subdivision.

"The water which drowns us as a fluent stream, can be walked upon as ice. The bullet which, when lifted from a mould, cannot cool itself, will be harmless if ground to dust before being fired. The crystallized perfume of the rose, which is scentless, is fragrance—a solid at ordinary temperatures, though readily volatile—in a compound substance, contains only exactly the same elements as the others, in exactly the same proportions, as the gas with which we lighten our streets."

—Again, as to the uses of substances which serve as food: to the chemist, who resolves all things into their constituent elements, there may seem little or no difference between except in the proportion of the physiologist, the difference is profound.

"He sees the lion perishing miserably of inanition in presence of abundant herbage, which to the elephant or buffalo furnishes all that is needful. The ox and the horse, he knows, can eat the ox, but will not touch the grass. The flesh of the ox nearly contains that which is not wholly contained in the grass; and the chemist analyzing the flesh of both may point out their identity; but the questions of Food is not one of chemical, but of physiological differents of different substances? but, 'What are the substances which will nourish?' and he answers, 'If the animal will not eat, or, having eaten, can not assimilate, a certain substance, that substance is no food for it, be its chemical composition what it may. It is a curious fact that the flesh-eating animals subsist chiefly, sometimes entirely, upon the herbivorous, each class refusing that which most resembles its own. We thus see that physiological or organic element is the estimate of food: unless the substance can be digested, it can not be assimilated, can not nourish. Digestion, then, is hope, if assimilated, the substance might have a high value. A pound of beef-steak contains an enormous quantity of incombustible matter, and over that contained in a pound of cabbage; yet to the rabbit the cabbage is the more valuable food, while to the dog the cabbage is no food at all."

—Water science has established have as to the relative value of such substance as food, there will be found considerable difficulty in applying these laws, owing to the peculiar influence of the vital principle, which is to great and so sumerous as to justify the adage that

One Man's Meat is another's Poison.

"Then, there is the difficulty of obtaining analysis that, in Europe and America, at least, men in more nutritious than vegetables, those who eat largely of animal being stronger and more enduring than those who eat little or none, we must be cautious in the application of such a principle. Difference of climate may, and difference of temperament certainly does, modify this question. The Arabian Sage, who lives on rice, dates, and milk, is mature, knock down, or in any other way prove superiority in strength over the Gaucho of the Pampas, who lives on flesh. And not only are some organisms ill adapted to a flesh diet, as we have seen, but, according to Andral, the sanguine man be ever knave scarcely ever touched animal food. This was a Dane, who could walk from spot to spot carrying a stone which was so heavy that it required two men to lift it on his shoulders; his chief diet was gallons of thick soup, and beer, of coffee—a diet which no ordinary man could support with success."

has been taken as the standard of food, because it is itself a nutriment which contains all the substances necessary for the nourishment of an organism during the most rapid period of growth.

"Out of milk, and milk alone, the young elephant, the young lion, or the young child, extracts all the various substances which compose muscles, nerves, bones, hair, claws, etc.; milk furnishes these in abundance; thus that the nourishment which is far greater during the period when the animal is fed exclusively on it than at any subsequent period of its career. 'Fit milk,' says Prout, 'we should expect to find a model of what an alimentary substance ought to be—a kind of prototype, as it were, of nutritious elements in general.' The idea is so plausible that its acceptance was general. Nevertheless, nothing is more certain than that milk is not the model food, since, however it may suit the young lion or the young child, we can not feed the adult lion or the adult man on milk alone: we can feed the adult on bones and water, and the man on bread and water, but not on milk. A true model food for the young, it ceases to be so for the adult; that relation which existed between the food and the organism in the one case, no longer exists in the other."

are resolved with vegetable food; but they are also taken separately, especially the acetic acid, or vinegar, which, according to Prout, has, either by accident or design, been employed by mankind in all ages—that is to say, substances not originally containing it have been employed as sources, or it has been formed artificially.

"It is curious to their social habits that vegetables are necessary to man, although not necessary to the carnivora. Dr. Budd justly points to the prejudice of abstinence from animal food vegetables and fruits as the cause of the scurvy among sailors. Cannon-balls is now always given to sailors with their food; it protects them from scurvy, which an amount of vinegar, however, is sufficient to effect. We make confection the lemon with vegetables, and our salads and greens demand vinegar, as our cold meat demands pickles. That the combination, also, is no doubt that vinegar is beneficial, but in excess it impairs the digestive organs; and experiments on artificial digestion show that if the quantity of acid be diminished, digestion is retarded; if increased beyond a certain point, digestion is arrested. There is reason, therefore, in the vulgar notion, unhappily too fondly relied on, that vinegar helps to keep down an alarming obesity; and the ladies who dread the disappearance of their graces will seldom be cured of plumpness without some 'fat,' may arrest so dreadful a result by liberal libations of vinegar; but they can only so arrest it at the far more painful expense of their health. The amount of acid which will keep them thin will destroy their digestive powers. Portal gives a case which should be

A Warning to Plump Young Ladies.

"A few years ago a young lady in easy circumstances enjoyed good health; she was very plump, had a good appetite, and a complexion blooming with roses and lilies. She began to hear that she was plumpness with suspicion; for her mother was very fat, and she was afraid of becoming like her. Accordingly she consulted a surgeon, who advised her to drink a glass of vinegar daily: the young lady followed her advice, and grew perceptibly thinner. She was delighted with the success of the experiment, and continued it for some days, when she began to have a cough; but it was dry at its commencement, and was considered as a slight cold, which would go off. Meantime, from a dry it became moist; a slow fever came on, and a difficulty of breathing with pain in the chest, which grew away; night-sweats, swelling of the feet and of the legs succeeded, and a diathesis terminated her life. The young ladies, be boldly fat! Never pine for graceful slimness and romantic pallor, but if nature seems you to be only ordinarily fat, accept it with a laughing grace, which will captivate more hearts than all the paleness of a love-sick heroine. At any rate, remember always that if vinegar will diminish the fat, it can only do so by sacrificing the health.

—Words can so further go than in this magnificent bit of Ruskin's. He is speaking of what a miller would call

A Heavy Sea.

"Its green mountainous giddiness of wrath; its overwhelming, as it were at you, lifted as though climbing against the sky in long cleven edges; its furrowed black and ghastly clear, deep to immeasurable death, but all laced across with lurid nets of spume, and tearing upon into meshed interstices of their chasms of silver fury, showing still the calm abyss below that has no fury and no voice, and is, as a grave, always open, which the green sighing mound do but hide for an instant as they pass."

—Woman," said Tom Brown, Captain of the Footer club, and a great believer of the sex, "woman is like a Portuguese devil: when she's good she's uncommonly good, but when she's bad she's a bad 'un. To which sentiment of an old seaman, an from spoken Philetatus Cauton, Esq.:

"A bad woman is popularly said to be worse than a wicked man; if so, partly because, possessing more solitary, breed more unceasingly ever cherished ideas, whether good or evil; partly also, for the same reason that makes a wicked woman, who has lost caste and character, more irreclaimably a wicked woman than a wicked man—because: viz., that in proportion to the loss of shame is the gain in recklessness; but principally, perhaps, because the average wickedness there is necessarily a distortion of the reasoning faculty; and man, accustomed to the cradle rather to reason than to feel, has that faculty more firm against abrupt twists and forces than it is in woman; where more easy from the first, from logic may still linger, and so may decline to push evil to a point at which it is clear to the understanding that reason vanishes and punishment rests; while woman, once abandoned to ill, finds sufficient charm in its new excitement with reason and consequence, where the man says, 'Can I?' raves out, 'I will.' Then man may be considered through reasoning, as very, love, jealousy, fear, ambition; rarely in civilized, that is, reasoning life, through lust and revenge; for hate is a profitless investment, and revenge a ruinous speculation. But when women are thoroughly bad they are unbridled, since time out of ten it is hatred or revenge that makes them so."

—There is an argument for

which the ladies and gentlemen now seeing that social question will thank us for receiving from the memoirs of that rank gossip, the Duke de Simon. He relates:

"When the King was with his ministers, when he received couriers, when the most important affairs were under discussion, she (the Dauphine) was present; and with what liberty, that, hearing the Duchess de Maintenon speak, she evening, with affection of the Court of England, at the time when peace was hoped for from Queen Anne,

'My aunt,' she said, 'you must admit that, in England, the queens govern better than the kings; and do you know why, my aunt?' asked she, running about and gamboling all the time; 'because under kings it is women who govern, and men under queens.'"

Quick Work.

P. H. G., in the London Literary Gazette, suggests a "new plantagenista process" which will recommend itself to impressible natures:

"There—toil in front, that cowlish one alone
The embrace of your arm, and your kiss,
Sit still for a few seconds: one—
Is—done! Now hard at me. 'Tis done.
Impressed by photographic art,
Your picture hangs on my heart."

—There is something wonderously and, rightly considered, sweetly familiar in many of the old legends of our children's days and nights. Take, for instance, the curious, among the lower classes of Northern Europe and Germany, and only now extracting curiosities among the higher classes. A nice example is this as the Norwegian peasantry familiarly call the great black woodpecker:

"Our Lord, in his wanderings on earth, accompanied by St. Peter (it is Thorpe who tells the story), came to a woman who wore a red hood on her head and was employed in kneading. The wanderers were weary and hungry; and our Lord begged the woman, whom he addressed as Gertrud, to bake a cake. She took a little dough and set it on to bake, but little as it was when it was set on, it soon filled the whole pan. Thinking that this was too large a cake, she took a smaller quantity, and again began to bake; but this also grew as large as the first. Gertrud then took still less dough, but this cake too swelled till it was as large as the others. Then said the woman, 'You must go without cake, for all my baking are too large for you!' Then was our Lord wroth, and he changed Gertrud's hood, because she grew it was nothing, then shalt for punishment become a bird. Thus shalt eternally be driven between the wood and the bark, and drink only when it rains.' The words were no sooner spoken than the woman was changed into a bird, which Gertrud Bird, and flew away through the kitchen chimney. At this day she is known by a red hood and black body, colored by the chimney soot. The Norwegian peasant points at her as she constantly pecks the bark of trees for nourishment, and says aloud: 'Ah! for she always thirsts and hopes to drink.'"

—A worm in Blackwood, who has evidently paid attention to the subject, asserts, as "a fact worth remembering," that the

is not an invention of these latter days.

"There were unmarried women long ago, before civilization had reached the point it has now, while all the heroines in all the novels were still married and eighteen—and they were always eighteen when I ever began, or there was a woman in existence qualified to write it—unmarried ladies existed in this world, though nothing to do. Many hundred, nay, thousand, years ago, there was even a certain disinterested and remarkable person, called Miriam, who, willful and womanlike, and unquestionably unmarried, was still so far from being dismissed into nonentity that when her mission waited for her till she was able to join their journey. And there was Deborah, who, long ago, eighteen hundred years ago, gave any thing but an inferior place to the unwedded maidens of the time. It was a very long period for the things that belong to the Lord, how slowly pleas the Lord, and to the writer of Judges; and many an unmarried woman since his day has proved his existence, happily unwitting of all the philosophies which should prove to her her laxity and comfortless she ought to had herself, and what hard cut her nerves, and how, notwithstanding, it behooved her to make some certain amount of and and patient continue to vindicate her womanly credit with the world.

—So much is said and sung in praise of country life that our quarrel seems not to be with us as for quoting a refreshing word from the otherside—the jocular and merrie side—of the question: such as the following from the pages of Arcadia:

"I have long since found that the country, in their simplicity and their love of the marvelous, are an Arcadian innocence; that its apparent simplicity is sometimes dogged stupidity; that men lie and cheat in the country as much as they do in the town; and that the country has even more of mischievous stupidity. That sorrow, and misery, and misery may quite well live in Elizabethan cottages grown over with honey-suckle and jasmine; and that very sad eyes may look out from windows covered which roses twine. Virtue and religion are plants of difficult growth, in the country; and the most outstanding Cowper's exquisite poem, I am not sure that 'the calm retreat, the silent shade, with prayer and praise agree' better than the closet into which the weary man may enter, in the quiet street, and bolt the business and the world out. People may pare up and down a country lane, between fragrant hedges of blossoming hawthorn, and not dream of neighbor characters to very shrub. And the eye that is sharp to see the pinnatest object on the field-side or hedge may be blind to the beauty which is spread over all the landscape."

Speaking of Infidelity,

Bishop Horne once said, that to reject the evidence of prophesy till all divines shall agree exactly about it, argues a conduct as wise in the infidels as if they should decline sitting down to a good dinner till all the clocks in London and Westminster struck four together.

Happiness.

"There are two things which will make us happy in this life, if we attend to them. The first, never to vex ourselves about what we can't help; and the second, never to vex ourselves about what we can help."

A MARRIAGE REMEMBRANCE.

SHE came to me in winter time,
When diamonds fell in show'rs
That fring'd the trees with fairy light,
And gemm'd the rustic bow'rs.
Her cheeks then mock'd the holly's fruit—
Her brow the sunlit snow—
Her eyes of clear celestial blue,
With love did overflow.
She came to me in youthful prime,
With anxious, trembling heart;
I feel I never can forget
The joy she did impart.

She came to me in winter time,
And own'd a passion pure,
That, lighted by Truth's constant flame,
Must ever fix'd endure.
Affection's sparkling tear then shone,
And linger'd on its way;
Like that bright sun-illumin'd star
Which decks the frozen spray.
She came to me in winter time,
With anxious, trembling heart;
Indeed I never can forget
The joy she did impart.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER V.

Revealing glimpses of Guy Darrell's past in his ewiest prime. Big but deep enough, and under all earth runs water, and life runs grief.

ALTON in the streets, the vivacity which had characterized Darrell's countenance as well as his words, while with his old school fellows, changed as suddenly and as completely into passive attentiveness as if he had been now a pupil, and with the exit the acting ceased. Disinclined to return yet to the solitude of his home, he walked on, at first mechanically, in the restless desire of movement, he cared not whither, so as that chanced-like, he found himself in the centre of that long straight thoroughfare which connects what once were the separate villages of Tyburn and Knightsbridge, mounting in the desultory links of reverie suggested as object to his senses. He had but to follow that street to his right hand to gain, in a quarter of an hour, a sight of the humble dwelling-house in which he had first settled down, after his early marriage, to the arid labors of the law. He would go, now that wealthy and renowned, he was revisiting the long deserted focus of English energies, and contemplate the obscure abode in which his powers had been first concentred on the pursuit of renown and wealth. Who amongst the passers-by that may have risen on the glittering steep (*) Ah, who can tell how hard it is to climb has not been similarly attracted towards the roof, at the craggy foot of the ascent, under which golden dreams reflected his visionary gleams? Somewhat quickening his step, now that a bourne was assigned to them, the man growing old in years, but, unhappily for himself, in tenacious of youth in its grand discontent, and keen susceptibilities to pain, strode, unheeding on, under the gaslight, under the stars; gaslights partly manufactured at equidistance; stars that soon, to the naked eye, dotted over space without symmetry or method—Man's order, man and brute, is so distinct; the Maker's order, remote, infinite, is so beyond Man's comprehension even of what is order!

Darrell paused, hesitating. He had now gained a spot in which improvement had altered the landmarks. A newly-built thoroughfare continued where once it had vanished abrupt in a labyrinth of courts and alleys. But the way was not hard to find. He turned a little toward the left, recognising, with admiring interest, in the grey wall to-wall-be Grecian edifice, that his French gridu, bronzed, gilded, the transformed Museum, as the still desirous of what he had sometimes snatched a brief and ghostly respite from books of law. Onward yet through lifeless Bloomsbury, not so far onward as had bounded of Atlas as the desolation of Poddon Place, but the solitude deepening as he passed. Solitude it is, a quiet street indeed! not a soul on its gloomy pavements—not even a policeman's soul. A night starting save a stealthy, prodigious, good-for-nothing cat, flitting fan through you area ben. Issue that street had he entered, but now with a livelier, quicker step the day when, by the strange good luck which had uniformly attended his worldly career of honour, and had been suddenly called upon to supply the place of an absent senior, in almost his earliest brief, that the Courts of Westminster had recognised a master; come, I trow, with a livelier step, knocked at that very door whereat he is halting, gaily entered the room where the young wife sat, and at sight of her anxious perturbed face, and the sound of her unsympathizing languid voice, fled into his cabinet—shook back parchment—and muttered "courage"—courage to—and master-head and heart longing for a voice which should invite and respond to a cry of joy.

How closed up, dumb, and blind, looked the small mean house, with its small mean door, its small mean rayless windows. Yet a FAIRY had been born there! Who are the residents now? Buried in slumber, have they any "golden dreams?" Works herein any struggling brain, to which the prosperous man might whisper "courage;" or beats, there, any troubled heart to which faithful woman should murmur "joy?" Who knows? London is a wondrous poem, but each page of it is written in a different language; no lexicon yet composed for any.

Back through the street, under the gaslight, under the stars went Guy Darrell, more slow and more thoughtful. Did the comparison between what he had been, what he was, the mean home just revisited, the stately home to which he would return, suggest thoughts of natural pride? it would not seem so; no pride in those close-shut lips, in that melancholy stoop.

He came into a quiet square—still Bloomsbury—and therein was a stately and somewhat sombre mansion, almost as large as that one in assertive quarters, to which he loiteringly declared the hour return. There, too, had been, for a time, the dwelling which was called his home—here, with style and rolling in like a tide, distinction won, position assured, there—not yet in Parliament, but foremost at the bar, already pointed by constituencies, already vowed by ministers—there, still young (oh, luckiest of lawyers!)—should he not be moved to household gods. Fit residence for a Prince of the Gown. Is it when living there that you would envy the prosperous man? Yes, the moment he steps into that door; but envy him when he enters its threshold? Envy, envy rather that selfish, cheerydyed villain who crept under yonder portico, asleep with his ragged arm crooked for a pillow, his stupid thornless? There, in that great barren drawing-room, sits a "Pain and elegant Asceta."

Well, but the wife's face is not querulous now. Look again—mournful, fearful, secret, sly. Ah, that fine lady, a Vipont Crooke, is not contented to be wife to the wealthy man. What then? What want that he does not gratify? Is it the fashionable fine Mrs. Darrell? Pride in him? not a jot. Pride in such pride was unknown. Were he proud of her, as a Christian husband ought to be of so elegant a wife, would he call her a Bloomsbury? Envy her! the high gentleman, so true to his blood, all gallant and chivalrous by nature, so courtly in the world-moving, tend-eating manner of the Lady Selinat. Envy him! well, why not? All women have their foibles. Is it, then, a foible in her to be forlorner. Is that all? wherefore, then, is her square no longer? Oh, no worry for her, no blustrant storenes? Tut, what so brings into covetted fashion a fair lady exiled to Bloomsbury as the mental adjustment of a long absent lord, who gives law to St. James's? Untempted by tension, cold and distant, the husband's face at a flash of a sentiment, secretly preferring the husband she chose, wooed, and won, to elders less gifted even in outward graces than he, and by seeking, coquetting for, the éclat of dishonor? It's clear! Oh, no worry for her, born to be engazed at and talked of, as the fair Mrs. Darrell, to whom the Loveless of London was so fondly devoted. Why, laughter on the Bloomsbury Dame, ere she was yet—the fashion! Happy in grief the widower who may, with confiding hand, transmute the bride's bouquet into the rose that no thought concealed from him in life will again accompany into the tremendous tomb! But that pale, proud mourner, hurrying the eye over sweet-scented billets, compelled, in very justice to the dead, to restore himself at once to the cher of his children was corrupt only at heart—was cold, reserved, as he came to see in after time—and, wretchedly consoled by that ingenerally conviction, flinging into the flames the last flimsy tatters on which his honor (cock-like in his own keeping) had been fluttering to and fro in the breeze of the world's opinion. Envy you dear mourner? No! not even in his release. Memory is not useless, he would say, nor coffin; and to great loyal natures, less bitter is the memory of the lost when hallowed by tender sadness than the remembrance, even, of shame.

The visit is dead. Dead, too, long years ago, the Lothario! The world has forgotten them; they fade out of this very record when yo tyre the page; it is needless, no longer, that they on such future events as may mark what yet rests of life to the man. Enough, if the man stands and gazes into space, the two forms are before his eye as distinct as if living still. Slowly slowly he turns those forms to the false smiles flicker away from their feeble lineaments; woe and horror on their aspects—they sink, they shrivel, they dissolve!

THREE WEEKS WITH THE STOCK-GAMBLERS.

MY friend Miles Flenderleah had often said to me to try my luck. He said that young hands always won—that there was a Providence which watched over them as there is in the case of poor Jack and drunken men. He added that I had only to follow his advice and I would infallibly double my money in thirty days. As to Central, he said it was plain that it was going up; it was equally certain that Erie was going down; which was the best—buy Central or sell Erie?

I told I would neither buy Central—forgiving from his aliveation to selling Erie, that he took for granted that I owned some, and not liking to confess that I didn't.

So I gave him a thousand dollars, just what I realized from my share of Uncle Joshua's estate, and he, the day after, handed me a paper to the effect that Messrs. Bull, Bear, & Co., brokers, had purchased per my order and for my account one hundred New York Central, at eighty odd. I didn't sleep much that night. I sneezed on going to bed and woke up dreaming that the Central Railway had been sold out by the Sheriff for taxes. I began to doubt, and as I owed, prospectively, a hundred shares of Central stock, I might be elected a Director, and I knew that Messrs. Tallow, Grease, & Co., my employers, would never stand that. At times I reflected on the possible decline in the value of the stock, and I saw my thousand dollars melting away at the rate of a hundred dollars a day. Central never rose, and Bull, Bear, & Co. were after me, furiously demanding more margin. This vision recurred so frequently, that toward morning I made up my mind to close the transaction and got back the money I had deposited.

I fell asleep on this resolution.

Before I was dressed next morning, Miles was in my room.

"Doing pretty well, old boy!" said he, joyously. "Central went up a quarter last evening."

"The devil it did!" I answered, rapidly figuring up the profits at the advance.

"Yes, Sir! and it's bound to go to ninety. Mark my word!"

"Do you think so?"

I decided, within the wicket, that I would not sell out as yet. I went to the store, and read all the money articles. Flam was a fool, evidently—he mentioned Central. Flam was green, and Cram was eloquent, positively sublime. I can not say that I was much edified by the duties in hydrostatics of Messrs. Tallow, Grease, & Co. as I ought to have been. I did my work mechanically and carelessly. Mem.

That day Central went up one per cent. Next morning I bought another fifty. Profits were a hundred dollars, one month's salary! I went to the office as usual, but I could scarcely endure the drudgery. Visions of working hard for a paltry pound for twenty-five dollars, as Messrs. Tallow, Grease, & Co. called their clerks, were all that I did of doing, seemed to me the acme of meanness when a hundred could so easily be made.

In the course of the next ten days Central rose four, six, six, and eight, consecutively. I had already decided to buy a house in Fifth Ave., a true friend, and a sagacious operator. I could, at any time I chose to realize, make in the fortnight nearly as much as my whole salary for a year. Needless to add that I paid very little attention to my duties. Several instances which ought to have been posted were left over for several days; one, a matter of some consequence, a purchase of cassia, which I had made on the enlightened view of the Arabanus Islanders, I actually lost. It was subsequently found in the Custom House desk. Old Tallow was sanguine, and hinted that whatever misfortune in the shape of a loss might befall, he properly kept. Young Grease took me aside, in his kind, friendly way, and said,

"Mr. Flam tells me, Sam," "I see how it is. You must be aware that we perceive you have not been as careful as we could wish of late. You can see at a glance that there's a lady in the case. Now, my dear boy, take my advice, and hurry it up. You're worrying yourself for nothing, by-being off and on. Get married at once, and we'll do something handsome for you, Sam."

I looked very sternly at Mr. Grease, and thanked him, saying that he was mistaken; that I did not contemplate matrimony at present, that so long as I remained in it, my situation appeared to me to require undivided attention.

He replied, "Oh! if that is the case, very well." And I, knowing that I had made twice as much as he had within the month, felt humiliated at having put him down.

Next day one of Messrs. Bull, Bear, & Co. invited me to the office of these eminent brokers. Old Mr. Bull, a fat old gentleman, with a sleek head, received me in a very friendly manner, and observed that the stock which I had purchased through them was very fortunate since my purchase; that I could now sell out and make a thousand dollars profit; that he thought that was a great deal of money; that he understood I was a bookkeeper in a grocery-house, and without wettering to give advice, he would, nevertheless, advise to speculate in stocks, that I did it through some other house than theirs.

The cold water of my hope while in making this speech, and took considerable pains to make them understand that he acted entirely unbiased. He made a few remarks about the inevitable ruin of young men who speculates in stocks, and almost kicked me back to stick to my employers; but I was in no humor to listen to counsel; I demand, of my client to sell out for me, and left.

I had, as Miles had prophesied, doubled my money in a little over a fortnight. We dined together that evening (I paid for the dinner), and when I heard Miles talk about stocks, I could not explain to myself why he was not as rich as William B. Astor, he appeared to know so much more than any one else. When I asked him the reason, in a playful manner, he laughed, and said he could make all he wanted, and desired no more. He was a bachelor, he said, and a couple of hundred dollars a week satisfied his modest necessities. Would I try another speculation? Chesapeake Bonds?

He agreed that night to go into more stock speculations. I had a check for two thousand in my pocket, and could raise five hundred more. With this for my share, we could buy more Central, Reading, Cleveland and Toledo, Rock Island, Galena, Panama—and I don't know how many other stocks besides. He knew so much more than I did that I did little else but listen, open-mouthed, to his convincing arguments, and drink the wine. The end of it was that I handed him over two checks—that of Bull, Bear, & Co., and another upon my cousin, who was my private banker, for the five hundred I had saved.

Next day I was notified that Mr. Curbstone (a friend to Mr. Grease of Miles and, as much as exacting rascal at old Bull or Bear) had bought, per my order and for my account, more stocks than I have the slightest recollection of.

I sat down at Tallow, Grease, & Co.'s desk, and figured up what I had lost. The sum total which I had made in my first ventures, these last would not me right thousand dollars. That, with what I had, would enable me to keep a flat there, to make a few presents to Maria, and, in the spring, to go to Europe, and live like an honest gentleman. I ran out at one to see the first board; every thing was up; my profits had already begun. When I returned to the office my cash was in a white. A pile of accounts lay on my desk to be entered. Some of them had lain there several days.

Mr. Grease came in, drew my attention to them, and left. I spent the afternoon in figuring up my profits at various rates. Toward evening, I was preparing to leave; I wished to call and see the second board before going home; and Mr. Tallow looked into the office, and, turning to Wax & Stee, the porters, said to them,

"Why, Mr. Flat, I don't see that last transaction with those people entered!"

"Ah!" said Wax, carelessly; "then I suppose I must enter it to-morrow."

"Mr. Flat, that's not the way we do business, Sir, I'd have you to know, Sir!" and the old man's voice rose.

"Don't go into a heat, Mr. Tallow," said I, feeling no small contempt for the old man, for the whole interest of the house account was not equal to a day's profits on a hundred shares; "the fact is, I'm tired of keeping your books."

"Mr. Grease," said he to the porter, "draw a check for Mr. Flat's balance."

"Never mind the cents," said I, proudly.

So I left the employ of Tallow, Grease, & Co., and felt myself free to engage in the delightful and lucrative occupation into which my mind had minuted me.

Next day I was in Wall Street bright and early. My new friend, Curbstone, introduced me to several of his friends, who were well acquainted with the stocks; he told them the nature of the operation. I took a pretty high stand at first with them, not knowing their manners; but we became quite familiar. They all said that I would make my fortune in a month. Bill Put, a leading authority, assured me that the Michigan Railway was going to declare a half-yearly dividend of nine per cent; he had it confidentially from the President. Bill Call confided to me that the Barings and the Bank of England had undertaken to lend ten millions to the Erie, at four per cent. Interest. Bill Call was a Director, and it might be relied upon. Jack Shyster was authorized to state that the Board of Illinois was about to buy the Rock Island Road, taking the stock at ten per cent. premium. These facts comforted me a good deal, and therefore, when I which I had bought rather declined during the day, I readily believed the reasons for so doing that they called a "natural reaction," and dined very snugly with Put, Call, and a couple of other good fellows. When, by-the-way, slightly late on the bill, at an up-town restaurant.

Next day stocks fell one to two per cent. I felt uneasy. I did not, however, fear up the losses against me at present prices. It could do no good if I called on the directors in the morning. He was rodiant.

"Nothing is it, my dear fellow! All a device of the rascally bears! We'll have them on the hip presently."

Call was of the same mind. He had a private letter from Ohio to say that the President had ordered all the ordinary annual meetings, expectation to be carried over the Cleveland and Toledo road, and double rates of freight to be paid for coal. Jack Shyster was very sharp on the thought the bears should be arrested for swindling, and depreciating the value of the Erie property.

What comforted me more than all this was that the Timbuctoo Mining Company, in which I had bought a hundred shares, was rapidly advancing. As Curbstone said, I was sure to make money in that, whatever happened to the other stocks.

That afternoon stocks fell heavily. I was very unhappy. I called on all my Wall Street friends, but they were all engaged. In the evening I went I got into conversation with the omnibus-driver, and asked him what he thought of speculation.

He confessed that he knew nothing about it, but he didn't see how there railroads could make any money at the present rate.

"Hold your tongue, you fool!" said I, swearing at him; and he growled, and went on driving.

My landlady, to whom I propounded a few questions about Erie, further exasperated me by saying that her brother-in-law, a carpenter most uncivil people, and she hoped they'd all "go to smash"—and never was heard.

I slept little that night. Of course I called on Curbstone before he left his boarding-house. He had no doubt whatever of the future, he said. The world could not always be deluded by the wiles of the villainous, lying, dishonest, vile, scoundrelly, thievish bears. There must come a ray of sunshine sooner or later. The only thing was to hold on—and while he was on this head, he thought it was but right that he should suggest that my margin was nearly exhausted, and could I let him have a little more money?

I promised to call on him, and went down town. On my way I fell in with Jones, one of Curbstone's acquaintances. He, like myself, had bought stocks, and was disgusted by the fall. He held in his hand Flam's last money article, which was opposed to a rise in the stock-market; and we agreed that a more knavish, lying rogue than Flam did not exist. Jones promised to have his uncle, the paper-maker, call on the editor of Flam's paper, and have the fellow discharged.

When I saw the Stock List that morning it took away my breath. Stocks —all my stocks—had fallen from three to five per cent. "How, in the name of all that is reasonable, did this happen?" said I to a broker.

"Why, Sir, you see, that fellow Curlstone, and his friends, went in to hammer down the market, and had it all their own way. Great operator, Curlstone!"

"But he's the very man who persuaded me to buy."

"Ah! very likely: you should have got out in time. He turns like an eel; you never know where to find him. A great operator, Curlstone. Good-morning!"

STOCKS DOWN.

I hurried, furious, to Curlstone's office. As I entered a clerk handed me a note. It stated, in brief, that Mr. Curlstone had closed all my contracts for want of more margin, and that the transaction left me in his debt in the sum of $463 50, which he desired me to pay forthwith! I was overwhelmed.

But one hope was left. The shares in the Timbuctoo Mining Company had risen that very morning four per cent. My profit on them would at least enable me to pay my debts. I hastened to the office of old Scallywag, who had bought them for me.

"Sir," said he, when he saw me, "this is a hard dispensation. Providence punishes us cruelly at times."

"What do you mean?"

"The fall in stocks, of course. My dear young friend, you are young and elastic; misfortunes glide off from you—glance, I may say, like a musket-ball on the ice. But an old man like me—oh! Providence is very hard!" And the old man put his hand to his eyes.

I was somewhat touched by the old gentleman's sympathy for me, and added, more cheerily than I had thought I could, "At all events, Mr. Scallywag, our Timbuctoo is all right. There is a balance in my favor of some six per cent., and I will thank you to realize it."

"Poor young man!"

"Can you let me have a check?"

"Why!" he answered, sharply, "haven't you heard?"

"No. What?"

"I failed this morning."

How I got home I know not. I remember looking at Mrs. Scallywag's carriage, and wondering what part of it, or of the horses, or of the lady, my $600 had paid for. In the course of the evening, in the depth of my agony, I told my story to my landlady, who gave me notice that at the end of the week my room would be wanted.

I am now living in a wretched little attic in Frankfort Street. I have no employment. Old Tallow declines to reinstate me, of course. Grease lent me ten dollars to go on with, he says. If any of you will employ me, at even six dollars a week, pray send word to the editor of this journal, and you may rely upon it that you will not catch me stock-gambling again—so long, at all events, as I continue sane.

N.B.—Miles has just called to say that, having made his fortune, he was about to start for Europe, for a lengthened tour of pleasure; and had taken the bulk of his means in notes of the Bank of England and gold. His clerk had the key of his safe, in which the money was deposited. The very evening before the steamer sailed the young man had the folly to go into a fashionable gambling-house in Broadway. He very speedily lost all the money he had of his own; but feeling that luck was certain to turn if he could only hold on a while (being assured that this was so by the proprietor of the saloon), he hastened back to the office, took out a bundle of notes and a handful of Miles's gold, returned to the faro-bank, and lost the whole. Again he went back to the office, and returned again, and again lost. To make an end of the story, he lost all Miles's money!

"The young rascal!" as Miles said; "one might almost forgive him the robbery, but to go to a gambling-house! Shocking!"

A STUPENDOUS RISE.

A TREMENDOUS FALL.

STOCKS UP.

PERSONAL ANECDOTES OF THE LATE THOMAS H. BENTON.

BY A WASHINGTONIAN.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly.

LET justice, at least, be done to the dead. While it can not be denied that the late Colonel Benton, in the Senate and on the stump, was, if you please, egotistical, dogmatical, imperious, and, at times, exceedingly violent, harsh, and offensive, in his personal disputes, there is another side to the picture which should not be overlooked. I refer to Benton as the private individual, and to his genial, simple, and winning ways, in his social relations. In this connection I hope the following personal anecdotes may find a place in the columns of your popular paper. Respect for the memory of an old friend, and a belief that these reminiscences will be really acceptable to your readers—trifles though they are—have induced me to put them to paper.

Yours, truly, * * *

THE CADI, OR ALCALDE, OF SAN FRANCISCO.

On the 27th day of November, 1847, at the court-martial of Lieutenant-Colonel Frémont, at Washington, the following conversation took place; which, as illustrative of the genial, social qualities of Colonel Benton, made at the time a lasting impression upon the mind of the writer. The day in question was one of those soft, luxurious, balmy, and golden days peculiar to the Indian summer of the South. The misty and purple atmosphere which invested the landscape of broad rivers, and their surrounding amphitheatre of swelling hills, as with a halo of supernatural beauty, seemed also to entrance the heart and the imagination in a waking dream of ethereal loveliness. Hence, perhaps, in some degree, the charming vivacity of Colonel Benton on that day of our lovely Indian summer, which, in those latitudes, is indeed the "Sweet Sabbath of the year."

The court was held at the Arsenal, which, at the southern extremity of Washington, occupies between the Potomac and the Eastern Branch a position like that of the Battery of New York. With a few scattered houses here and there over the broad, level common intervening, the aforesaid Arsenal lies over two miles from the main body of the city; a fine walk on a fine day—a walk which frequently, including the day under our pencil, we have made with Colonel Benton and his "children of the mountains," returning from the court.

The court was in session. Edwin Bryant, formerly of Kentucky, a California protegé of Frémont, was called up as a witness, and was under examination by Colonel Benton—who, with his son-in-law, Mr. Carey Jones, was the counsel for the defense. [In 1846, when California was revolutionized by Frémont, he made Mr. Bryant alcalde of San Francisco, then a straggling Mexican village of adobe houses; the Mexican local institutions of the country, pro tempore, being adopted by the American conquerors.] Colonel Benton put the following question to Mr. Bryant:

Question. "Did you, as cadi, or alcalde, of San Francisco, purchase any town lots?" etc.

The officers of the court pricked up their ears. What could this mean? Alcalde was something they understood, but what was a cadi? The court was cleared for a private discussion upon the admissibility of this mysterious question, and defendant, counsel, witnesses, reporters, and spectators, accordingly passed out into a large retiring room provided for the purpose. Among the witnesses were nearly a dozen of Frémont's mountain men.

The company having taken their seats upon some benches which surrounded a long, rough table, the following conversation ensued.

REPORTER. "Colonel Benton, may I ask you the meaning of that question upon which we have been turned out of court; and the application, particularly, of that word cadi?"

COLONEL BENTON. "Yes, Sir; and I am gratified that you have asked the question. Come up here, boys. These are my boys, Sir. They are the children of the mountains, my children; because they have been and are Frémont's brothers, Sir; bound together by the bonds of suffering and hardships in the deserts and mountains, as brethren of the same family altar. Boys, that last question was rather a poser to the court, wasn't it?"

ONE OF THE BOYS (a full-grown muscular mountaineer). "Yes, Sir, they didn't seem to understand what you meant by calling Bryant the cadi of San Francisco."

COLONEL BENTON. "Well, now, do you understand it? We all want to know."

THE BOY. "No, Sir, unless the cadi and the alcalde are the same thing."

COLONEL BENTON. "That's it, Sir. Right to the point, like a true son of the mountains. Now, I suppose, you would like to know why I put in the cadi, when I could have left him out just as well?"

THE BOYS. "Yes, Sir."

COLONEL BENTON. "Because the cadi was the father of the alcalde. Did you know that, Bryant? (General laughter among the boys.) Listen. The Spaniards and Mexicans settled California, bringing with them the language, religion, laws, officials, customs, and institutions of Spain. Among their officials was the alcalde. You, boys, found him in the person of a Spanish-Mexican in San Francisco. You, Bryant, took his place and his name, and thus, officially, you became a descendant of the cadi."

REPORTER. "Yes, Sir; but who was the cadi, and how was he the father of the alcalde?"

COLONEL BENTON. "Coming to that, Sir. But we must be quick, or the court may settle the knotty point before we do. Listen, boys. You have read the stories of the Arabian Nights—a thousand and one. You have all noticed the minute details which they give of domestic life in the East at that day, and how frequently the cadi occurs as the officer of the peace. Let us begin there with the cadi. He was the mayor among the Saracens. At the time of the Crusades they were the most highly civilized people in the world. The Dark Ages of Europe were the Light Ages of the East. The Saracens extended their conquests, and carried their institutions, arts, and refinements from Damascus westward around the southern side of the Mediterranean to the Atlantic. At that point they were known as Moors; from that point they crossed over (a romantic story) into Spain, conquered it, occupied it, beautified it, and held it, or a great part of it, for seven hundred years. Yes, boys, for seven hundred years. It was an armed occupation all this time. They were a refined, cultivated, and luxurious people; but they were also a brave and warlike race. With the junction of the Christian forces of Ferdinand and Isabella, at the time of Columbus, the Moors were finally driven back into Africa—a dark and bloody chapter of cruel persecutions. But the Moorish cadi remained the chief of all the towns in Spain. El cadi, or al cadi—which is, the cadi—however, became corrupted into alcalde, and alcalde came over with Cortéz into Mexico, and went with the Spanish adventurers and missionaries to San Francisco. So you see, boys, we trace the official pedigree of Bryant, here, back to Cortéz, to Columbus, to Spain, to the royal Moors, and eastwardly around the south side of the Mediterranean to Antioch, Jerusalem, Damascus, and away back to the cadi of the Arabian Nights."

REPORTER. "Well, Colonel, I wonder if that's what's puzzling the court all this time?"

COLONEL BENTON. "Oh no; they are speculating upon those town lots. But, boys, where does San Francisco come from?"

ONE OF THE BOYS. "From some Spanish saint, I reckon. They name every place after some saint or other."

COLONEL BENTON. "In this case the saint is an English sea captain—Sir Francis Drake. The name of your town, therefore, comes from England, sanctified by the Spaniards; while Bryant's official title, alcalde, comes from the Orient—an Oriental title, older than Haroun Al Raschid—the cadi."

MR. BRYANT. "I accept your explanation, Colonel. Let it be the cadi. Are you agreed, boys?"

THE BOYS. "All agreed."

COLONEL BENTON. "Carried unanimously. Such, boys, are the uses of history. A link here and there fills up the chain from our day and ourselves to the most distant ages and dim traditions of the past. Thus, in Mexico, we may now find some of the fashions, customs, domestic and farming implements almost the same as in Egypt in the time of Moses. For instance, one of the most cruel tasks imposed upon the Israelites in Egypt was the task of making bricks without straw. The cadi, or alcalde, of San Francisco, here, can understand that. The bricks of the ancient Egyptians were the same as the bricks of your adobe houses in California and Mexico, unburned or sunburned bricks. Straw mixed with the clay holds them together. The poor Israelites, not being supplied with the straw by their masters, had to find it themselves."

VOICE FROM THE INNER TEMPLE. "Court's open." And here ends our story of the cadi, or alcalde, of San Francisco.

SPANISH AND AZTEC NAMES.

In another interval of the Court, upon a hint thrown out, Colonel Benton thus discoursed upon Spanish and Aztec names:

COLONEL BENTON. "One of our boys has said that the Spanish name every thing after some saint or other. It is so. The habit was the result of that seven hundred years' war with the Moors—a religious war, between Christianity and the creed of Mohammed. With the expulsion of the Moors the Christian conquerors of Spain became outrageously aggressive. They sought to carry their religion every where, and they did carry it into all their discoveries in the New World, by fire and sword. Cortéz was one of these crusading fanatics. The spot where he landed in Mexico he named the True Cross—Vera Cruz. The same partiality for holy names had infused itself into the whole Spanish race. So from San Augustine to San Francisco, from Santa Fé to Ciudad de los Angeles (the City of the Angels—beautiful name), throughout the Spanish possessions, their names of towns, rivers, etc., bear the evidences of that intense religious feeling peculiar to the race. On the other hand, as with all other races of men in all ages, the Aztecs frequently imparted their local names from some distinguishing feature in the locality itself; and as we have adopted many of these aboriginal names, so were they adopted by the Spaniards. In the Aztec, tepec means hill, and petl, mountain. Thus Tehuan-tepec, Lion Hill (in honor of Cortéz); Chapul-tepec, Grasshopper Hill; Popoçate-petl, or Smoking Mountain—pooh-pooh, as you puff the smoke from a pipe."

THE DUCHESS OF MARLBOROUGH'S LAP-DOG AND THE OREGON QUESTION.

After Colonel Benton's second speech in reply to General Cass, upon the Oregon question, the writer, in a conversation with the Missouri Senator, alluded to the happy incident of Mrs. Masham and the lap-dog of the Duchess of Marlborough, as employed in the debate.

COLONEL BENTON. "Yes, Sir, twenty years had elapsed since my reading of that incident; but when it was brought forward by General Cass to show what trifling causes sometimes produce the most disastrous wars, I remembered the story as if I had read it but yesterday. Mrs. Masham was a favorite of the Court of Queen Anne; for the Queen was a little jealous of the glory reflected from the Duke upon the Duchess of Marlborough. One day the lap-dog of the Duchess spoiled a beautiful silk dress of Mrs. Masham—you may guess how; and naturally enough a quarrel followed between the two ladies. The Queen took the side of the injured party; the results were of the greatest moment to the whole world of mankind. Yes, Sir,

"'When there is a lady in the case,
Of course all other things give place.'

The siege of Troy, the head of John the Baptist, Bluff Harry the Butcher's quarrel with the Pope, and, within our own day, the dissolution of General Jackson's first Cabinet, are among the proofs of the controlling power of woman's beauty and woman's caprices over the hearts of princes and the affairs of nations. But there is no case of the sort more remarkable than that of Mrs. Masham and the Duchess of Marlborough's lap-dog. The Duke was recalled from the Continent, a suspension of the war followed, and the treaty of Utrecht, where I found my first and best authority for the line of 49°, as our northern boundary of Oregon. And thus we may say, Sir, that that little lap-dog of the Duchess of Marlborough has done more to put an end to this silly cry of 'fifty-four forty or fight' than any other party in the debate. Such are the trifles that control the greatest events. In your readings treasure them up."

THE ROUND TABLE.

Calling one day at the house of Colonel Benton upon a matter of business, the writer found him and his family seated at dinner around a round table.

"Walk in, Sir. The round table, you perceive, and the knights thereof, including the children. This is Democratic equality, Sir, in the family circle. Will you join us? The guest does not break the chain. As with the Arabs, he that eats of our salt is our friend. He that refuses is our enemy. Take your choice, and take a glass of wine."

THE WOOLLY HORSE.

In the summer of 1849 the woolly horse was brought to Washington, and, with a flaming hand-bill in front of the door, it was exhibited on Pennsylvania Avenue, on the same square on the C street side of which Colonel Benton resided. He could not, by his usual route to the Capitol, come out or return back to his house without passing that flaming hand-bill, which described the animal on exhibition as "The wonderful nondescript, captured by Colonel John C. Frémont, after an exciting three days' chase, on the River Gila." A regular sensation wood-cut, which represented the nondescript as springing from one mountain-peak to another, with a troop of hunters in pursuit, followed this startling announcement.

The writer, passing by one afternoon, stopped to read this bill. A hand tapped him on the shoulder. Turning round, he discovered it was the hand of Colonel Benton, who observed, "Come in and see this nondescript. I want you as a witness." Lieutenant Beale was with the old gentleman. "I want both of you," he said. He paid our way, and we all walked in. It was the woolly horse—a sickly, stunted, and miserable steed, with his tail and mane naturally destitute of hair, or shaved to the skin. Colonel Benton made us examine him, point by point, walking round the beast several times. Then he opened upon the exhibitor. "So this is the wonderful nondescript captured by Colonel Frémont? Now, Sir, you impudent impostor, I give you notice, and I bring these two gentlemen as witnesses that I have given you a fair warning, that unless you quit this place before to-morrow morning you will be arrested as an impostor, a vagrant, a shameless vagrant and swindler, obtaining money under false pretenses." And so on, in a loud, angry, and terrible voice, for perhaps ten minutes. A day or two passed, when, meeting Colonel Benton on the way to the Capitol, he remarked, "They fly, Sir!" "Who fly?" "The enemy, the impostor, the vagrant, the nondescript and his driver. They are routed, horse and foot; but I had to take the fellow before a magistrate, after all. I thought I had frightened him, but his impudence was proof against fear as well as shame. He is as hard a case as his horse. They are both nondescripts." [For a more particular account of the woolly horse, see Barnum's Autobiography.]

OLD DOCTOR JACOB TOWNSEND'S SARSAPARILLA.

The amusing comparison (1850) made by Colonel Benton, in a speech upon Mr. Clay's Compromise or "omnibus bill," between the young Doctor Townsend, and the old Doctor Jacob Townsend's sarsaparilla, secured for the Colonel a whole box, by express, of the old Doctor's medicine. Having heard of the circumstance, the writer, on the first opportunity, asked the venerable Senator about it. "Yes, Sir, a whole box of the old Doctor's sarsaparilla! But what am I to with it? I can't take it. If there were thirteen bottles, I might send one to each of the Senate Committee of Thirteen; but there are not bottles enough for that. Then I thought I would distribute it among the newspaper men, but they are worked enough already. What shall I do with my sarsaparilla? Will you take a bottle, and pledge me to drink it, live or die?"

THE NEW-YEAR'S CALL.

On New-Year's Day, 1854, Colonel Benton was left "solitary and alone" at his residence in Washington, the other members of his family—wife, children, and grandchildren—being, some in Europe, some in St. Louis, and some in California. But he opened his house to the customary New-Year calls of his friends. The absence of his family, however, being known, his visitors, with here and there an exception, were exclusively of the male gender. Through a crowd of politicians a gentleman advanced with his wife on his arm. After the usual salutations, he observed, "Contrary to the order of the day, this lady has insisted on visiting you, because you are left all alone." "Thanks, thanks, madam; a graceful act of woman's sympathy. She is right, Sir. Her presence brings me nearer to my absentees. Sit here, madam, by my side; and you, Sir, help those gentlemen to a glass of punch." On coming away the lady remarked that he was "a dear, good old man, simple-hearted and confiding as a child; and he is so lonely here, with wife, daughters, and grandchildren all gone. I am glad we came." The gentleman had a large bundle of cake and sugar-plums under his arm, which the veteran Senator insisted should be taken to their children and judiciously distributed. "In our children, Sir, we live over again, and they are the richest legacy we can leave to our country. Honored be the man who has a house full! Thrice honored be the woman who is their mother!"

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

NOT long ago I was breakfasting at the New York Hotel, and asked one of the waiters, a genuine son of Erin, to fetch me a couple of eggs. I said, "Be sure and have them boiled three whole minutes." He went away and staid a full half hour. I asked him what kept him so long. He replied, "Sure, Sir, an' it takes a very long time to boil an egg three minutes!"

At the last meeting of the Board of Education in this goodly city of ours proposals were submitted for building a school-house in 44th Street. One denominated the building a "shool house;" others offered "shureties," "sureities," "scurities," "securitys," "suretys," and "surities." One proposal addressed "to the School ofesrs of the 22 Ward," read thus:

"Jantle Mon: I do propose to do all the Mason Work of the School House to Be Built in 44th-st. Nere 10 Avenu in the 22 Ward for the Some of fifteen thonsent Seven hunde and fifty Dolers Acording to the plans and Spetions in a good way * * * * * * and find all the Nesery Materils. $15 750-00."

A good wife is like a snail. Why? Because she keeps in her own house.—A good wife is not like a snail. Why? Because she does not carry her all on her back.—A good wife is like a town clock. Why? Because she keeps good time.—A good wife is not like a town clock. Why? Because she does not speak so loud that all the town can hear her.

"There is a divinity that shapes our ends," as the pig remarked when he was contemplating the kinks in his tail.

A parishioner inquired of his pastor the meaning of this line in Scripture: "He was clothed with curses as with a garment." "It signifies," replied the divine, "that the individual had got a bad habit of swearing."

A cheerful face is nearly as good for an invalid as healthy weather. To make a sick man think he is dying, all that is necessary is to look half-dead yourself. Hope and despair are as catching as cutaneous complaints. Always endeavor to feel sunshiny, especially in a sick-room, and to look so too.

The Post has a very neat epigram: to wit,

"Apropos of this Turkish Pasha's coming,
For whose contracts the bosses all are drumming;
Why should we, unemployed ship-joiners, hope well
To prosper in far-off Constantinople?
The reason's plain: No master here is o'er us,
But there we're sure to find the real Bos-phor-us."

A lady, describing an ill-tempered man, says, "He never smiles but he feels ashamed of it."

There have been many definitions of a gentleman, but the prettiest and most poetic is that given by a lady: "A gentleman is a human being combining a woman's tenderness and a man's courage."

"The Legislature of one of the Southwestern States," so says the Canton Repository, "at the session of 1856–'7, passed an act instructing the 'State Librarian to furnish each member of the Legislature with a copy of the Holy Bible, St. James's Revision.'"

SERMON OF A QUAKER.—My friend, bridle thy tongue, to enable thee to remain quiet; mind thine own business, and thee will not have much time to attend to that of others, and thee will have many friends and few enemies.

A Vermont Judge of Probate has incorporated it as a part of the law of his court, that the administrator of an estate must allow the widow the cost of a newspaper, she making her own selection, from the common fund. The common law of America now recognizes the newspaper as a family and individual necessity. It is classed with pigs and potatoes, cassimere and calico, a thing to be exempted—like the family Bible—never to suffer from rapacious creditors, never to be parted with in the direst poverty.

In things of moment on thyself depend,
Nor trust too far thy servant or thy friend,
With private views thy friend may promise fair,
And servants very seldom prove sincere.

What may be done, with care perform to-day,
Dangers unthought of will attend delay.
Your distant prospects all precarious are,
And Fortune is as fickle as she's fair.

No trivial loss nor trivial gain despise,
Mole-hills to mountains, if oft heaped, will rise.
Weigh every small expense and nothing waste—
Farthings long saved amount to pounds at last.

Emerson's poem, "Brahma," is regarded by many as nonsense, and it has been ridiculed and parodied without stint. The St. Louis Republican has "gone and done it" in prose:

"If the scarlet murderous individual conceive he kill, or if the assassinated victim imagine he be slaughtered, their knowledge is exceedingly limited of the artful and cunningly-devised methods I maintain and vanish, and again change my direction. Remote or unremembered, to me, is contiguous; darkness of the sun's intercepted beams and the luminous rays of the god of day are identical; to me, the annihilated deities are obviously visible, and consciousness of guilt and exaltation of rumor are synonymous. They do not compute accurately who omit to leave me in; I am the means of their acceleration when they move swiftly through the air; I am the fluctuating state of opinion and the dubious individual, and I the sacred musical composition rehearsed in numbers by the Pagan Hindoo. The powerful and cogent mythological deities long for my habitation, and the consecrated six plus one languish ineffectually; but thou, humble and mild-tempered devotee of beneficence, discover me and reverse thy rear on the residence of the celestial gods."

A bear has always been reckoned a formidable animal—a gay seducer, who hugs his victim to death in the most affectionate but painful manner. But the most terrible specimen of a bear that we ever heard tell of is mentioned in the following spirited verses, which we clip from a Western poem:

"There was a jolly woodman
Was standin' by a tree,
When he spied an awful big bear
A-coming right at he!
The bear was ramparagous,
The foam was on his lip,
And fell a yard of prairie
He cleared at every skip!"

The secret league in England to destroy the life of Napoleon III. is called the "Society for the Diffusion of Bomb-Shells."

An Irish witness in the Worcester Police Court refused to be sworn on the Bible the other day, and when asked the reason of his stubbornness, replied, "An isn't it an American I am? What the divil's the use of getting naturalized, if I can't swear as the Yankees do?"

Some one says, that "human heads are like hogsheads—the less they contain, the louder the report they give of themselves. The smaller the calibre of the mind, the greater the bore of a perpetually open mouth."

The following is from "Andromeda, and Other Poems"—a new volume by Charles Kingsley, just issued by Ticknor and Fields:

A FAREWELL.

I.

My fairest child, I have no song to give you;
No lark could pipe to skies so dull and gray:
Yet, ere we part, one lesson I can leave you
For every day.

II.

Be good, sweet maid, and let who will be clever;
Do noble things, not dream them, all day long;
And so make life, death, and that vast forever,
One grand, sweet song.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, April 19, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets were freely supplied during the week with Flour, and though this was in good demand chiefly for home use, prices closed lower. Wheat was moderately inquired for at drooping rates. Corn was in active request, and it advanced. Oats were in more attention at improved quotations. Sales also were made of Barley and Barley Malt at steady prices, when it was more freely offered in, and closed heavy. A lively inquiry has prevailed for provisions, which are generally shorter. . . . The Grocery Trade generally for remarkable changes . . . . Hay was in demand at steady rates. . . . Hemp, Hops, and Grass Seeds were quiet. . . . Hides, Leather, and Naval Stores were in good request at buoyant prices. . . . Tobacco was dull, but firm, with light supplies available. . . . Wool attracted more attention at former quotations. . . . The movements in Freights were limited.

Goods were to a moderate extent, Jobbers and Dealers having met early in the week, when the terms of Dry Goods assumed a firm tone. . . . Almost $1,000,000 were entered for consumption the last quarter since the 1st of January have been $3,000,000 against $3,211,000 during the same time in 1857. The movements in other commodities were moderate and unproductive of any remarkable transactions. . . . We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, April 19, 1858.

THE foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Apr. 17, 1858	$1,198,240	$1,105,564
Corresponding week, 1857	2,328,605	1,153,393
Decrease	$1,060,458
Increase		$105,556

The total reduction in imports at this port since January 1st, compared with the same period last year, exceeds $37,000,000.

The export of specie during the week was $705,157; the receipts, from California and England, $1,005,000. The banks this evening are likely to show over thirty-three millions. Money rules, if possible, still easier than last week; short loans on call, on good securities are made as low as four per cent. Exchange on England is held at about 108½ @ 109.

The tendency to recovery in the Stock Market noticed last week still continues, though the business of the week has been limited. The rival shops of operation have not operated with any freedom or vigor. All seem to be waiting for the action of Europe. The tone of the following table will show the fluctuations of the leading speculative securities during the week:

New York and Erie	21½@22	23@23¼

L. P. ON THE PACIFIC RAILROAD.—The Pacific Railroad advertised throughout the country, Mr. Hiram Smith gives himself and his wife a trip to California, smooth as he originated the Gift Book business—to state, as a result of the investigation of the route, he discerns that they conceive their real means from the public—and not from speculating their immediate necessities. Mr. L. is aware that these various concerns, published as Gift Books, are conducted to bring the business established by himself into disrepute. He asks the liberal patronage of the public in regard to his Gift Book Enterprise, for the honor, integrity, and success of which he refers to the Commercial Agencies of the United States. CAUTION.

LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

THE attention of MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS has been called to several spurious Works put forth as the "NARRATIVE OF DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA." One of these is a gross forgery throughout. It does not contain a single line written or furnished by DR. LIVINGSTONE, bears no resemblance whatever to his genuine Narrative, but is altogether the invention of the fabricator. Another book professes to give, "in the language of Dr. Livingstone," a "complete account of his various journeys, outlining only incidental details and scientific matter." These "incidental details" which are omitted form more than one half of the entire matter in the genuine edition, embracing the most valuable part of the book, nearly all of the characteristic illustrations, and the elaborate Maps, which are essential to a full understanding of the explorations and travels of the Author. In place of the Illustrations furnished by the author, and supplied by course secondhand cuts, bearing no relation whatever to Dr. Livingstone's Book. This mutilated edition is designed mainly for circulation through the "Gift-Book" scheme of the publisher, although it is understood that reputable members of the Trade have purchased it, supposing it to be a genuine, unmutilated edition.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS respectfully caution the Trade and the Public against being imposed upon by these forged and mutilated Works.

The only genuine, unmutilated American edition of Dr. Livingstone's Work is that published by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, printed from an early copy purchased for a large sum from the Author. It contains 754 pages, large octavo, with a Portrait of the Author engraved upon the wood; two elaborate Steel Plate Maps, with Livingstone's Routes colored, and Forty-five large Wood-cuts, engraved in the highest style of the Art. The volume is beautifully printed and substantially bound. Price Three Dollars.

TO PERSONS IN THE COUNTRY.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS will send a copy of LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, upon the receipt of Three Dollars.

THE present Number completes the Sixteenth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The steadily increasing Table of Contents and List of Illustrations will show that the Publishers have not relaxed their efforts to furnish abundant literary and artistic resources at their command. The present number has contained articles prepared as the productions of the most accomplished American writers, and the Illustrations are more numerous and of greater variety of interest than have appeared in any former Number.

The Publishers believe that the plan of the Magazine embraces every thing essential to an attractive literary miscellany adapted to the wants of the American public. Its regular circulation has not been diminished even during the commercial and financial revulsion; but has proved disastrous to so many literary and commercial enterprises. It is, therefore, a matter of pride to them that the Magazine is recognized as a necessity rather than a luxury, and they therefore continue to issue the "Features" for the future. They will continue to fill the Editor's Table with the choicest productions of the Art and Morals; leaving, as heretofore, the discussion of Science, Politics, Religion, and sectional questions to Politics, to their own appropriate organs. Fiction and the true patriotic spirit of Literature will be cultivated as heretofore, which they believe to be the object of the Magazine will be to unite rather than to separate the various feelings of the people of different sections of our common country.

The Publishers do not find it necessary or expedient to appeal to publication inducements by "specimen Numbers" containing a liberal amount of matter and illustrations. They intend that every number shall prove to be WELL WORTH THE PURCHASE-MONEY, and to be the masterpiece of this polished, witty, and learned publication. It is unnecessary, therefore, with the subscription to HARPER'S WEEKLY simultaneously with its publication in England.

"We can not conceive of a plan of a book better adapted for utility to all the purposes of the Farmer than this. It is to him what a book of architectural plans is to the Builder. It points to the eye everything with which the Farmer has to do, and there is hardly any subject of practical interest to the Farmer which is not here treated and practically illustrated."

This cheap and handsome edition of the works of Mrs. Sherwood is certainly one of the most admirable family series, from the pen of a single writer, in the English language. They are of a high moral character, and adapted to different degrees of capacity, from that of opening youth to the matured intellect of riper years; but in all, the sentiments, the spirit, and the influence upon the mind, are such as to command the warmest approbation of every enlightened Christian; while, in their aptitude for the cultivation of the understanding and the improvement of the heart, they challenge competition. These features render the works of Mrs. Sherwood peculiarly suitable for the libraries of Sunday schools.

HON. GALUSHA A. GROW, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In preparing biographical sketches of prominent statesmen in the thirty-fifth Congress, we are constantly reminded of the advantages which a Republic confers upon energetic and gifted men, who, born in comparative obscurity, might, under other forms of government, never rise above the daily strife for daily bread, and, accomplishing no grander purpose than wresting by fierce struggle a bare subsistence for themselves and families, would pass on into the silence of nameless obscurity "unwept, unhonored, and unsung." If Congress may be taken as a criterion, the Republic has not so greatly degenerated after all; for many of the most prominent legislators in both branches are men whose rare genius, intense application, indomitable will, and unswerving rectitude have enabled them to rise from the shoe-bench, the factory, the forge, and the farm, to the solid dignity which, after all croaking, still appertains to American Senators and Representatives.

Among those who in elevating themselves have illustrated the true worth of our institutions, we must award a very high place to the Hon. Galusha A. Grow, whose likeness our artist has so admirably presented herewith. Mr. Grow was born in Ashford, Windham County, Connecticut, on the 31st of August, 1823. His father, Joseph Grow, died when the subject of this memoir was only three years of age; leaving the mother to provide for a family of six children, of whom four were sons. The youngest child was only three months old at the time of this sad bereavement, and on settling up the affairs of the family it was found there was barely enough of property to pay up all indebtedness. Fortunately Mrs. Grow was a woman of remarkable energy and decision of character; instead, therefore, of losing all courage and bemoaning her lot, she gathered her little flock about her and removed to the residence of her father, Captain Samuel Robbins, who lived in Voluntown, in the same county. Here she engaged in truck and farming; and, to her honor be it said, succeeded not only in providing for her young family, but also accumulated a surplus, which afterward laid the foundation for the precuniary prosperous circumstances of her children. The best answer to the inquiry "What can woman do?" might be given in the history of what this brave and good woman did. Unfortunately we are not writing her history, and must therefore content ourselves with this meagre outline of the accomplishments of one woman, who, we are happy to believe, in but a representative of a great many others, that in the lowly cares, and patient endurances, and holy sacrifices of maternal love are quite content to have inscribed upon their tomb-stones, "She hath done what she could," but of whom history and God will say, "Well done, good and faithful servant!"

When Mr. Grow was eleven years of age, his mother found that her industry and enterprise had enabled her to save a sufficient sum to defray the expense of removal to the West, and for the sake of her children she determined to make that great sacrifice. Twenty-five years ago the tide of emigration was setting westward; the Northeastern States had commenced to push out advance parties of settlers, who, knowing nothing of what they should encounter, struck boldly into the forests and laid the foundation of our Western prosperity. There were no railroads then to carry the emigrants in a few hours, and for a few dollars, from the valley of the Connecticut to the valley of the Mississippi, but painfully and slowly the caravans moved like snails toward the setting sun; and when the last good-by was said to relatives, and the last view had been taken of the old homestead, the emigrant felt that years must pass before he saw either again, and had faint hope of returning at all.

Despite there serious drawbacks, the Grow family started for the West, and finally took up their abode in a wild and mountainous part of Susquehanna County, Pennsylvania, which from its romantic beauty they named "Glenwood;" and there is still the residence of the subject of this sketch. For the next few years Galusha led the ordinary life of farmers' boys, attending school when there was opportunity, and undergoing the noble discipline which is afforded by wild mountain scenery to a quick perceptive nature which has also something of cultivation. It is told of him in those early years that he was often in the woods for a week or ten days, sleeping on hemlock boughs, and trusting to his own skill to provide his food. Living in a region of country in which lumber was abundant and good, the winter occupation of all the settlers was the cutting of timber, to be floated in the spring down the stream on which they lived to the Susquehanna (of which it was a tributary), and so find a market at Baltimore, and other towns lying along Chesapeake Bay. The great event to which Galesha, in common with the other boys, looked forward, was to be permitted to accompany the lumbering parties down the river. When he was about fourteen years of age the desired opportunity came, and he accompanied his brother Frederick to Port Deposit, in Maryland. While here an incident occurred which furnishes very decided testimony to the confidence which his neighbors felt in Mr. Grow's integrity, and the high estimation in which the innate sterwdness of the natives of the well-ashamed State of Connecticut was held twenty years ago. A friend of the Grows was anxious to send a cargo of lumber to Annapolis to be sold, and intrusted our hero with the business. On arriving at his port he sought out a Mr. Claud, who wished to buy the lumber, but almost feared to trade with such a young merchant. After asking his age, residence, parentage, family connections, and a variety of test questions, it occurred to him to ask, "Were you born in Pennsylvania?" Grow. "No, Sir, I was born in Connecticut."

CLAUD. "Oh yes, I understand it all now; yes, I do want to buy some lumber."

It is needless to add, the cargo was sold to good advantage.

At seventeen years of age, Mr. Grow, being generously helped by his brothers, entered the Freshman class of Amherst College, graduating in 1844. As soon as his collegiate course was completed, he commenced his political life by "stumping" for Polk and Dallas. When the election was over he entered the law office of F. B. Streeter, Esq., late Solicitor to the Treasury, and was admitted to the bar in the autumn of 1847.

In the spring of 1850 it was found that his close application to study while in college, and his subsequent confinement to his business, was impairing his originally fine constitution, and he was forced to retire temporarily from his profession to seek a recuperation of his physical powers in out-door exercis. He accordingly returned to his mother's farm and resumed his place in the field. In the winter of 1850 he surveyed six thousand acres of land into small lots.

In the summer of 1850 the Democratic convention of his county nominated him unanimously for the Legislature, but he declined. In the autumn of the same year he was first elected to Congress. The Democrats of the district were divided, and had two candidates in the field, each claiming to be the regular nominee. Eight days before the election both agreed to resign if Mr. Grow would be the candidate. He was visited by a delegation, who found him not exactly, like Cincinnatus, plowing, but working with a set of hands on the public highway, rebuilding a bridge that had been carried away by a freshet. He heard their proposal and consented to be a candidate; both the other candidates resigned as agreed upon, and a convention was called which nominated Mr. Grow, just one week before the election. He was successful, having a majority of twelve hundred and fifty votes; and in 1851 he took his seat, the youngest member of the thirty-second Congress. The second time he was elected by a majority of seven thousand five hundred; the third time he was elected unanimously, on account of the satisfaction with which men of all parties in his district regarded his strenuous opposition to the Kansas-Nebraska Bill. The last occasion upon which he asked the votes of his constituency he was elected by a larger vote than he received when there was no opposition. During the Speakership of Mr. Banks, Mr. Grow was chairman of the Committee on Territories, one of the most important positions in the gift of the Speaker. Upon Mr. Banks's retirement from Congress, Mr. Grow became virtually the leader of the Opposition—an arduous post which he has always filled so as not only to win the applause of his friends but to gain the respect of his political opponents. He received the Republican vote for Speaker at the commencement of this session.

In the winter of 1850 he visited Europe in company with Hon. E. B. Morgan and Hon. B. Pringle, of New York, Hon. E. B. Washburne, of Illinois, and others. They intended to visit the Crimea, but were prevented by the prevalence of cholera. While in Paris, our Representatives were treated with great consideration by the Emperor of the French, being invited to ball and given in honor of Queen Victoria, who was then visiting Napoleon.

With the probability of a long life before him, having thus early distinguished himself, it would be in the speculative to set limits to his future. He has already attained a high position as a leader in debate and parliamentary tactics. We may reasonably anticipate more honor and more power for him; but the pleasure of them for himself, and the world of them for others, will be limited in the facts of his strict personal uprightness and private integrity.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 1, 1858.

THE UNITED STATES GOVERNMENT PRINTING PRINTER.

THE Select Committee on the Public Printing have reported to Congress in favor of a national printing, engraving, electrotyping, lithographing, and bookbinding establishment, under the direct supervision of a Committee of Congress, and under the management of officers to be appointed by the President. The ground on which this recommendation is based is the enormous and disproportionate cost of the printing, etc., of Congress at the present time. Now it is shown that the cost of printing, lithographing, bookbinding, electrotyping, and engraving for the thirty-fourth Congress was $1,813,793, exclusive of the cost of the Globe; while that of the same work for the thirty-third Congress reached the enormous sum of $2,780,000. It is shown that while the contracts for the Senate and House printing have been awarded to various individuals, the work has invariably been done, of late years, by Mr. Wendell, who has paid the contractors a bonus, or given them a share of his profits. The margin for profit has been so large that one speculator who bought a contract for binding actually paid the contractor twenty per cent. on the gross amount of the printing done, and was yet enabled to sell out to a third party, who agreed to do the work for him on half profits. The conclusion of the Select Committee is that, by judicious management, the country may save one third the present expense of printing, and so forth.

This estimate would unquestionably be verified by the result if Congress could establish a great printing and engraving office, and manage it as private printers manage theirs. The lean purses and the figures of the public printers show that the people are shamefully robbed, and that the public printing is not the leanest part of the public plunder. But is there any reason to suppose that matters would be any better managed under the system proposed by the Committee?

If the United States can not have the printing done under the contract system without being robbed of half a million a year, how can they expect to escape robbery when they shall be no competition for the printing contracts, and the printer shall be entitled to draw his check for any amount that he chooses to set down as the actual cost of the work he does?

It would seem that there can be no safer example for the Government to follow than that which is held out by private individuals. When a private mercantile house requires a large quantity of printing, binding, or engraving to be done, it does not establish printing-offices or binderies; common sense teaches it that, being ignorant of the businesses of printing and binding, it will not succeed if it undertakes them. But it quietly proceeds to obtain tenders for the work from prominent binders and printers, and, on an examination thereof, awards the work to the competitor who offers the best security and asks the least money. It does not happen that it is often cheated. Why can not the Government pursue the same course? Let proper means be taken to give all the printers and engravers and binders an opportunity for competition, and there would be no robbery of the Government. A great national printing-office would be as doubtful an experiment as a national bank.

MORE NEW STATES.

As soon as KANSAS, Minnesota, and Oregon are out of the way, a new crop of States will knock at the national door and demand admission to the Union. Three of them already loom in the distance.

One is ARIZONA, which, if the stories which are told of its gold-bearing region are correct, may possibly prove a second California. The world is ripe for the development of a new auriferous region; and, notwithstanding all the individual failures which marked the settlement of California and Australia, the solid successes of many of the emigrants to those countries are well calculated to stimulate a rush to any new country which presents equally dazzling prospects. At present, Arizona is remarkable for its back-ground.

Next, we have a strong prospect of a new State to be carved out of TEXAS. Of late years there has been a large foreign immigration into that State. It is the only way by which slaveholders can establish in their political system a basis of population sufficiently large to give them a decided preponderance in the Union which offers greater promise to immigrants than Texas, and we are not surprised that a large portion of the best European immigration is being diverted thitherward.

Lastly, it is understood that the people of the State of Lake Superior are about to form a separate political existence under the name of the State of Ontonagon. Part of the new State is to be carved out of Michigan and part out of Wisconsin. Both States can well spare a slice. According to the plan now proposed the new State would have an area equal to that of New York, and has at present a population of 70,000. So soon as the capitalists who are engaged in mining enterprises realize that money is not to be made in mines by stock operations in Wall Street, but that copper veins, patient industry, and skilful perseverance are absolutely essential to success, the proposed State of Ontonagon will become the copper-producing region of this country and of the world.

By the time Mr. Buchanan's successor is inaugurated these three new States will probably be ready for admission. They will be followed in due course by others. The advantage of separate States over provinces or even the old legislative union pursued in European countries is so obvious that it must be expected that many of the provinces of the British Empire will, as population increases, and give birth to new members of the confederacy. Many already think that it would be well if New York were now divided by a line running due east and west and cutting off Manhattan, Long, and Staten Islands from the rest of the State. By dividing it in this, as by the Missouri compromise, the interests will grow up, and the best interests be subserved for each among these interests, or undue domination by one over the others, the better.

WHAT IS TO BE DONE WITH THE SEPOYS?

THE man who was presented with an elephant as a gift was in a worse position than the English conquerors of India are at the present time. There is every reason to believe that, notwithstanding the heavy odds in favor of the Sepoys, the English have succeeded in their ruggedly crushing out the mutiny which reared its formidable head just twelve months ago. Sir Colin Campbell's operations in Oude seem to have completed the work of subduing the Sepoys. The intelligence received from the British will be those of police engaged in hunting down bands of guerrillas in the jungles and the mountain fastnesses of Northern India. In this work all is tranquil. Notwithstanding the excellent reasons which were given some months ago for the revolt of the soldiery of Bombay and Madras, the troops in those presidencies have, with few exceptions, remained faithful to their colors. At the present time they are perfectly reliable. In the Punjab, which was retained in its normal condition by the prompt energy of Lawrence, there are no signs of trouble, and the authority of Great Britain was never more triumphant than it is at present. Thus, in a word, the mutineers are annihilated, and those who might have joined them are frightened into tranquility. The question which arises on this state of facts is, What is to be done with the Sepoys?

At the time the mutiny broke out there were about 17,000 British troops dispersed throughout India, and some 220,000 Sepoys. Of these latter about 100,000 have ceased to exist as a military body. Their place has, for the present, been taken by the British troops who were sent from England to put down the mutiny when it first broke out. It is evident that these regiments can not be kept in India. They cost too much. A double garrison, therefore, arises: first, What is to be done with the Sepoys? and next, How is India to be guarded against future mutinies?

The India bill which has been introduced into the British Parliament by the new Ministry contains no provision on the subject. It provides for the selection of a new India Board to take the place of the Board of Control, but now manages the affairs of the East Indies; but the practical questions of the destiny of the Sepoys and the police of the country it does not touch.

Some one has proposed that regiments be organized of mixed Europeans and natives, in the proportion of one European to three or four natives. The idea which underlies this scheme is, that no regiment thus constituted could mutiny, because the European element would become aware of the plot, and would reveal it. The difficulties are, first, the cost of twenty or thirty thousand European troops to leave the Indian army; secondly, the palpable impossibility of fusing Europeans and natives into the same body. No decent Hindoo will mess with an Englishman, and the very Europeans will mess or sleep with a "nigger," as the Hindoos are now called. Regiments consisting of both races would appear to be organized in such a manner that the men of each constituted separate companies; and this arrangement would defeat the plan which proposes to make spies of the Europeans.

The reserves of India—as a British colony—show an increasing deficit every year. The whole cost of this war, which can not be less than a hundred and fifty millions of dollars, will have to be met by England upon the future revenues of the colony. At the present time the taxes on land and labor are actually higher than they ought to be. In many parts of India they grind the peasant to the earth, and keep him and his descendants in perpetual poverty. Whatever scheme be adopted, therefore, it will need to be an economical one. It would seem to follow that the colony must be protected, not by British, but by native troops.

What method can be devised to use the natives to keep the natives in subjection, and, at the same time, to prevent the possibility of their mutinying, it is now left for the English politicians to discover. We had rather it were their task than ours.

MORE OCEAN STEAMERS.

WE have often heard of historians creating armies with a stroke of the pen; Mr. Florence, of Pennsylvania, proposes to establish a line of transatlantic steamers by an equally summary and inexpensive method. He has given notice that in obedience to the public accommodation of five ocean post-routes between the United States and Europe: one from Philadelphia to Southampton; another from New York to Havre; a third from New York to Glückstadt; a fourth from New Orleans to Bordeaux; a fifth from Norfolk to Santos. Such a list of Mr. Florence's bill is, that each steamer is to be paid by government in proportion to the number of letters which she carries.

This arrangement is well enough. But it is the old story of circulating the cow, how to jump the lane when the animal roams in freedom. Mr. Florence must find us the steamers before he need trouble himself about how they are to be remunerated for carrying the mails. As it is, the whole ocean steam service is passing into the hands of foreigners on their merits. But it will take some time for the effects of the mistake to be cured. A year or two must elapse before new steamers will risk their means in new ocean steam adventures.

When the time does come for the establishment of new lines of American steamers, New York must be the terminus on this side the ocean. To talk of other places is idle. Neither Boston nor Philadelphia can sustain a line of transatlantic steamships. As to Norfolk and New Orleans, the bare idea of the thing is ridiculous; quite as much so as that of sending steamers to Nantes and Bordeaux. We must run our lines from New York to Liverpool—from one commercial centre to another—from New York to Liverpool or Southampton. When we have a line successful, Washington and Chicago we may try others elsewhere; but not till then.

THE IRISH RACE IN AMERICA.

CERTAIN of the Irish journals in New York have been unusually violent of late against the Anglo-Saxon element in this country. One of them, and one of the most influential, urges its readers, with characteristic vehemence, to preserve their separate nationality, and not on any account to mix in the common herd of Americans. The natives of this country, says this Irish paper, are after all nothing but common, coarse, Anglo-Saxons, somewhat modified by climate; they lack the vivacity, the enterprise, the noble qualities of the true-born Celt, and present in their stead nothing but the vulgar characteristics of the material, grovelling, animal SAXON. By remaining aloof from the debased and unhappy natives of the country—our Hibernian monitor implies—the autochthony of the Irish can not fail to be recognized at last, and then they will have the choice of all the best offices and the fattest plunder.

It does not happen to be our function to counsel the Irish in America as to their course of conduct. They have counsellors enough and to spare, in whom, no doubt, they place proper trust. Nor shall we presume to dictate their pretension to be the noblest race on the continent. They may be that, or any thing else they please, so they let us live in peace.

But we will venture to submit for the consideration of the influential organs of the Irish community whether the conduct of at least a portion of the Irish people in this country is calculated to train them for the position of command to which they consider themselves entitled. We are dealing with facts, and not with theories; and we know that Irishmen will be glad to meet us on this ground. How the Irish are happen, as the criminal returns show, that so enormous a proportion of the crime committed in New York is the work of Irishmen? How is it that they people our penitentiaries in so large a proportion? How comes it that so disproportionate a share of the penal crime which horrifies this community are perpetrated by Irishmen? Common murders are peculiar to no nation; less barbarous modes of assassination have a life, outraging and murdering a poor girl, burning a house, are crimes in but stray cases, and kindred varieties of murder, seem to be usually frequent among the Irish. Surely this sort of thing is not the proper apprenticeship for a race which aspires to conceal this continent.

There seems to be among the Irish a fatal disregard of what the poor Anglo-Saxon race poses to consider the decencies of life. The other day, at Cincinnati, on St. Patrick's Day, the health of Queen Saldi was drunk with the most ferocious applause by a crew of assembled Celts. The authors of the massacre of women and children, the fiendish outrages with ever-dyed blood-lasmanity, were in like manner applauded some time since in this city by a meeting of Irishmen, over which Colonel Haskett presided. Now, of course, the Irish are entitled to exercise their own judgment. But as the general sentiment of this country is now, at the present time, favorable to the mutilation and massacre of helpless children and women, it would seem that these expressions of Irish opinion were ill-judged to forward their aspirations to dominion. The Irish should make allowance for our Anglo-Saxon simplicity if they want to rule us; they should at least seem to bow to our prejudices against lawlessness and brutality.

THE NEW FRENCH AMBASSADOR TO ENGLAND.

THE advocates of a war between England and France have been comforting themselves with the idea that the appointment of Marshal Pelissier to succeed Persigny as French Embassy to London implies a menace to Great Britain, and that the famous Crimean General has only been promoted to that ostensible post in order to afford him an opportunity of obtaining such a knowledge of the defensive armament of England as would be required by an invading army of Frenchmen.

If Louis Napoleon were so simple as to send Marshal Pelissier to England for any but her weak points, he would prove conclusively that the decline in his intellect which has so long been foretold by the Paris press is correct. An ambassador, like a monarch, can not command privacy. Marshal Pelissier could no more make private surveys of England's coast defenses than Prince Albert could spy out the weaknesses of Cherbourg. Every step that he took, every glance of his eyes, would be duly chronicled in the papers next day. If he remained a thousand years he could not point his guns surprise the British engineers. They would know of his coming as soon as he did himself, and act accordingly. Moreover, he would be just as much as it was intended he should, and no more. As a spy, he would be not worth as much as the newspaper gossip.

It is said that his appointment is an insult to Great Britain. This is a purely gratuitous assertion. Throughout the Crimean campaign Marshal Pelissier was scrupulously careful of the feelings of his allies. All the military writers, French and English, dwell on the admirable conduct of the British troops. Here and there an idle newspaper scribbler has invented stories tending to throw his commander for the English's power's court no one is so firmly and unchangably wedded to the theory of an English alliance as Marshal Pelissier—the man whose appointment to the mission to England is regarded as a menace by certain writers in the press.

The promotion of the Marshal is susceptible of a very simple explanation. Ten years have elapsed since the last revolution in France. During that period a generation has grown up which knows nothing of the cost of revolutions, and which, with warm French blood in its veins, looks forward to the prospect of barricades with ardor. The only safeguard for the Government against this class is the army. To conciliate the army and to retain its affections is, therefore, the sole thought and aim of the Emperor. Hence all the vacancies which have lately occurred in the civil and diplomatic service have been filled by soldiers, and the best of all the offices in the Emperor's gift—the mission to England—has likewise been awarded to a soldier. The meaning—the only meaning—of Pelissier's appointment is, that so long as the Emperor Napoleon rules France the loaves and fishes are to be the property of those soldiers on whose fidelity the permanency of his dynasty depends.

THE LOUNGER.

THIS YEAR'S PICTURES.

THE new rooms of the National Academy accommodate nearly twice as many pictures as the old. The exhibition of this year is therefore twice as large as usual. But as excellence is not always in the ratio of quantity, it can hardly be said that there are twice as many good pictures as usual. In fact there are, as there always must be, so many poor ones that there is danger of thinking the whole exhibition inferior. But it is not so. On the contrary, although every frequenter of the gallery will miss certain names—Church, perhaps, chiefly—and will find that some of the older men do not appear quite so well as in some other years, yet others, on the contrary, "come out very strong," and give us as good works as we have ever had.

No. 57. Winter Twilight, by George H. Boughton, of Albany, is a very admirable picture by a comparatively fresh hand. It is a perfect piece of winter. The chill distance, the dark outline of trees against the sky, the house withdrawing as if into itself, the lustre of the ice in the foreground, as the late gleam of light strikes across it, the dry dash of snow on the same ice, and the hurry of the woodman homeward, are rendered with rare fidelity, and skill, and simplicity. Nor is it only the form and conscientious treatment of the picture, but its sentiment, its apprehension of the winter spirit of the landscape, which makes it a work of art, and irresistibly suggests those verses of Shelley, which show at once the poet and the man:

"It was a winter such as when birds die
In the deep forests: and the fishes lie
Stiffened in the translucent ice; which makes
Even the mud and slime of the warm lakes
A wrinkled clod, as hard as brick: and when Among their children comfortable men
Gather about great fires, and yet feel cold:
Alas! then, for the homeless beggar old!"

The first stanza of the same poem expresses no less truthfully the character of Kensett's pictures. Mr. Kensett is one of those who are "very strong" this season, showing us the fruit of his sea-side studies during the last two or three years. His large work, No. 613, Sunset on the Coast, is a view of the sea rolling upon a shore beneath a cliff, probably suggested by Newport coast-scenery. It is a very simple subject, and it is treated with masterly skill. We like to trace, as in Boughton's picture and Shelley's poem, the sympathy and homogeneity of works of art in various kinds, and although Kensett's talent is as little rhetorical as can well be, and Ruskin is the most splendid rhetorician in English literature, yet we are reminded by some touches in the picture of some descriptions of sea scenery in Ruskin's late work upon the ocean. If the subsiding wave in the foreground of No. 613 were a rising wave, a thousand miles from shore, lashed by a tempest, might we not easily see the "green mountainous giddiness of wrath: its overwhelming crest, heavy as iron, fitful as flame, clashing against the sky in long cloven edge—"? [The whole passage is in the "Miscellany" of the Weekly for last week.] What a turbid, briny swell along the front of the picture! How fresh and sparkling the air! And what a purely American coast!

So in No. 506, Newport, the rocky bluff seamed with verdure, and the calmness of the water just curdled into quick ripples by a freshening breeze, lighted by two or three living sails in the distance, are traits of everyday nature, but they are given with an unobtrusive reality which is refreshing. But best of all, perhaps, is No. 128, Sunset at Newport; all water and light and cloud, but so exquisitely fused and blended, so rich and sweet and tender, that such a picture upon the parlor wall would be like a rose-bush always in bloom.

It is a pity that Mr. Church does not exhibit this year, for it would be most interesting to compare the different excellences of these two painters. But Mr. Louis R. Mignot's sole picture, No. 215, Among the Cordilleras, recalls the later subjects, if not the style, of Church. It is a very large and striking picture, but it represents scenery with which comparatively few are familiar. The darkly-luxuriant, massive verdure of the foreground contrasts well with the arid, rocky summits of the mountains beyond, and the group of lush foliage of poetic forms, the palm and tangled vines, the broad, sun-sucking leaves, and the sheer abyss, muffled with rounded, tufted forest, with the cataract plunging brightly down and winding away through unseen thickets swarming with slimy life, suggest all the fecund opulence of the tropics. It is a most characteristic and effective picture.

Not far from it hangs a very different work, No. 210, Malaria, by Hellingford. It has none of the skillful manipulation of No. 215, but it is full of sentiment. It represents a boat crossing a sluggish stream on the Pontine Marshes. A peasant, the victim of the malaria, lies stretched at length, another peasant, with his head carefully shielded by his coat, steers—two or three women and children are grouped around the sick man, while in the front of the boat sits a woman clasping her knees with an air of hopeless dejection. Upon the high bank of the stream, at a little distance, is a Campagna hunter. The picture is not well painted. It is dingy and heavy; but it is entirely dramatic and Italian. There is a sense of disease in the very air. The blighted silence and desolation of the marshes are all there, and more than that, and making the subtle charm of the picture, the nameless blight that hangs like a malaria over Italy, paralyzing its genius and its progress, is symbolized in the figure of the woman hopelessly clasping her knees on the boat's very prow. So sits Italy, sad and effortless, and every thing Italian seems to share the doom.

The Lounger can not catalogue the pictures, nor even name all that he would praise. The eye is almost benumbed by the immediate succession of such different impressions, and when a man has passed through the gallery he may well wonder whether he has even noticed the best. Goethe said that the highest compliment you could pay a collector of paintings was to ask him at once to show you the best. For it implied that he knew which they were. So would the Lounger gladly ask to be shown the best. But there are two hundred and twenty-nine exhibitors: to whom shall he apply?

From week to week he hopes to have a word to say about some of them. Whether they are well painted or not he will possibly be unable to say, for the painters themselves have not yet done discussing that question in the case of pictures hundreds of years old. For himself the Lounger has a profound respect for any man who can put paint upon a canvas so as to resemble any thing but a mud-puddle. He has several times found himself delighted with "crude," "blotchy," "fuzzy," "chalky" performances. They might have been justly liable to those disastrous epithets, but they awakened some kind of sentiment, some remembrance, some longing, some regret, some hope, in which he was more interested than in skillful chiaro 'scuro. Does not the great Ruskin pish and pooh at Claude Lorraine's cotton-woolly clouds and trees; and yet is not Claude Lorraine the interpreter of the house Beautiful to many a Lounger?

WOMEN'S RIGHTS.

IT is still a question in many minds whether it is delicate for women to speak of their "rights," and whether men do not have a juster and clearer idea of them than women themselves. But a woman's right to say such things as are said in the following sonnets has never been questioned since Eve loved Adam, or Hero lit her lamp for Leander.

TO J * * * * * *.

I.

"I do not love thee with a slavish dread,
Forever waiting on a master's eye,
Or to a sensual sultan bow my head,
Accepting thee as fate and destiny;
Nor would I with a woman's despot power,
Capricious, wish to rule thee to my mood—
Such homage is but transient beauty's dower—
Such tyranny unworthy womanhood.
Love is no iron fetter of the soul,
But true election—freedom good and wise—
Each from the other feels a calm control,
Like God's pure law, in human lips and eyes:
His love is perfect freedom—so is thine;
And ever wast, or thou hadst ne'er been mine.

II.

"Yet while a woman's pride proclaims me free,
A woman's love, her own free gift, is thine:
Else were the paltry boon unworthy thee,
Thy image far too noble for its shrine.
But now I dare to lift my head and say,
A manly love, a passion without guile,
Is a possession none can take away,
Nor steal my sunshine from thy bounteous smile.
Thus art thou evermore, as now, my own,
Still more and more my own as years pass by,
Life draws its sweetness but from thee alone,
And pride forgets herself in ecstasy.
Thus, though my love, my self, my thoughts, are free,
Their liberty is consecrate to thee.

"O. LAWRAY, Nightingale House."

PASSING THE HAT.

BELISARIUS figured for a long time in history as a sublime beggar—an Edie Ochiltree on the largest possible scale. But investigation has sent such a derogatory rumor about its business, and has decreed that the conqueror of the Goths was able to make his own living.

Lamartine was a kind of conqueror of the Goths on that famous morning when he persuaded the ravening French rabble that the tricolor would only be stained and not glorified if it were drabbled in blood. Lamartine, in fact, did an immense service to Europe and the peace of the world. Mr. Carlyle sedulously squirted rose-water at him; but if Mr. Carlyle's favorite William the Norman or Oliver Cromwell had been in Lamartine's place, there would have been blood instead of rose-water running in the gutters.

Ever since his fall from power—and what an unparalleled fall it was!—Lamartine has been constantly paraded as a public mendicant. Few brave men in any country could have calmly endured such a total loss of public confidence as was evinced in his case; but to a Frenchman, peculiarly sensitive and vain, it would seem that it must have been of overwhelming mortification.

And yet, from being almost first consul of France, Lamartine passes to being the first mendicant in the world without an apparent pang or blush. There is something positively sublime in the appeals made to the charity of mankind in his behalf. This great man! this illustrious poet! this saviour of order! this main-spring of his country! who will not hurry to subscribe a few hundred francs—for what?—to enable him to retain his ancestral estates, his hereditary acres on which his childhood played, over which his mother led her boy, under which he would fain lay his bones—ah me!

That such an appeal should be made once is sad—that it should be done twice is incredible. If France had voted him a million, it would have been an act of national gratitude. If grateful Frenchmen had individually subscribed a million, it would have been an intelligible and natural proceeding. But if his country as such, or its inhabitants, did not move instinctively in the matter, there was the end of it.

What pathetic solemnity invests in the imagination the tragic misfortune of Walter Scott! With what ludicrous compassion it regards the position of Alphonse de Lamartine! And, as if to add the last bitter drop, Louis Napoleon, whom Lamartine adjured France to distrust, now heads the subscription with ten thousand francs!

"SERVANT OF GOD, WELL DONE!"

IN every country, at every period, there is a band of men of about the same age, and of the same sympathies, whose professions and homes may be far apart, who may be never known to each other except by name, but who are conscious that they are working together in the hope of humanity. When one of them falls, under whatever circumstances, and wherever he may be, all the rest follow invisibly the funeral train, and the amen of the prayer is breathed from each surviving heart to heart. So the recent death of Dudley A. Tyng, a young man full of promise, full of energy, full of hearty human sympathy, brings regret and mourning to many a young man who never knew him, but to whom his name was sweet with goodness and heroism. Noble, hopeful, intrepid, he had already made his name dear to many who did not agree with him in opinion, but who were heartily upon his side in the spirit with which he was doing his work. Now his work is done, and he rests from his labors. His life ends suddenly, but not too soon, for a well-spent life is always symmetrical and complete, whether it be long or short. The longest life is little in the sum of all; but no flower that blooms for a day and dies at evening, no little insect, unheard and unseen, that is born and dies with a sunbeam, but has fulfilled all that tropical forests and the whole animated world have fulfilled, for it has done its duty. When that can be said of a man as he passes away from our sight and is buried in spring-time, his memory, like the flowers flung upon his grave,

"Smells sweet and blossoms in the dust."

A NEW SHAKESPEARE:

NOT a new poet, but a new edition of the old poet, is soon to appear from the press of Little, Brown, & Co., in Boston. There is already one original American edition, that of Mr. Verplanck, which is well known and esteemed; and it is satisfactory to reflect that a poet who belongs to the language, and not to any country, is best presented to his American readers under American auspices.

The publication of the new edition will be an event in our literature and in the literature of Shakespeare. The editor, Richard Grant White, is universally recognized as the most accomplished of our Shakesperians, and his work, "Shakespeare's Scholar," is, without question, the most judicious, intelligent, and comprehensive commentary upon the poet. His peculiar fitness for his task lies in his reverential, and not critical, spirit. His treatment of Shakespeare is that of a man, and not of a grammarian; and we have, consequently, good sense interpreting good sense. So accurate and extensive is his familiarity with the literature and the history of the Elizabethan age—his work is such a labor of love, and taste, and geniality—that the reader will have in it a satisfaction he has, perhaps, in no other: the consciousness that whatever opinion of fact the editor expresses he has the best right to express, and that all his explanations of doubtful points are the views of a profound and sympathetic scholar. Being master of the subject, having all the assistance (and impediment) of all the other commentators and editors; aiming, as he does, to free the poet from the confusion of pedantic criticism, and to give us a simple Shakespeare, we have no hesitation in saying that White's Shakespeare will be the best in the world.

We have had the pleasure of seeing some specimen pages, and we observe that the publishers fully appreciate the value and importance of the work they have undertaken; and that in exquisite typography, careful arrangement, and general fitness and beauty, the volumes will be entirely what such an edition should be. It will be comprised in twelve volumes, four of which will be ready in May, and the series will be completed by next spring; the price, a dollar and a quarter for each volume.

Few readers who glance at the beautiful page can ever know what long and acute study and careful thought have gone to a result apparently so simple; how every comma—upon which the meaning of a line may depend—has been conscientiously adjusted; how every fact stated has been the fruit of curious and erudite research.

We sincerely trust that this monument of American scholarship will receive at once the recognition which it is sure ultimately to attain.

MUSIC.

MR. NAPOLEON ULLMAN certainly understands his business. Quite undismayed by the moderate success of the pure Musard music, he has not betaken himself to denouncing the public taste, but has somewhat changed his programme. For the Berlioz nights he is to be heartily thanked. Probably no orchestra in the world could better interpret the music of this eccentric master, which every lover of music wishes to hear, and to hear which we have hitherto had no opportunity in this country. Surely, with Thalberg, Vieuxtemps, Formes, and Musard, it will be Mr. Napoleon's fault if he does not so adjust his concerts as to fill his house and his pockets.

THE ORSINI PROCESSION.

IT was a striking and solemn spectacle—that of three or four thousand men marching silently to the funereal drum-tap through Broadway. They marched and spoke in honor of men who had just been publicly executed upon a scaffold.

Let us congratulate ourselves that we live in the only country in the world in which their march would have been allowed—that we live in a land so confident of the security of its peace in the love and good sense of the people that any kind of demonstration, not positively indecent, is tolerated either with a smile of indifference or a sneer of contempt. The morbid enthusiasts who composed the procession marched, unchallenged, into the park and into oblivion. They disturbed the public peace less than a fire-engine company rattling and roaring to a fire. They were certainly not wise men, and they were well let alone.

Their pageant was called the apotheosis of assassination. And Orsini himself, in a reputed last letter, stated that he had been seduced from his better principles to lend an ear and a hand to murder; and, whether he wrote the letter or not, he calmly gave his life without a word of entreaty or reproach.

Yet if words have any meaning at all—however much the wise patriot may deplore murder—no thoughtful man will class Orsini with Baker who killed Poole.

If the honor paid to the memory of Orsini be the apotheosis of assassination, what is the present French empire? We do not say, certainly, that Orsini was not an assassin—but what is Louis Napoleon?

THE HOLY LAND.

AMONG the pleasantest lounging places in Broadway is the room at the Apollo Gallery in which hang the five large pictures of Mr. Troye—pictures painted in Syria—of the Dead Sea, the place of pilgrim baptism of the Jordan, a Damascus bazar, a plowing scene outside Damascus with the snowy Hermon, and a view of the Sea of Galilee with Tiberias and Jaffet. These pictures are very large, and they are most faithful portraits of the places. Mr. Troye, who resided many months in Syria, has elaborated them with great detail and accuracy; and while to every Eastern traveler they recall the most interesting points of his journey, they are also a "vision splendid" to the man "who farther from the East must travel." They are, in truth, most interesting pictures. The view of the Dead Sea, which is of large size, is the most impressive representation we have ever seen, in colors, of the profound desolation of that solemn region.

These pictures are well worth attention, and the names of Mr. William C. Prime, author of "Boat Life in Egypt" and "Tent Life in the Holy Land," with Commander Lynch, of the United States Exploring Expedition to the Dead Sea, both of whom most highly extol these paintings, are sufficient evidence of their authenticity and value.

MURDER! MURDER!

DURING the year ending the first of last January we all know how orderly, and clean, and generally decent the city was! How rarely the peace was broken! How seldom any body lost any thing by stealing! What purity prevailed at the City Hall, and what brotherly love in the municipal offices! How few murders there were, and what a lovely foreshadowing of the Millennium the city presented! During that whole Christian year—merely, probably, by way of keeping up the civic connection with human frailty—only one man was executed for murder, and he that poor outcast negro D'Orsay, who had no friends, and to whom the gibbet was only emphatic charity.

During the reign of Wood, of glorious memory, we quite forgot there was such a thing as crime, and that forgetfulness is now showing its bad consequences. The friends of the late lamented Poole, whose apotheosis is fresh in the public mind, have been freely fighting and killing each other, and citizens disappear, or are found murdered, with an imbecile incompetency of pursuing the malefactors which shows how completely spoiled we are by the recent Millennium.

By-and-by, when we get bad enough, and are considered worthy, perhaps we shall have a detective police—persons who understand how to find out who it is that sew people up in sacks and throw them into rivers, and otherwise quietly make way with them. But we must not expect that until we are a great deal worse than we are now. While there are not more than two mysterious murders a week, we do not deserve any thing better than a long investigation, a verdict that somebody did it, and a request to the Governor to offer a reward.

JUSTICE.

IF a starving man is punished for stealing a sixpenny loaf, why should a bank President or Director escape, after swindling his stockholders of thousands? It is not a new question—and every body at once answers, "Certainly, why should he?" And meanwhile he does.

There is some kind of jugglery by which officers of moneyed institutions escape the consequences that men of less responsibilities always happen to suffer. There was the Bank of Pennsylvania, in Philadelphia, in which so many thousands of dollars of poor people's money was stored for safety, and one day it appeared that the people who had taken charge of it could not pay it upon demand. There was also a great deal of card-writing about "aspersions," and "injured honor," and "Christian character," and so forth—but still the men who had taken honest money to keep could not account for it. If it had been a gardener, or clerk, or errand-boy who could not account for money he had received, there would have been a summary process. But it really seemed that the collapse of the Bank of Pennsylvania was to be treated like the bursting of the boiler of a steamer or a railway massacre, and that the verdict would be, "Nobody to blame." Every body, of course, would have regretted it very much indeed, and nobody would have done any thing more.

But, somehow, there is to be a trial. The President of the bank and several of the Directors have been indicted, and an investigation will follow. Let us hope that a just verdict and an adequate judgment will follow the investigation.

ACCIDENT TO THE BRIDGE OVER THE ST. JOHN'S RIVER, NEW BRUNSWICK, ON 28TH MARCH LAST.

SCENE ON THE BRIDGE OVER THE ST. JOHN'S RIVER, N. B.

THE accompanying illustration, for which we are indebted to a New Brunswick artist, represents a thrilling incident which took place in that province a month ago.

On 24th March a violent storm raged throughout the province. As night fell the wind became so violent that the flooring of the bridge over the St. John's River was upset and thrown into the river. The girders soon followed the example; and shortly after dark a gap of some two hundred feet divided one extremity of the bridge from the other. Matters were in this state when the Fredericton coach drove, as usual, upon the bridge. The horses, which were traveling rapidly, came to a dead halt. The driver, in the storm and darkness, could see nothing; and, not unnaturally, plied the whip with some vigor. To his amazement the horses stood stock still. He whipped afresh, more severely than before; but the animals did not flinch.

With some impatience the driver got off his seat, supposing that there must be a log in the way, or that the harness was in disorder; and intending to lead his team past the doubtful point. Meanwhile the travelers inside, who, in that storm, were not in the happiest frame of mind, were loud in their reproaches and abuse of the lazy animals.

On alighting the driver could find no log in front of his team. In fact, he could see not a yard in front of him. All was blank darkness. He advanced a few steps, and finding nothing that could justify the sudden stand of the animals, turned about, resolved to lead them forward, when a sudden flash of lightning illuminated the scene. The spectacle which then shone out made his blood run cold. He was standing within a few inches of the chasm in the bridge. One step more would have precipitated him into the abyss. Had the horses not stopped when they did the coach would have gone over, and the Norwalk catastrophe would have been renewed on a smaller scale.

One can readily realize the emotion with which driver and passengers returned thanks to the Almighty for their providential preservation from an awful death.

THE NEW ENGLISH TRACTION ENGINE.

WE have most of us seen the steam carriage which has traveled through the streets of New York. It seems to be universally considered an ingenious machine, but without practical utility.

THE NEW ENGLISH TRACTION ENGINE.

They appear, in England, to have invented, on the same principle, a steam carriage which promises actual results of some value.

One Francis Hamilton, of Acton, England, has contrived a steam carriage for agricultural purposes. The engine contains two 7-inch cylinders with twelve inches stroke, and seventy pounds of steam pressure to the square inch. With a load not exceeding twenty tons in weight, divided among several carts, this engine will travel at the rate of three miles an hour over a tolerable road with a gradient not exceeding one in seventeen.

The wheels, as will be seen by the engraving, are provided with what are called "shoes," which are large or small, according to the hardness or softness of the ground to be traveled. These shoes supply the place of flange and rail. They are made upon mathematical principles, the rail being the length of the radius, and the guide-bars form the cycloidal line of the circle; so that upon each revolution of the wheel one rail is always advancing, while one remains stationary; the whole of the sleeper and rail combined representing a foot and leg from the knee-joint, having the toe, heel, and ankle-joint. By driving the wheel at its apex by machinery, independently of the effect of the steam pressing against it for the forward motion of the engine, the steam power employed is rendered doubly effective, as the leverage of the wheel is gained by the pinion being worked through one space, and carried by the forward motion of the engine through another.

The advantage of these engines is obvious. They will do the work of forty horses. On a common road in England the cost of using them to draw twenty tons weight would not be over a penny (say two cents) a mile; and if a train-way were constructed the cost would be diminished one-half. But it is evident that the chief use to which traction engines would be put would be on flat lands over which there exist no roads. Thus we learn that the Russian Government has purchased several for use on the steppes of the south. Negotiations are on foot for their introduction into South America; they would be invaluable on the Pampas. On our Western prairies their use would be equally obvious. In Illinois, and on the Plains, such engines might supersede the necessity of railways. Some of our energetic inventors will, doubtless, see that they are introduced as soon as they are required.

MARSHAL PELISSIER, THE FRENCH EMBASSADOR TO ENGLAND.

IN another column the reader will find some mention of the famous General Pelissier, who, after gaining the title of Duke of Malakoff by his exploits at Sebastopol, has just been appointed French Embassador to Great Britain. This is a fitting occasion to present the readers of this journal with the veteran's portrait.

General Jean Jacques Pelissier was born in the midst of the first French Revolution, in the village of Maromme, near Rouen, in the year 1796, and is consequently sixty-four years of age. His father was superintendent of the Rouen powder magazines. His calling placed him in constant contact with the officers of the army. By the time young Jean Jacques was old enough to feel manly emotions France was thoroughly imbued with military aspirations; the genius and successes of the elder MARSHAL PELISSIER, THE NEW FRENCH EMBASSADOR TO ENGLAND.

Napoleon had filled every heart with the hope of military distinction. The father of our General sent his son to the military school of the period, enjoining upon him to pay such attention to his studies as would insure his admission to the choice corps of the French army, the Etat Major or Staff. Young Pelissier fulfilled his father's expectations. He entered the Etat Major at the age of eighteen, and, according to rule, served a specified time, first in the infantry, then in the cavalry, and last in the artillery. When Louis XVIII. became sovereign of France Pelissier obtained his company, and shortly afterward won the title of Chef d'Etat Major, or Chief of the Staff. He served for nearly a quarter of a century in this capacity, attached to army divisions and acquiring a wide-spread reputation for soldierly qualities. In 1842 he was promoted to a staff lieutenant-colonelcy—a rank unknown in our army, but one which is highly prized in France.

He was soon after attached to the expedition against Algiers, and formed part of the military family of Marshal, then General, Bugeaud. At that time the French were absolutely contending for a foothold in Algiers. The Arabs, under the brave Abd-el-Kader, disputed every inch of ground. Every mountain and every valley from Morocco to Tunis, and from the desert to the sea-coast, swarmed with brave defenders of the soil. In the long and tedious wars which ensued Lieutenant-Colonel Pelissier bore a prominent part. He soon elicited from his chief special mention of his services, and received, in consequence, a commission as full Colonel of Etat Major.

His first independent command was on an expedition against the Hittes, an Arab tribe. It took place in 1845, and was crowned with complete success. He then rejoined his chief, and took an active part in the subsequent operations against the Kabyles and Arabs. When the Moors made an alliance with the Arabs, and the Emperor Muley Abder-Ahman led an army to the support of Abd el Kader, Pelissier accompanied Marshal Bugeaud into the Province of Oran. A battle was fought near the frontier; the French were perfectly successful; they lost but few men, whereas the Moors left eight hundred soldiers on the battle-field, and eighteen flags and eleven pieces of artillery fell into the hands of the invaders. At this battle Colonel Pelissier commanded the left wing, while, strange to say, Colonel, now General, Cavaignac led the centre. This settled the contest for the time.

When the war broke out afresh Colonel Pelissier was inverted with the chief command of the army. The most treacherous and blood-thirsty of the tribes engaged was the Ouled-Riah—a small clan, but imbued with the most bitter hatred to the French, and controlled by no principles of honor or humanity. Colonel Pelissier engaged and defeated them. They fled for refuge to a cave—a natural strong-hold, and one in which they had often found refuge when pressed by the French armies. Colonel Pelissier encamped at the mouth of the cave, and sent an officer with a flag of truce to the Arabs to demand a surrender. The unfortunate emissary was seized and tortured most cruelly until he died of his sufferings. After waiting a certain time Colonel Pelissier sent a second emissary to the Arabs, demanding their immediate surrender and the restoration of his first envoy. He added that in case these demands were not instantly complied with he would burn the entire tribe alive in the cave. The only answer he received was the well-known cries and shrieks of the second messenger, who was tortured to death like the first.

Colonel Pelissier was not the man to endure outrages of this character. Without a moment's hesitation he had the mouth of the cave stuffed with dry wood. A brief delay was allowed for a proposition from the Arabs; none coming, the wood was fired, and the fire was kept up for some hours. It is said that the shrieks and cries of the women and children, who had followed the warriors of the tribe into the cave, were so heart-rending that many French soldiers rushed through the flames and rescued some of the unhappy creatures who were nearest the mouth. But those who escaped in this manner formed a very small proportion of the whole. It is supposed that nine hundred souls altogether found refuge in the cave. Seven hundred were found dead when the extinction of the fire permitted the French to explore the cave in safety. Two hundred were taken out alive, but all perished before the sun went down. It was the 18th June—a terrible day in the history of Algiers.

This fearful tragedy made Colonel Pelissier's name famous throughout the civilized world. In France the indignation aroused by the massacre of the Ouled-Riah was intense. Colonel Pelissier was denounced by the press and by several members of the House of Peers. The Minister of War—old Marshal Soult—made a very timid apology for the affair. Among the public there was but one opinion—and that was in favor of the immediate degradation of the blood-thirsty Colonel. Louis Philippe did not share the public sentiment on the subject. On the contrary, he shortly afterward promoted Colonel Pelissier to the rank of General and Maréchal de Camp.

A very short time afterward General Pelissier brought the war to a close by the defeat and utter destruction of the forces of Bon Maza.

At the downfall of Louis Philippe General Pelissier lost no time in sending in his adhesion to the Government of the Republic. There is this to be said in favor of French military men: they seldom display any unreasonable obstinacy in adhering to a fallen cause, but transfer their allegiance from one government to another with truly admirable discretion. As a reward for his support, General Pelissier received from President Louis Napoleon Bonaparte the rank of General of Division. He also filled for a time the post of Governor-General of Algiers.

In July, 1852, he distributed eagles among his soldiers in Algiers, and addressed them as follows: "Soldiers, beneath these eagles I, the oldest among you all, began my career. Around these emblems glorious heroes have been gathered. Let us take them for our models. Watch over their memory, and rather suffer a thousand deaths than part with the banners I now intrust to your keeping."

General Pelissier prudently accepted the empire, and was rewarded by the Emperor with the command of the first military division of the Crimean army under St. Arnaud. When, at the death of St. Arnaud, Canrobert obtained the chief command, Pelissier acquiesced without a murmur; though his knowledge of Canrobert justified the opinion which he expressed to one or two intimate friends that he (Canrobert) was an excellent peace soldier, but not the man for the pending tussle. This idea soon made its way into the Emperor's mind, and Pelissier, as every one remembers, was substituted for Canrobert in the command of the French army in the Crimea. The remainder of his biography is familiar to every one. He had been appointed to the post he held in order to take Sebastopol, and he took it, though at a frightful sacrifice of life. He achieved the purpose sought by his imperial master; and whatever it cost France, he certainly paved the way for the re-establishment of peace.

Ever since the close of the Russian war General Pelissier, who won the titles of Marshal and Duke of Malakoff, has been reposing on his laurels in France. Circumstances having suggested the withdrawal of M. de Persigny from the Court of St. James, the Emperor has appointed Pelissier in his stead.

It is generally supposed that he will prove a highly acceptable minister. His attachment to the Anglo-French alliance is well known; he has passed the age at which military exploits fire the soul; he can desire nothing but peace, tranquillity, and the statu quo. No doubt he will become quite a favorite with the English people.

SPRING FASHIONS.

DESCRIPTION OF ENGRAVINGS.

FIG. 1 represents a young lady attired for a morning walk. Leghorn hat, trimmed with ribbon. Figured taffetas robe, the corsage low and cut square, the skirt adorned with flounces to the waist. Mantelet of white glace silk, entirely without ornament.

FIG. 2.—Promenade dress. Bonnet of blonde and rice straw, ornamented with roses and branches of ivy; the interior has a cap of blonde, with white rose and a branch of ivy hanging down. Taffetas mantelet composed of pale pink glace silk, decorated with a ruching of ribbon, and silk fringe. Robe of organdi, a round body, with bretelles. A double skirt, with side trimmings of narrow velvet.

FIG. 3.—Carriage dress. Bonnet of rice straw and white silk, trimmed with primroses, blonde, and tulle; the front is formed of a width of rice straw coming very forward on the head, in the Pamela style; the crown is sloping, and a row of lace is put along the edge of the front, as a face, and continued along the rice straw curtain. Dubarry mantilla of plain white muslin, cut in the shawl shape; at the neck there is a rather full hood, falling full and round behind. It is decorated with flounces of lace. Satin robe with double skirt, the upper one decorated with velvet and lace.

FIG. 4.—Country Dress. Rice straw hat, trimmed with ribbon, blonde, and flowers; the brim slightly tends to a point in front, and bends toward the face; a row of blonde hangs down all round. Robe of gray silk; a double skirt, with quilles of satin. Black taffetas mantle, with bands of pale blue velvet, and finished with guipures and black lace.

LITERARY.

HAVELOCK died four months ago. The first biography of the brave soldier and Christian is already out. Carter & Brothers publish Mr. Brock's memoir, which is written to supply the immediate demand for such a work, pending the preparation of a larger work by Mr. Marshman, the brother of Lady Havelock. Mr. M. and Lady H. have supplied Mr. Brock with abundance of material; so that the memoir appears to be quite thorough, though confined chiefly to the Christian character of his subject. We need not say that it possesses great interest. Few such men have lived. From boyhood his life seems to have been one of vigorous principle, energetic and noble.

In school days he was once caught with a black eye. The master questioned him as to its origin. "It came there," was his reply, nor did a thrashing bring any more out. He had interfered in a fight to help a friend who was not getting fair treatment, and, although he was not blameworthy, he would not, to show his own innocence, reveal his friend's fault. He was nicknamed by the boys "Old Phlos," from that cool, philosophical character which he preserved in after life.

The charm of his whole life is his Christian principle. Let the man who has the idea that earnest religion is incompatible with brave and hearty life read this and see his error. One of the strangest scenes in the history of Christianity that we have met with is related of him when he was in Burmah. After that memorable success which all readers of the life of Dr. Judson remember, when the British soldiers were in possession of Rangoon, Havelock, pursuing his invariable course of religious meetings with his soldiers, transformed a room in the great Shivey Dagoon pagoda into a Christian prayer room. "All around the chamber were smaller images of Boodh, in the usual position, sitting with their legs gathered up and crossed, and the hands resting on the lap, in symbol and expression of repose." An officer strolling around the pagoda heard the sound of a psalm tune. Astonished, he entered the temple, and, guided by the sound, reached a room where "what should meet his eye but Havelock, with his Bible and hymn-book before him, and more than a hundred men seated around him?" Their lights were lamps set in the laps of the idols! That scene is worth painting for a grand historical picture of English conquest, and as a monument of one of England's greatest Christian soldiers.

Doctor Gray has long occupied his position at the head of American botanists, and we have, from time to time, announced valuable works from his hands. We have now two excellent volumes, which leave nothing to be desired in this department of science. Ivison & Phinney publish GRAY'S STRUCTURAL AND SYSTEMATIC BOTANY, and GRAY'S MANUAL OF THE BOTANY OF THE NORTHERN UNITED STATES (a revised and enlarged edition), both works profusely and accurately illustrated. They are, of course, useful both as text-books for schools and as reference books for the family. No farmer or agriculturist, on a large or a small scale, should be without such books. The Manual possesses a great attraction to us in its fullness on the subject of ferns and mosses. We are not singular in our admiration of these plants. Our country abounds in exquisite varieties, and the most beautiful collections that we have seen have been made in the Northern States of the Union. Many ladies find a pleasant and instructive employment in gathering them. It is worthy of remark, that a recent traveler in the Holy Land states that a friend requested him to procure for him specimens of mosses, but from Cairo to Banias he found but one specimen, and that in Jerusalem. The variety of mosses in America is very great, extending in number, if we mistake not, to some hundreds.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, April 19, in the Senate, information was received from the War Department respecting Utah contracts made without Congressional authorization. Memorials praying for aid for ocean steamers between New York, Philadelphia, and New Orleans, and certain European ports, were presented by Senators Slidell and Bigler. Senator Mason submitted a bill for the relief of the claimants in the case of the privateer General Armstrong; also a resolution inquiring whether the courtesy of the British Government at Jamaica to the men of the Susquehanna did not require acknowledgment. The Deficiency Bill was then considered, on motion of Senator Hunter, but no vote was taken.——In the House, the Washington Police Bill was debated. Memorials in favor of steamship lines between Philadelphia and Europe were presented, and Mr. Florence gave notice of a general bill to regulate the steam service between various ports in the United States and Europe.

On Tuesday, 20th, in the Senate, Senator Houston spoke in favor of establishing a protectorate over Mexico, and offered a resolution appointing a committee of seven to inquire into the expediency of the measure. The Deficiency Bill having been taken up, Mr. Hale's amendment was put and lost by 21 to 30. On motion of Senator Clark, the vote on the Pacific Railroad Bill was reconsidered.——In the House, Mr. Morrill spoke in favor of his bill granting land to the States for the establishment of agricultural colleges. The Washington Police Bill, from the Senate, was then taken up and tabled by 110 to 79. The Military Academy Appropriation Bill having been taken up in Committee of the Whole, a sharp interchange of words took place between Messrs. Shaw, Giddings, Campbell, and Clingman, in reference to the Lecompton question.

On Wednesday, 21st, in the Senate, a petition in favor of a line of European steamers from Philadelphia was presented by Senator Cameron. Resolutions of the Wisconsin Legislature against Lecompton were presented by Senator Durkee. Senator Wilson introduced a resolution authorizing the President to suspend the sales of land in Kansas for twelve months. Senator Mason introduced a resolution authorizing the President to take such measures against Paraguay for the reparation of the outrage upon the Water Witch as circumstances may require. This was sustained by Senators Douglas and Allen, but opposed by Senators Collamer and Mallory. The Deficiency Bill was taken up, and an amendment of Senator Fessenden, confining the appropriations to the fiscal year, was discussed.——In the House, Mr. George Taylor reported from the Select Committee a bill for the establishment of a bureau of printing, binding, engraving, lithographing, and electrotyping; referred to Committee of the Whole. Mr. Boyce called up the Nebraska election report, and moved that further delay be granted for the adduction of evidence: granted. The House having gone into Committee of the Whole on the West Point Appropriation Bill, it was passed.

On Thursday, 22d, in the Senate, Senator Seward presented the reply of the American Telegraph Company to the memorials of Amos Kendall. Senator Seward introduced a bill for a telegraph to San Francisco; referred to the Army Committee. Senator Mason's resolution on Paraguay was taken up and discussed, as also was the Deficiency Bill.——In the House, the bill granting lands to the States for the establishment of agricultural colleges was passed by 104 to 101. The bill granting pensions to veterans of 1812 was then taken up, and notice of many amendments given.

On Friday, 23d, in the Senate, Mr. Morrill's bill granting lands to the States for agricultural colleges was received and referred. Senator Green asked and obtained—in spite of objections by Senator Stuart—leave to present the report of the Kansas Conference Committee. Remarks were made thereon by Senators Seward and Green, and it was made the special order for Monday.——In the House, Mr. J. Glancy Jones asked but failed to obtain permission to print the Indian Appropriation and Indian Deficiency bills. Mr. English then read the majority report of the Kansas Conference Committee. Mr. English made a few remarks thereon, and Mr. Howard was about to speak in reply, when several motions for postponement were pressed. That of Mr. Hill, of Georgia, for postponing the question till 2d May prevailed by 108 to 105. Some further conversation took place between Messrs. Harris, Stephens, Hill, Trippe, Burnett, Gartrell, and others; and the House adjourned in some confusion.

On Saturday, 24th, in the Senate, some private matters were disposed of, after which Senator Gwin brought in his bill for securing the lives of passengers on board steamers; referred. The Deficiency Bill was then taken up, and Senator Fessenden's amendment lost by 22 to 30. Speeches were made by Senators Wade, Wilson, and Hale, and the bill then passed by 28 to 19.——In the House, after remarks by Messrs. Stephens, Campbell, Clay, Hill, and Montgomery, Mr. Harris's motion to reconsider the vote postponing further consideration of the Kansas question till 2d May was carried by 105 to 101. Some further motions of secondary importance were put and lost, and the House adjourned without disposing of the subject.

REPORT OF THE KANSAS CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The report of the majority of the Kansas Conference Committee, of which mention is made above, refers to the people of Kansas, for their acceptance or rejection, not the Lecompton Constitution, but the ordinance granting to Kansas certain public lands, which are granted to every new State on entering the Union. If they accept the ordinance by a majority vote, Kansas is to be admitted with the Lecompton Constitution. If they reject it, Kansas remains a Territory until she shall have ninety-three thousand inhabitants. The election is to be conducted by a Board of Commissioners, embracing the Territorial Governor, the Secretary, the Attorney-General, and the two Speakers of the Legislature. From this report two members of the Committee, Senator Seward and Mr. Howard, of the House, dissent.

INSTRUCTIONS OF OUR MINISTER TO CHINA.

The instructions to Mr. Reed, as Minister to China, have been published.

The Secretary of State informs him that the objects which it is understood the French and English Allies seek to accomplish by treaty stipulations are: To procure from the Chinese Government a recognition of the rights of other powers to have accredited ministers at the Court of Pekin, to be received by the Emperor, and be in communication with the authorities charged with the foreign affairs of the empire; an extensive commercial intercourse with China, which is now restricted to the free ports enumerated in the treaty; a reduction of the tariff duties levied on domestic produce in the transit from the interior to the coast, as the amount now imposed is said to be in violation of the treaty; a stipulation for religious freedom to all foreign residents of China; arrangements for the suppression of piracy; a provision for extending the benefits of the proposed treaty to all other civilized powers of the earth.

These objects, the Secretary says, "are recognized by the President as just, expedient, and so far as you can do so by peaceful co-operation, he expects you will aid in their accomplishment. In conformity with this policy, you will communicate frankly with the British and French ministers upon all points of common interest, so that it may be distinctly understood the three nations are equally influenced by a determination to obtain justice, and by a desire to procure treaty arrangements for the extension and more adequate protection of their commercial intercourse with China. But on your side these efforts must be confined to firm representations appealing to the justice and policy of the Chinese authorities, leaving your own Government to determine upon the course to be adopted should your representations be fruitless."

SECRETARY CASS ON THE SLAVE-TRADE.

The papers and correspondence between Lord Napier and the Secretary of State, called for by the Senate, relating to the slave-trade, are now before the Senate, and ordered to be printed. The whole matter is very voluminous. The reply of General Cass occupies fifty-one pages. In opening it he says, rather tartly, to Lord Napier that, while he concurred in the opinion of his lordship that the efforts of the British Government have been increasing for the extinction of this traffic, still he must be permitted to say its hope of the "hearty co-operation of the naval forces of the United States" might safely have been entertained without appealing to the example of Great Britain. General Cass says the United States have not been less anxious than Great Britain for the extermination of this commerce, as they have given proof; that the system of joint blockade has been pursued for some years, and the benefit it has produced bears no reasonable proportion, he regrets to say, to the expenditure of life and treasure it has cost; that this failure need not discourage the anxious hopes of Christendom; that there is another method of proceeding without the dangers and difficulties and inefficiency which beset a blockade, and which is sure to succeed if adopted and persevered in, and that is—to close the slave marts of the world, or rather of the island of Cuba, which is now almost the only region where the slave dealer can find a market. Speaking of the United States, he says the introduction of a slave into this country is a fact which he believes the present generation has not witnessed, and attributes it to a sound state of public opinion. He argues that the conventional arrangements which exist between Great Britain and France and Spain, for their mutual co-operation in the suppression of the slave-trade, do not seem to have produced the desired result, and that upon the course of the Spanish government far more depends than upon the most rigorous blockade of the African coast. He recommends the extension of free-colored establishments along the coast of Africa as efficient in suppressing the slave-trade. He discusses with much force, and with the slightest spice of ridicule, the new scheme of forced labor called "apprenticeship," or of "involuntary emigrants" by the French government, and recognized by the British. In conclusion, he then says: "I am instructed by the President to inform your Lordship, that while he is determined to execute the treaty of 1842 with fidelity and efficiency, he is not prepared, under existing circumstances, to enter into any new stipulations on the subject of the African slave-trade."

COUNT WALEWSKI'S VIEWS ON THE SUBJECT.

Among the papers transmitted to the Senate from the President, on the subject of African Slavery, and African and Coolie laborers, is one from Mr. Mason, our Minister to France, dated February 19, in which he relates a conversation with Count Walewski. Mr. Mason inquired whether there was any truth in the statements in the English newspapers that French vessels freighted with African emigrants would be regarded by British cruisers as engaged in the African slave-trade? Count Walewski replied no, that there had been some communication between the two Governments, and that the British would not object to the French scheme while the wants of the British colonies were being supplied by the Coolie trade. Count Walewski urged that by the plan adopted to secure African labor, which is indispensable to their colonies, the emigrants were free, and were rescued generally from impending immolation; that, relieved from ignorance and heathenism of the most degraded character, they would be humanized and Christianized by being placed in contact with the French colonists. It does not appear whether a consideration is to be paid to the chiefs of tribes for their captures, or the people; but Mr. Mason infers there is. Nor is the duration of their service explained, and it remains to be seen whether any of the emigrants will serve their term or return to their country. Judging from the tone of the public press, and reasoning a priori, Mr. Mason feels confident that in future we will see fanatical denunciation of American Slavery greatly moderated, if not silenced, in France—perhaps in England. He adds, that it is quite evident that the conviction is gaining strength, both in England and France, that the compulsory emancipation of the slaves in their tropical colonies by authority of their Governments was a grave political error—an error unjust to the colonists, whose rights of property were destroyed, and to the colonies by the annihilation of the labor which made them productive, without securing any compensating benefit.

HIGH LIFE AT WASHINGTON.

A correspondent of the New York Times is responsible for the following: "A capital story is told at the expense of a lady-resident, who has prided herself on the exclusiveness of the society which has graced her saloons. A double-distilled-double-F. V., no one could obtain invitations to her parties whose ecusson did not bear the quarterings of some old family, and thus these entertainments were accused of resembling the tournaments of ancient times, where the guests were led—not from any prospect of amusement—but merely to prove their right to ennuyer themselves en bonne compagnie. Foreigners, however, were always welcomed, and this winter one of her 'pets' has been a romantic looking young Frenchman, who avoided the Legation as representing a usurper, and therefore not worthy the attention of one like himself, of the 'vieille roche.' The young man, enveloping himself somewhat in mystery, assumed the dignity of LOUIS QUATORZE, in his earlier days, and his decisions on all fashionable matters were law. Where he lived no one exactly knew, as his letters were left in WILLARD'S card-basket, but yesterday, his aristocratic protector persuaded GAUTIER to let her look at the furnaces of his restaurant-kitchen, and there—must it be said—she found M. le Compte, in white apron and paper cap, constructing a mayonnaise. 'This young man is my best cook,' said GAUTIER, but Madame —— did not wait to receive his salutations."

PERSONAL.

The correspondent of the Courier and Enquirer writes: "The spring flowers remind the President of the necessity of selecting in time comfortable summer quarters. He has directed a friend to negotiate with General Hiram Walbridge for the use of his beautiful villa of Ingleside during the hot season. Ingleside is about one mile out of the city, and immediately northward from the White House. It is to be the rural abode of the Chief Magistrate of the country. The point of difference between the landlord and the President is a singular one—General Walbridge objects to the receipt of rent, while Mr. Buchanan positively and properly objects to taking the property unless at a fair yearly rent. The correct views of the President will doubtless prevail."

The Hon. Tom F. Marshall publishes the following card in the Cincinnati Commercial:

"In a notice which the Commercial the other day was kind enough to take of my discourse at Smith and Nixon's on temperance, it was stated that I had embraced Christianity, from which it has been inferred that I had joined some religious sect. I am receiving letters containing abundance of pious exhortations, prayers, etc., which annoy me exceedingly. I have joined no church, and have not the most remote idea of doing so. I am no infidel, certainly; but have a very fair copy of the Scriptures, which I read, and to which alone I refer for religious truths. I have never knowingly deceived any one, and am constrained to take this method of undeceiving the public."

Mr. Everett has been a second time compelled to postpone his Southern tour. The Charleston Mercury of the 19th publishes this card:

"A CARD.—The subscriber, having this day received letters from his family which again make it necessary for him to return home, begs leave, in this way, to express to the public bodies and committees which have honored him with invitations to repeat his address 'on the Character of Washington,' his deep regret that he is obliged a second time to postpone the fulfillment of his engagements. EDWARD EVERETT.

"CHARLESTON, S. C., April 16, 1858."

The St. Louis Democrat thus describes the appearance of the coffins which contained the remains of the aged Benton and his young grandchild:

"By its side was the little coffin containing the body of the statesman's grandchild, M'Dowell Jones. Each body was inclosed in an air-tight zinc case, which was laid within a mahogany coffin. A lid was raised so as to allow friends to look through a glass on the faces of the dead. The face of the Great Missourian wore that expression of majestic placidity which was habitual to him in life. The lips were slightly open, the eyes closed, and every lineament in the face in a state of repose that indicated how gentle and peaceful had been the end of the veteran's stormy life. There was no discoloration or wrinkle to be seen, and the presence of death was visible only in the closed eyelids and the cold, white, marble-like appearance of the features. The grandchild lay as sweetly as though only sleeping, with its little head, covered with golden hair, nestling amidst white hyacinths and early spring flowers, whose purity was typical of its own young spirit."

General Twiggs, Captain M'Kitt, Captain Witters, and Dr. M'Cormick, of the Army, arrived at Galveston on the 8th ult., en route to attend the court-martial at Newport, where the General is required to answer charges preferred by the Secretary of War.

N. P. Willis is lying seriously ill at Idlewild. A bilious fever, and a return of his old trouble of the lungs, have combined in a prostration against which his usual active resistance to disease has succumbed for the present.

The New York correspondent of the Boston Journal says: "We have a new prodigy in this city in the person of a boy preacher. He is about fifteen years of age. His name is Cranmond Kennedy. He is a Baptist, and belongs to the church of Rev. Mr. Adams, on Christopher Street. He is a convert in the late revival, has already been licensed to preach by that church, and is just now attracting large crowds to hear him. His style is vehement; his sermons have in them much method; he speaks wholly extemporaneously; and his system of theology seems to be mature, and after the school of the sounder and more conservative schools of the day. He preaches and speaks nearly every night. His houses are crowded to overflowing; and for a season he will be the great attraction of our city."

Mr. M. H. Grinnell, being about to make a tour in Europe with his family, has sold his famous schooner-yacht Haze, to Mr. W. H. M'Vicker, of the New York Yacht Club. In proof of the stanchness, speed, and good sea-going qualities of the Haze, it may be mentioned that an association of pilots offered for her the price at which she was sold, namely, $8000.

Rev. John Lyon, a teacher at Kirkwood, Missouri, having become deeply engaged in religious exercises, continued his fasting and prayer until his health and reason gave way, and he has been taken to the insane asylum at Fulton. He had been greatly exercised with the idea that God would do nothing to save men without a certain amount and intensity of prayer on the part of Christians, and his mania now takes the form of a painful conviction that if he stops praying the divine government will at once suspend operations, and the universe go to ruin.

A Methodist missionary in the Puget's Sound district writes that his charge embraces an extent of country two hundred miles long, one hundred and fifty of which has to be traveled in an ocean steamer. No country west of us; no preachers beyond us. We have 14,000 Indians and about 7000 whites, and 100 church members.

The Boston Journal says that Rev. Dr. Prentiss, of the Mercer Street Church in New York, has placed in the hands of the officers of his church his resignation. It is not probable that the resignation will be accepted. He will have leave of absence for some months, and the parish will probably settle a colleague. The frail condition of Dr. Prentiss's health is the reason for the step he has taken.

The Common Council of Cleveland has appropriated $6000 for the preparation of a monument in honor of Commodore Perry.

The celebrated bigamist, Dr. Haynes, who has just served a four years' imprisonment in the Kentucky penitentiary, was again arrested in Louisville on the 14th ultimo.

The Hon. John C. Mather is still detained in Albany by a severe attack of inflammatory rheumatism.

The Boston Bee mentions that four of the most enterprising merchants of that city have gone to Europe "to purchase goods for the next season."

Mr. David A. Neal, late vice-president of the Illinois Central Railroad, has commenced a suit against the company in the United States Circuit Court, for $250,000, for services rendered to the company while in its employ.

Dr. Wistar, of Philadelphia, pronounces Mr. Sumner's case still "serious," and prohibits any attention for the present to business.

A portrait of Joshua Bates, the London banker, has just been added to the gallery of eminent merchants in the possession of the Boston Mercantile Library Association.

WILLIAM WALKER'S WHEREABOUTS.

A New Orleans correspondent of the St. Louis Republican writes as follows: "If there be any filibusters in St. Louis, it may interest them to learn that the redoubtable ex-President of Nicaragua, General William Walker, is now in this city, and has been for a month past. He is coolly and contentedly waiting his trial before the United States District Court, on charges of violating the neutrality laws, which is expected to take place some time in May. He keeps himself secluded in his room, and writes, I understand, as industriously and continuously as if committing to paper the minute particulars of the last few busy and eventful years of his life. An ardent friend and follower of the renowned filibuster informs me that another raid upon Nicaragua is not only contemplated, but in actual preparation, and that the confidence in its success is just as great as it ever was; that General Henningsen has been busy securing friends to the cause, arranging for recruiting and making other preparations, and that no formidable obstacle is expected to interfere—least of all, a third interference on the part of our Government. Henningsen made a mysterious Southern tour recently, which extended into Texas; but the supposition that he was merely sounding the prospects of taking part in the movement for a Sierra Madre Republic, is as reasonable as any other. Many are itching to have a hand in that movement."

DYING HOURS OF REV. DUDLEY A. TYNG.

We alluded last week to the sad accident which had befallen the Rev. Dudley A. Tyng. The Philadelphia Press says: "From the time of the fatal accident to one hour previous to his death Mr. Tyng had an unfaltering confidence in his recovery, and even conversed freely and hopefully upon what, as he believed, Providence had designed to teach him in the dispensation to which he was being subjected. He believed it was intended to promote his greater efficiency as a minister of the Gospel, and he looked forward with bright hopes when he should again be able to preach, and to preach as he had never done before. About one hour before his dissolution, his family, fearing that his hopes of recovery were groundless, approached him with the solemn intimation that in all probability he was soon to leave them. His physician entering the chamber at the instant, Mr. Tyng spoke to him of these fears. The doctor's reply was that they were only too true—that his time was fast drawing to a close. The dying man, with the same heroic spirit, which never forsook him through all his sufferings, received the solemn announcement with the utmost resignation, answering only, 'Then it is well—it is very well; God's will be done.'

"After a few moments of composure he called his friends present and the members of his family to his bedside, to bid them a last farewell. He thanked his physician, who is not a professing Christian, for his kind attention, warning him with great tenderness to lose no time in giving himself to that Saviour who was now sustaining him in the hour of trial. To each of his children he gave an affectionate farewell, hoping that, by the grace of God and the care of a devoted mother, they might be early brought 'to know their Saviour.' To his wife, who has ministered to him with so much affection and fidelity all through his illness, he included in his parting words the request that she would use her endeavors to bring their boys up to the ministry. He was now to say farewell to his venerable father, Rev. Stephen H. Tyng, D.D. Taking his aged parent by the hand, he said, with much earnestness, 'Stand up for Jesus, father; stand up for Jesus! and tell my brethren in the ministry, wherever you meet them, to stand up for Jesus.'

"At the close of this solemn ceremony, feeling that he was approaching his end, he requested those around him to sing a hymn. After a moment of silence, his own wife, notwithstanding the solemn circumstances under which this request was made, commenced singing the beautiful hymn—made doubly so by its appropriateness to the occasion—beginning,

'Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in thee.'

"The hymn was sung, and even while the echoes of that mournful strain yet floated in the air the spirit of Dudley A. Tyng took its flight to other, and, as we have reason to believe, more blissful realms."

BAPTISM IN HOOPS.

At Chicago, last week, a rather amusing scene took place during the baptism of a young lady by the pastor of the Tabernacle. The Union says: "The minister requested her to assume the dress peculiar to such an occasion, but she declined to take off her hooped skirt; the minister told her of the inconvenience that must result from her obstinacy, but she persisted. When she came to descend into the bath, the inflated skirt touched the water and rose up around her like a balloon. Her head was lost to the congregation, she was swallowed up in the swelling skirt; the minister tried to force her down into the bath, but she was kept above the surface by the floating properties of the crinoline, and was buoyed up so successfully that it was not until after much difficulty and many forcible attempts to submerge the lady, the minister succeeded in baptizing the fair one. Finally it was effected, to the relief of the minister and the seriously-inclined audience, who could not keep from laughing in their pocket-kerchiefs."

MISS CUSHMAN IN REAL TRAGEDY.

The Nashville (Tennessee) Union says: "A little incident occurred during the performance of Macbeth on Wednesday night which, but for the wonderful presence of mind of Miss Cushman, would have seriously marred the interest of the occasion. In the sleeping scene in the fifth act, as Lady Macbeth approaches from her chamber, lamp in hand, the light lace vail with which Miss Cushman's head and shoulders were covered caught fire, and blazed like tinder. Miss Cushman, without relaxing a muscle of her fixed features, or showing by any visible sign the least discomposure, caught the blazing robe in her grasp and immediately extinguished it, without turning her eyes either right or left, or betraying the least sign of emotion of any kind. So promptly and fearlessly was it done, and so much was it in keeping with the character she was playing, that notwithstanding the distinctly audible shrieks of some of the ladies, many present actually believed it to be a part of the performance. It certainly was, if not in the bills, one of the greatest pieces of acting we ever witnessed."

A SENATOR ELECTED BY A LOVE LETTER.

We read in a Providence Journal: "In a certain town in this State a letter arrived for a young lady from her lover, on the day of the election. The postmaster, as is not infrequent in the rural districts, knowing the eagerness with which a message of that tender character would be expected, took upon himself the pleasing duty of delivering it; but first, like a good Democrat, he must vote, and, of course, in a separate self-sealing envelope. This was duly prepared, with the Democratic tickets safely inclosed, and the gluten stuck together. Stopping at the town meeting, he deposited the letter in the ballot-box, and proceeded with the separate and self-sealed to the house of the blooming maiden, to whom he gallantly handed the entire Democratic ticket, State and town. How the lady interpreted the missive we do not know; but the moderator and clerk ungallantly refused to count the love letter, and the Republican candidate was declared elected by one majority."

A LITTLE MORE GRAPE FOR UTAH.

The Baltimore American of the 19th ultimo says: "We learn from Colonel Taylor that the celebrated light artillery corps, known as 'Captain Bragg's Battery,' which rendered such invaluable service in the late war with Mexico, has been ordered by the Secretary of War to proceed to Utah, and left here in the western train of last evening en route for Fort Leavenworth. The company consists of seventy-four men, including non-commissioned officers and the following officers in command: Major John F. Reynolds, Third artillery, Lieutenant C. M'Keene, Lieutenant John Edwards, and Lieutenant A. Wildrick. The company carries with it their light battery, consisting of four six-pounders and four caissons, but will not be mounted until they reach Fort Leavenworth, which will be about the 20th of May. Leaving that post, they expect to travel at the rate of fifteen miles per day, and reach Utah some time during the month of July."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

ACCIDENT TO THE LEVIATHAN.

A FEW days ago considerable anxiety was manifested on the river for the safety of the Leviathan steamship, moored off Deptford, in consequence of the breaking of two of her bow mooring chains. Some steamers which laid between the Leviathan and the shore assisted in checking the canting of the bow of the ship inward. With all expedition a large hawser was laid out to the Dreadnought, and three powerful steamtugs were brought to bear on the port bow, in hauling the ship into her former position. Fortunately the squall was of short duration, but the weather continued boisterous, and the tugs were engaged until late in the evening in keeping the bow out. She sustained not the slightest injury, and as far as could be learned none of the vessels that were lying inside her were damaged. It should be stated that the moorings at the stern remained firm.

PROSPECT OF TROUBLE WITH NAPLES.

The London Herald has reason to believe that the present law officers of the Crown have come to a decision in the Cagliari matter directly at variance with that of their predecessors, who, as will be remembered, were of opinion that England had no right to interfere in that matter.

BULWER'S FACE AND BEARD.

Sir Bulwer's dislike to "parliamentary whiskers" has become so very strong as to have made him run into the opposite extreme, if one may judge from the following description of his own hirsute appearance, as given by the writer of sketches of "The Inner Life of the House of Commons," in the Illustrated Times: "Sir Bulwer's face is a marvel, but it is a marvel of his own making; and all that is strange about it might be removed in half an hour by a village barber. It is simply a case of bad cultivation. A comb, a pair of scissors, and a razor would, in skillful hands, metamorphose him into a personable man, which at present he certainly is not. He has a capital forehead, a prominent but not a bad nose, and we suspect that he has good features generally; but we can not vouch for this, for they are, for the most part, entirely concealed by an extraordinary growth of hair. Indeed, Sir Bulwer seems to be a Nazarite; for certainly no scissors or razor, nor as we imagine, even a comb, is ever allowed to come near his head. His hair proper is all disheveled and unkempt, and his beard and mustache grow according to their own will. Some men wear beard, whiskers, and mustaches; others shave the whiskers and beard, and leave the mustache; while others preserve the mustache and part of the beard, but eschew whiskers; but in all these varieties, and a great many more, there are marks of design. But Sir Bulwer despises all art, and lets Nature take her own way, and the result is, probably, the most astonishing human face in the world."

LORD ROSSE NOT WEATHER-WISE.

The Dublin Evening Post says: "For some months past idle rumors have prevailed to the effect that the Earl Rosse has declared it as his belief that the approaching summer would be one of the hottest seasons ever witnessed in Ireland. It is a lamentable evidence of credulity, even among educated people, that this ridiculous tale was believed by many. But it is now completely disposed of in the following communication, which we have received this morning from Lord Rosse:

"'THE CASTLE, PARSONSTOWN, March 25.

"'Lord Rosse presents his compliments to the editor of the Evening Post, and, having observed a quotation from the Limerick Reporter, in which his name is associated with some conjectures as to the approaching season, he begs to say that he has never expressed any opinion on the subject.'"

FRANCE.

ORSINI'S LAST LETTER.

The following letter has been published in the Italian papers. It is not generally believed that it is authentic:

"To His Majesty Napoleon III., Emperor of the French.

"SIRE,—The fact of your Imperial Majesty having permitted the publication of my letter of the 11th of February, while it is a clear proof of your generosity, shows me that the wishes expressed in favor of my country find an echo in your heart, and to me, about to die, it is certainly no small comfort to see how your Imperial Majesty is moved by true Italian sentiments.

"In a few hours I shall be no more; but, before drawing my last breath, I wish it to be known, and I declare it with that frankness and courage which, up to this day, I have never belied, that assassination, in whatever form it may disguise itself, does not enter into my principles, notwithstanding that, by a fatal mental error, I allowed myself to be led into organizing the attempt of the 14th of January. No, political assassination was not a part of my system, and I have combated it, exposing my very life, as well by writings as by public facts, at the time when a mission of Government put me in a position to do so.

"And let my countrymen, instead of putting faith in the system of assassination, utterly reject it, and know by the voice of a dying patriot that their redemption must be won by abnegation, by a constant unity of efforts and sacrifices, and by the exercise of true virtue; gifts which already germ in the young and active part of my co-nationals—the only gifts that will ever make Italy free, independent, and worthy of the glory with which our forefathers illustrated her.

"I die; but, while doing so with calmness and dignity, I desire that my memory should not remain stained by any misdeed.

"As to the victims of the 14th January, I offer my blood as a sacrifice, and I pray the Italians that, when the day of their independence comes, they will give a worthy compensation to all those who then suffered injury.

"Finally, let your Imperial Majesty permit me to ask, not my own life, but that of the two accomplices who were condemned to death with me.

"With the most profound respect, etc.,

"FELICE ORSINI.

"Prison de la Roquette, March 11, 1858."

OPENING OF THE NEW BOULEVARD OF SEBASTOPOL.

The opening of the new Boulevard of Sebastopol took place on 5th April. The Paris correspondent of the Times thus describes the scene: "The Emperor left the Tuileries at two o'clock precisely. He was mounted on a splendid charger with rich housings. He was preceded by half a dozen Cent Gardes, and followed by a numerous body of general officers, among whom were the Duke de Malakoff, Marshal Vaillant, Marshal Magnan, Admiral Hamelin, his Military Secretary, General Espinasse, and a considerable number of aides-de-camp, orderly officers, etc. I may observe that on his passage from the Tuileries up to the Strasbourg station the Emperor rode along, at a distance of about fifty paces in advance of the staff of general officers who attended him, and more than that to the rear of the few Cent Gardes who preceded him. The Empress, in an open carriage, and accompanied by the Princess Mathilde, with her equeries riding on each side, and preceded by a squadron of the Cent Gardes and her ladies-in-waiting, followed. The cortége proceeded along the quays till it reached the Place du Chatelet, where the Prefects of the Seine and Police, with their respective secretaries, awaited his Majesty. A flag-staff, erected at the entrance of the Pont au Change, suddenly displayed a tricolored flag at its summit, as a signal to those at the other extremity of the new Boulevard that the Emperor was coming along the Quay de la Megisserie.

"Two lofty minarets had been erected at the end of the new line where it joins the Boulevard St. Denis. They were rich in gilding and imperial ornaments. Between them was suspended a huge curtain, displaying golden bees and the imperial arms at the top, and divided into lozenges in gold. This curtain concealed from the spectators the new section of the line which extends to the river, and it was only as the Emperor approached that it was to be thrown open. The moment the signal was seen flying from the lofty pole on the Pont au Change, the curtain fell, and his Majesty, as he reached the bridge, took in at one glance the whole sweep of boulevard from where he stood to the northern extremity of Paris. From that spot it was one of the finest sights that could well be witnessed, with the immense multitude that lined the way, the troops, whose arms glittered in the sun, the gilded minarets, and the flags and streamers flying from house-tops and balconies. The windows, from the ground floors to the topmost stories, were full of spectators, and men and women might be seen watching from the roofs the progress of the gay cavalcade.

"The moment the Emperor appeared, holding with a light hand the beautiful but fiery charger on which he rode, keeping his paces as slow as possible, and thus presenting himself alone in advance of all guard or escort, an immense shout broke forth, and hailed him as he advanced from the Place du Chatelet, and did not cease till he reached the railway station. The Emperor did not remain long at the terminus. He again mounted on horseback, and, accompanied by his generals, and followed at the same distance as before by the escort of cavalry, he descended to the Great Boulevard, and instead of returning by the way he came, which was lined with troops, rode along the Boulevard, on which there was not a single soldier, turned down the Rue de la Paix, and in this way entered the Palace of the Tuileries. The Emperor's reception was most flattering. The usual precautions were taken against mischief, but nothing whatever occurred to disturb the tranquillity which reigned unbroken the whole of the day."

THE PERIM QUESTION IN FRANCE.

The Débats has a leader on the subject of the British occupation of the Isle of Perim. It says that, although it was premature in stating that a collective note had been addressed to England by the Cabinets of France and Russia, yet "it is true, and should surprise no one, that this affair of Perim has recently been the subject of a serious conversation between Count Walewski and Count Kisseleff, Embassador of Russia." It then gives its own version of the several occupations, combats the deductions of Mr. Vernon Smith, and concludes: "Under any circumstances, Turkey protests against this new occupation, which is effected without her authorization, and under totally different circumstances from those in which the two countries found themselves in 1799. She vindicates firmly her rights over the Isle of Perim, which she will neither gratuitously cede nor sell to England. The Sultan refuses to grant the firman asked from him to authorize the piercing of the Isthmus of Suez, at least until the English restore Perim. The Porte knows the value which the whole of Europe, except the English Government, attach to the execution of this grand project. Is it not, then, as if Turkey appealed to Europe, to all the co-signatory Powers of the Treaty of Paris, against this open violation of her territory, against this attack made against the independence and integrity of the Ottoman Empire?" In another part it declares Perim to be a "second Gibraltar." As this spot is now the subject of a political "difficulty," the subjoined information may prove interesting: When the French took possession of Egypt in 1799, the English began to fortify the island, but quitted it soon after 1801, in which year Egypt was restored to the Turks. Somewhat to the south of Perim, and close to the African coast, is an island which is well known as the "Acht Brüder" (it is marked in English charts as "High Brothers"), and of this British troops are said recently to have taken possession. When the English returned to Perim about a year ago they found that no one had meddled with the fortifications and reservoirs which they had begun to make at the beginning of this century.

THE SPY SYSTEM IN PARIS.

The correspondent of the Herald says: "General Espinasse seems determined to immortalize his superintendence of the Home Department. With his comrade, M. Bottellier, as Prefect of Police, the system of espionage is carried to an extent that, unless one saw it in actual operation, would be incredible. To you it must be completely so. But the police now regularly visit every house in Paris once a day where the residents are known not to be adherents of the present dynasty, or profess political opinions in any degree contrary to the prevailing ones. If a foreigner, these domiciliary visits are made at his residence with more exact punctuality. The concierge is required to give in every instance a description of the parties visiting at the house, their names and abodes. The bonnes, or female domestics, are summoned before the Judge de Paix, and questioned as to all that happens under their eye; and are informed that unless they render a faithful account the livré which every servant must have signed once a year by the police will be denied them. Many bonnes, rather than submit to the office imposed upon them, have quitted their service and gone to the country. In this country, however, the espionage is carried on with such rigorous exactness that every tenth man may be said to have an eye upon his neighbor. The Emperor, as if conscious of the reports of his unpopularity, has been of late rather ostentatiously driving about in his phaeton, with no other attendants than his two grooms seated behind him, and yesterday astonished the beau monde in the Champs Elysées by driving down through the avenue at an ordinary pace. Usually his pace is something like fourteen miles an hour."

ANOTHER EXPLOIT OF ESPINASSE.

The correspondent of the Manchester Guardian tells the following story of General Espinasse: "A very short time ago a printer, named B——, had his license taken from him for some offense. He applied for an audience and never obtained one. At last, three or four days back, he got to see the secretary, and said, 'Tell the Minister I must see him—that it is an affair of life or death.' This being repeated to him, General Espinasse fancied the words applied to some plot against the Emperor, and at last admitted the man. The moment he saw him he exclaimed, hurriedly, 'Well, what have you to reveal?' The printer looked surprised—'I have to speak to your Excellency of my license, which has been arbitrarily taken from me,' was the reply. At this General Espinasse turned round in a rage, saying, 'What do you mean, then, by pretending you have to speak to me of a question of life or death?' 'But so it is,' answered the victim—'it is life or death to me—it is my bread—the bread of my children * *.' Here he was interrupted by the Minister's exclamation of 'What is that to me?' and was told angrily to retire. Before doing so, he tried another chance, and said: 'But think of my workmen. I have fifty or a hundred workmen, more or less; they will starve.' Whether General Espinasse fancied this hid a threat or not, I can not say; but he, upon this, most violently retorted, 'Dont talk of your workmen to me! Tell them we are not afraid of workmen; and if they trouble us, we will shoot them.'"

ANOTHER AMERICAN HEIRESS GONE.

The Paris correspondent of the Boston Traveler says: "I regret to say that after Easter Miss Ridgway, the wealthy Philadelphia heiress, will be led to the altar by a Frenchman, M. Ganay; for it is really a national prejudice that so many of our wealthiest ladies bestow their fortunes upon foreigners. Every winter one or two heiresses of millions of dollars from the United States marry Frenchmen."

BREAK-UP OF THE FRENCH LINE OF STEAMERS.

The Paris correspondent of the Commercial writes under date of the 1st inst. as follows: "One of the brothers Gauthier, owners of the screw line of steamers to New York, and of the Lyonnais, which was sunk by the Adriatic, is now in prison at Lyons on a charge of what is a serious crime in France. It was found that, in order to sell more rapidly the stock in their line of steamers, they made false entries in their books, so as to show a much higher and fictitious return of profits. The line will thus, perhaps, be broken up."

TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS' WORTH OF DIAMONDS SCATTERED IN THE STREET.

The Paris correspondent of the Boston Traveler describes an accident which occurred at Madame Lehon's ball, who lives on the left of the Rond Point of the Champs Elysées: "Young Prince Murat and his wife were going to the ball, when, just before they reached the door, some obstacle in the avenue made the carriage jostle so violently as to throw the driver from his seat, the horses ran away and broke the carriage on the basin of the fountain. The Princess was carried, bleeding and senseless, into Madame Lehon's; the dances were, of course, instantly interrupted, and several ladies fainted at the sight of the Princess in a ball dress and covered with blood. The wounds she received proved, fortunately, slight. When her alarm was dissipated it was discovered that her necklace and other ornaments of diamonds had fallen into the avenue. Imagine the consternation which followed this discovery, especially when search was made in vain for them, and it became necessary to postpone further investigation until the daylight appeared. Ten thousand dollars of diamonds in the Avenue des Champs Elysées all night! Policemen were posted to guard the ground until day broke, when the diamonds were found scattered in every direction; not a diamond was missing!"

ST. FAUSTIN IN FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says: "The Council of the Order of the Legion of Honor have, after due deliberation, resolved that the Order of St. Faustin, founded by the Emperor Soulouque of Hayti, shall take its proper place among the decorations which French subjects will be permitted to wear."

PRUSSIA.

THE NEW PRINCESS FORBIDDEN TO RIDE.

A letter from Berlin, of the 1st, in the Nord of Brussels, says: "For some time past the ladies of this capital have been in the habit of assembling about noon in the alleys of Thiergarten, where the Princess Frederick William has been in the habit of taking her rides on horseback. For some days past the ladies have, however, been doomed to disappointment, as the equestrian exercises of the illustrious Amazon have been interdicted by her physicians for some months to come."

RUSSIA.

THE LAST SHELLS EXPLODED AT SEBASTOPOL.

A correspondent of the Boston Transcript, writing from Sebastopol, March 1, says: "The bombshells strewn about the city during the siege are still doing the work of death. No less than eight deaths, I think, have been caused by explosions of these missiles since my arrival, hardly a year since. Only a few days ago, two seamen belonging to the English steamer Beyrout, came on shore near our ship-yard, and for a few minutes were conversing with Mr. Gowen. They then started for a walk to the Redan, quite near our residence, and on reaching the breast-work one of them picked up an exploded detonating shell, intending to keep it as a relic, but finding it rather heavy, threw it down, when it instantly exploded and killed him, almost severing the head from the body, and completely cutting off his right leg. The remains were brought to our yard, whence they were buried. His companion escaped with a slight scratch upon the lip. On the following day two Russians were killed in a similar manner, while picking out the stopper of a shell. The lock by which the concussion ignited the powder of the shell is a curious affair, being a small equilateral cross, with a capsule at each point, and four little hammers held by a human hair. A sudden jar breaks the hair, causing the hammer to strike the cap, which explodes. After the shells are charged, the locks are inclosed in a copper tube and inserted within the hole of the shell, upon which a plug is placed. The shells, thus prepared, are placed in a box of the size of an ordinary chronometer box, which, for safety, must be handled 'this side up with care.'"

INDIA.

THE FALL OF LUCKNOW.

A transient steamer, with Bombay dates of March 18, and Calcutta March 8, reached Suez on the 29th ultimo. The latest news from Lucknow is to the morning of March 15, when nearly all the city was in possession of the British, but few rebels remaining in it. General Outram having turned the enemy's line of works on the Canal, the Martinere was stormed by Sir Edward Lugard, and the line of works seized on the 9th. The Bank House was also occupied. On the 11th, Jung Bahadoor moved into line, and the 93d Regiment, supported by the 42d, stormed the Begum's Palace. The British loss was less than 100 killed and wounded, while that of the enemy was 500. General Outram on the same day, on the north side of the Gomtee, seized on the stone bridge, and cut up 500 more of the enemy.

The buildings in advance of the Begum's Palace were occupied on the 14th. The Imaumbarrab was stormed, Goorkas assisting. The Kaiserbagh was entered, and after a fight lasting all day, was solidly occupied and twenty-four guns taken. General Outram then crossed the iron bridge, and opened fire on the flying enemy. The British loss was not known at Bombay, but was supposed to be small. The enemy rushed by the artillery on the 15th, flying from the city in great numbers. Two columns of cavalry and artillery were sent after them. Maun Singh had come into Jung Bahadoor's camp.

PANIC AT CALCUTTA.

There was a panic in Calcutta on the 3d of March. The President of the Council called out volunteers, and placed cannon on the bridges. Information had been received that the barrack of poor Sepoys, who were to relieve the fort garrison that night, were to have arms and attack the city. All, however, passed off quietly.

CHINA.

PROSPECT OF MORE FIGHTING.

The correspondent of the Herald, writing from United States Ship Mississippi, says: "It is currently reported here that the Chinese are preparing to give battle to the English; they have opened a foundry and are preparing all kinds of implements of war, and that they now muster twenty or thirty thousand strong, within four or five miles of the city of Canton. You may rest assured that, unless several thousand British troops arrive before long, the Chinese, under the direction of the Emperor, headed by the mandarins and gentry, will make a desperate attempt to retake Canton. When this takes place it will be a terrible hard fight, and the slaughter on both sides will be very great. The handful of troops now in that city will stand a very poor chance to hold the city should they be attacked by the Chinese army before reinforcements can reach them. The garrison of Hong Kong can not give them any aid, as the few troops—about five hundred—now in the garrison are required to keep the Chinamen of Hong Kong under subjection, who, by-the-way, do not express much friendship for these English rulers, and who would not hesitate a moment to take off an Englishman's head if he should happen to trust himself too far in the interior unprotected. The news which reaches here daily from Canton gives sad tidings of the destitution and misery among the poorer Chinese, who have been driven from their homes and have lost all they possessed."

PARAGUAY.

THE RIVERS OPENED TO TRADE.

We have news from Rio Janeiro to the 14th ultimo, containing the important intelligence of the amicable settlement of the difficulties between Paraguay and Brazil. By the provisions of the treaty of peace entered into by these two countries the rivers of Paraguay are thrown open to the commerce of all nations. To Brazil alone is conceded the privilege of allowing vessels of war to navigate the rivers; but this concession, owing to the shallowness of the streams, is one of little importance.

AN INDIAN FORAY IN THE WEST.

THE WAR TRAIL.

PICTURES OF INDIAN LIFE.

We have much pleasure in presenting our readers with the accompanying beautiful pictures of Indian Life, by Felix O. C. Darley, Esq. Of all the artists who have made Indian life their study Mr. Darley has been, without doubt, the most successful. Old Indian traders have been heard to declare that the young artist must have spent most of his life in the Indian country, so admirably has he caught its "coulear locale" and peculiar characteristics.

The first of the pictures may be viewed as an illustration of a terrible tragedy which took place in 1832, in Illinois. In the words of a correspondent:

"In the year 1832, while the Kickapoo Indians were moving West from Illinois, a party of them camped on Spoon River, and spent some time in hunting.

"In the midst of this season of enjoyment—the last they would have before leaving the grounds forever—some white men, with no fear of God or man before their eyes, seized one of the young Indians and gave him a thrashing with a hickory sprout. Had they shot him the deed might have been forgiven, but the indignity of a flogging was more than they could bear, and the spirit of revenge rankled and festered in their red bosoms. Years were away, and long leagues lay between them and their foes, but the memory of the offence was kept alive with the fires of revenge.

"It came at last, the time of vengeance. In May of 1832 the young Indian heart that the Sack and Fox Indians, under Black Hawk, were about to make war upon the whites. Rousing himself to the spirit of the hour, he called on his tribe to revenge his wrong, and to wipe out their disgrace in white man's blood. Nineteen redskins, brave and cruel, offered themselves to the work of vengeance. He went to Black Hawk and proffered the band of twenty warriors, with four of the Potawatomie tribe who joined them; and being gladly accepted by the great chieftain, they waited for the hour of expiation to arrive.

"This little band, with less of the daring, but not less of the blood-thirstiness, of their fathers, were sent to watch the country from the head-waters of Indian Creek, south and west, to Spoon River, the scene of the deed they were now sworn to revenge. A hundred miles they marched, through a country inhabited by three thousand whites, till they came to the head of Indian Creek, in Lasalle County, Illinois, where they found three families dwelling in fancied security, and dreaming not that these infernal wretches were prowling at their doors. These were the families of Mr. Davis, Mr. Pettice, and Mr. Hall, and the three men were together, near the house of one of them, when the Indians fired upon them, killed them all, and, rushing upon their defenseless homes, murdered sixteen of the inmates in cold blood! Their work was complete, and their errand done. Two beautiful young women were spared the fate of their parents and friends. Together with some choice cattle, they were seized and carried in triumph to the camp of Black Hawk. Here they were treated with respect, and detained as prisoners to be given as wives to the young Indian whose beating had now been so gloriously revenged. Happily for them they were saved from this doom, to them more dreadful than death itself, by the exertions of the noble Colonel Dodge, of Wisconsin.

"I was a trader among the Indians at the time, and know these facts to be true. They have never been published, but so strikingly do they illustrate the Indian character, they deserve to be recorded.

"Yours truly,

W."

The other two pictures represent the "War-Trail" and the "Buffalo Hunt." We consider the former one of Mr. Darley's happiest delineations of Indian character. The prostrate figure of the man who is listening on the earth for the foot-fall of the enemy—the eager gaze of his followers—their crouching attitude—tell a tale of some fearful tragedy. The "Buffalo Hunt" is also a striking and effective scene, and will no doubt fire the blood of our sportsman readers.

These pictures will do no injury to the high reputation which Mr. Darley has won by his former illustrations of Indian life.

THE BUFFALO HUNT.

PHŒBE'S WOOING.

"PHŒBE! Phœbe! Where is the chit?
When I want her most she's out of the way.
Child, you're running a long account
Up, to be squared on Judgment-day.

"Where have you been? and what have you there?"
"To the pasture, for buttercups wet with dew."
"My patience! I think you are out of your wits;
I wonder what good will buttercups do?

"There's pennyroyal you might have got,
Which might have been useful to you or me,
But I never heard in all my life
Of buttercup-cordial or buttercup-tea.

"I want you to stay and mind the bread,
I've just put two loaves in the oven to bake;
When they are done take them carefully out,
And put in their place this loaf of cake,

"While I run over to Widow Brown's;
Her son from the mines has just got back—
I don't believe he's a cent in his purse,
Young men are so shiftless now, alack!

"It was very different when I was young;
Young men were prudent, and girls were wise;
You wouldn't catch them gadding about,
Like so many idle butterflies."

So bustled and scolded the worthy dame,
Until she had passed the outer sill:
To do her justice, it seldom chanced
That her hands were idle, or tongue was still.

So Phœbe gathered her knitting up,
And sat her down in the chimney niche,
But her mind was on other thoughts intent,
And here and there she dropped a stitch.

The yellow kitten purred on the hearth,
While the kitchen clock, with its frame of oak,
In the corner stood, like a sentinel,
And challenged Time with its measured stroke.

But Phœbe's mind was on none of these—
The bread in the oven, her good aunt's frown,
And the scene before her faded away,
And blended with thoughts of Reuben Brown.

How they walked together on summer days,
Or bravely faced the winter's chill,
And chatted merrily all the way
To the little school-house on Sligo Hill.

How both grew older, and school-days passed,
When he was a youth and a maiden she,
How often she went with Reuben Brown
To the rustic dance or the social bee.

The warm flush deepened on Phœbe's cheek,
And she breathed a low, half-conscious sigh:
"Ah, welladay! they were happy times,
But he has forgotten, and so must I!"

So Phœbe gathered her knitting up,
Which, while she was thinking, had fallen down;
When her quick ear caught a strange footfall,
And there in the door-way stood Reuben Brown!

With the same frank, handsome face she knew,
A smile as bright, and an eye as black—
"Phœbe," he said, "I have wandered far,
Are you glad to see your playmate back?"

The kitten still purred on the kitchen hearth,
And the ancient clock, with its frame of oak,
In the corner stood, like a sentinel,
And challenged Time with its measured stroke.

A pleased light shone in the maiden's eyes;
Ah, Love, young Love, it is very sweet!
Reuben had gone, but she sat quite still,
And the knitting lay untouched at her feet.

Just then the dame came bustling in,
And went to the oven without ado.
"Why, Phœbe, child, what have you done?
The bread is baked as black as my shoe!"

And Phœbe started, and blushed for shame,
Took up her knitting, and dropped it down;
And when her aunt said, "What ails you, child?"
She hastily answered, "Reuben Brown."

Ah, Love! young Love! it is very sweet
In field, or hamlet, or crowded mart;
But it burns with the brightest, purest flame
In the hidden depths of a young maid's heart.

SPRING TALK.

"YOU must come up and see me to-morrow, for the lilacs and rose-bushes are beginning to show their little green leaves."

These were the spring-like words that greeted my ear as I passed two youthful ladies who had met on Washington Park last week. I looked slyly at them, to judge if their faces justified the remark, and the ready response which followed. They were sincere, pleasant faces, with no "lots for sale" upon them: every line and feature expressed something. Their garments were of quiet and becoming colors, and so unique that I was unable to remember any thing about them except the effect, which was pure and refined. I went my way; but upon casting one glance over my shoulder I saw that the one whose garden was blossoming held her hand toward a little romping girl, who came leaping over the jumping rope, crying out, "I have had a glorious time, mamma!" She is married, then; has a family; probably lives up town far enough to admit of trees and bushes in the yard; is evidently cultivated in mind; loves nature better than fashion; and is a good mother. So settling the lady's affairs, I went on satisfied.

In this manner I always speculate upon people I meet in my walks, and it is irresistible with me. Perhaps I fall into the habit of forming too hasty judgments, but I suspect it is better than gazing at shop-windows and wishing my purse was adequate to cover their tempting contents. There are some things, I admit, my heart yearns for in the spring days when I pass them in my walks; they are the potted plants, bending their tender twigs tremblingly to the soft-stirring air. The sight of roses, English violets, gillyflowers, heliotropes, and the dozen other sweet blossoms that stand lovingly together in odorous profusion, makes me more sentimentally happy than any thing else in the world. Dear friend, if you live in the city during the summer, let me beg you to place upon your window-sills some jars of potted flowers. There is a consolation to be reaped from them not to be expressed in words.

I love to go, on a May morning, with a friend, down to Fulton or Washington Market. Let me recommend it especially to dyspeptic ladies, only they must not wear thin boots nor handsome dresses—I hope it is unnecessary to explain why. There you will see a new life.

There the clean, brawny old women, whose skin is like tanned leather, sit behind their stands, knitting with complacent benignity of countenance: their fragrant cheeses; their tubs of butter, fresh and sweet; their baskets of transparent eggs—all ornamented with bunches of spring violets, stand in promising certainty before them. They look up at you as you advance, give you a knowing smile, and provokingly smell of their own cheese and butter, and rearrange their eggs—so pure—"Some bleached, some unbleached," as little Annie said when she saw them, and she held her hands clasped tightly together, lest she should give way to a naughty desire to break the brittle tempters.

Others you find surrounded with my loves—the plants; and oh, so deliciously cheap! You will not be able to resist these; you will buy just one verbena—only sixpence!

A little farther on and there is a bright array of porte-monnaies, bracelets, beads, and fancy work; and by the side of these, perhaps, an oyster vender, who, behind his stall, with brandished knife, invites you to stop and partake, "fresh from the shell." A two-pronged fork and a pewter castor are the only formalities; but in exchange for this lack of ceremony you swallow the most savory and slippery of mouthfuls. Beyond, again, are "Connecticut pies," aged tarts, and large dough-nuts, especially the dough; but I suspect you are as skeptical as regards pastry as you are about Spiritualism.

Scattered about in picturesque confusion are the meat-stalls, with their few spring chickens and their abundant legs of veal, interspersed with suggestive bottles of horseradish.

Here you see rosy-checked young wives, with their baskets on their arms, selecting dainties wherewith to make their husbands good-natured. Look at these well and long, you lords of creation, and then go and make speedy arrangements for finding your mate. Never mind your meagre purses—with such wives men are sure to prosper; and remember that

"The love you're always rich in Makes a fire in the kitchen."

If your market-jaunt has fatigued you, then step on board the ferry-boat. Drink in the brisk, refreshing breeze, now just hiding its edge out of sympathy with the season. Let it trifle with your smooth hair; let it flutter your vails; let it lift your hats; let it redden your cheeks and warm your hearts, expand your lungs and open your eyelids. It is soft, hopeful, spring-like.

See the hills, how green they are turning; the willows are vailing their sorrows; the birds are seeking notched boughs; the gardeners are raking the beds; the florist opens his green-house to the warm air of the skies. The ladies are trimming their hats with green wreaths, and the children are shading their merry faces with broadbrims. The quiet rain talks to us at night, and the sunny sky laughs with us all day. Every thing speaks to us of hope and happiness. Every things says, "The good time is coming."

OUR CHARLEY.

FIVE years ago we parted from our Charley, bound for the East—the blithest, brightest, bravest lad that ever drew breath. I, who have been his mother, as he says, these fourteen years, have a right to boast of him; but all our island knows him. He was but just sixteen upon the night of the great storm, when I and all of us thought in our hearts that we should never live to see another day: the whole Atlantic raging at our feet, and the southwest wind, in its unbroken fury, pouring upon our low-roofed cottage—the first opponent, save a few mastless ships, that it had met for a thousand miles. The darkness and the noise were hideous; but, worse still, the pauses, when the powers of air seemed to be gathering strength for some more tremendous effort, and when the lightning showed for an instant the long line of white and shuddering cliff, and the black mass of waters rising in wrath to overwhelm it. We women were all up and in the parlor; the supper-table was yet spread there, at which four hours before we had sat, and laughed, and eaten, listening to the rising tempest, not without a selfish sort of comfort—God forgive us!—to think that we were safe and warm on land. There is a strange difference observable under all circumstances between hours, whatever they may be, devoted to wakefulness and those given to rest. Between twelve o'clock, for instance, to the lady of fashion, and three o'clock, if she happen to be awakened at such a time; and between ten and one to persons who live domestic, quiet lives like ourselves; quite apart from the contrast which the gayety and brightness of the one, and the loneliness and darkness which the other, must of course present—they seem periods of two separate existences, one of which is not without a certain terror for us. Whenever I have chanced to be called up at night, from illness in the house or other cause, although I soon get my brain in order for working purposes, I am a long time coming to myself: the business that I have been in such times set to do has always appeared, in a measure, weird-like, the familiar places unnatural, and my friends themselves what the Scotch call "uncanny." I think most people will feel what I mean. On this night of the tempest we were all excessively terrified. It was long before the candles could be lit (the wind got in so every where), and, when that was done we were the more frightened with looking at each other's faces. Poor Janet—but fourteen then—with her brown hair hanging about her shoulders, and her large eyes starting out of their bed! Herbert—thirteen—very pale, with his mouth set in an artificial smile, poor little fellow, while his teeth chattered with horror! Small Alice, in fits of tears and screaming, so as to be heard even through that tempest, and both the maids pictures of abject terror! Presently, while the house was rocking to and fro like a tree, in rushed Master Charley, dressed, and with his Glengarry cap on. "Now, girls," cried he, "who will shut the front-door after me?"

"Good Heavens, Charley!" I exclaimed, "you are not surely mad enough to venture out in such a night as this?"

"Yes, mother, I am; why not?

"'In such a night as this
When the sweet wind did gently kiss the trees,
Did Jessica—'

We read it, you know, the other night. I am going after Jessica—Phœbe Taylor, that is—or she will be drowned else. I am certain that this spring-tide, with such a gale to help it, will more than reach their cottage, and the old man can never carry her away without help."

He spoke of the bedridden wife of a superannuated fisherman, who, in defiance of the warnings of his companions, had set up his old boat, by way of a house, in the corner of the bay, just above high-water mark.

Directly Charley mentioned this, we knew at once the danger to which this aged couple must already be exposed, for it wanted but an hour or so to full tide; but the dangers of a rescue were not less.

"Remember, Charles," cried I, "that these three children have nobody to look to for protection in the world, save you."

"Oh yes," laughed he, gayly; "there's Herbert; ain't there, Herbert? Besides which, you will not get rid of me so easily; you will see me again anon, bearing the lovely Phœbe in my arms."

A tremendous crash, occasioned by the flying open of the hall-door, and its being jammed against the wall by the blast, announced the boy's departure. Then we felt deserted indeed. The two maids were blown down in the passage in their attempt to shut the door again, and the rush of wind into all parts of the house became so violent that I was in momentary expectation of its lifting the roof off. Our only comfort seemed to be gazing at the lighthouse. We had been inside it but a few days before, and it was, in a manner, cheering to know that there were living beings there then engaged in their usual occupation, and even counteracting to some extent the awful effects of the storm. In the mean time, walking edgewise, as he afterward affirmed, in order to offer as little resistance to the wind as possible, and absolutely feeling his way foot by foot, our Charley had reached the path that winds down to the beach. Here, away from the trees, and in the open, it was not so pitchy dark, and the gusts being dead against him, only nailed him to the cliff without danger of sweeping him from off it, which, had it changed to a point or two more westward, it would have done at once, like a knife. The tumult below him sounded so near and awful that he seemed to be descending into the sea; a slip, a false turn, a sprain of the hand or ankle, would now have been certain death to him. There was a light still burning in the wooden hut, however, which guided him aright, and gave him spirit, for it told him that he was not too late. He found the old man sitting by his wife, with whom he had fully made up his mind to die, since he could not save her. He had attempted to do so, however, for the poor woman was partly dressed, and had been lifted on to a chair. She was trying, as Charles entered the hut, to persuade her husband to leave her to her fate; "but, since it is your time to die, Phœbe," said the old man, "I seem to have lived in this world long enough." No two young lovers, charcoal-burning to death together after the French fashion, were ever half so noble a spectacle as that of this ancient couple. There was no doubt whatever about the reality of their heroism, for the spray of the still-rising tide had already begun to patter against their refuge, and they knew that the end must be very near indeed. Charles and the old man together had to wade very deep before they got poor Phœbe to the foot of the path, up which, with such a burden, they were quite unable to make their way. But our Charley was not the only angel abroad that night: the two coast-guard men had also bethought them of the perilous situation of the Taylors, and had come from the station with lanterns to see what could be done for them. They dared not, in such a night as this, however, take the shortest way which lay across the Down, and had been much delayed, so that the light in the little room was quenched, and the hut itself far out to sea, when they arrived; but they were in time to assist in bringing Phœbe up the cliff. We heard nothing of them until the party were in the little hall, and at the parlor-door—all safe.

I will tell you one thing more of Charley, to prove to you how brave a boy he was.

One of his chief pleasures was to join the fisher lads in their perilous expeditions after the nests of the eider-duck, and for the eggs of other sea-fowl. With the aid of an iron bar and a rope he would swing himself over the face of the steepest cliffs, and into caverns which one would have thought no creature could have entered save with wings. Upon one occasion he went out with another youth with only one strong rope between them, and, instead of one remaining above the precipice while the other went below, they thought it would be excellent fun to go down both together. They chose, too, for this amusement one of the loftiest and least-frequented cliffs of all, midway in which, however, they had seen from their boat once a great cave much haunted by the sea-fowl. They fixed their bar firmer than usual, and took to the rope together, the fisher lad being undermost; they laughed and chatted in air, with the sea four hundred feet beneath them, as town-bred lads would laugh and chatter in a swing; but they found it by no means easy to reach the cavern with their double load, being afraid to make a pendulum of the rope for fear it should wear away from the increased friction at the summit. At last the boy beneath obtained a footing, and held the rope fast while Charles slid off into the hole. But attracted by the cry which the latter raised at sight of the myriads of nests which lay within, and confused, perhaps, besides, with the swinging, the fisher lad let the rope slip through his fingers; once only it swung within distance, but in his agitation he made a futile grasp at it, and after one or two vibrations, succeeding one another more rapidly than I can write of them, the two boys were left in their living tomb, with the means of escape indeed within sight, but only to tantalize them with its proximity: seven or eight feet of fathomless space lay between them and it—a situation to them, who well understood it, more awfully perilous even than it seems. No vessel ever came near enough, on account of the breakers, to see any signal such as they could make from the sea; they had left no word at home of whereabouts they were going; and, even should they be found, it was very improbable that means could be devised for their rescue, while they had still the strength and spirit to take advantage of them. The boys looked at one another in blank dismay, as they thought of all these things. "My poor dear mother," said the fisher lad, with a groan, for he was her only hope. "Supposing one dropped," asked Charley, thoughtfully, after a few moments, "would this tide carry one for certain on to shore in the fishing bay?"—"Yes," said the other, "and within the next hour to a certainty, but it would be only as a dead corpse, Master Charles."—"God alone knows that," quoth Charley; "we must trust in Him." He wrote down upon a slip of paper (which I now possess, with the writing just a little, a very little shaken, poor fellow, when it gets to the last message) some such words as these: "Robert Harris is in the Gull's Hole upon Wadden Cliff: he has lost hold of the rope, and must have help at once: my dearest love to all at home.—Charley." He put this up in his case bottle, taking the cup off at the bottom, so that the writing might be seen at once through the glass, and buttoned it up in his coat-pocket. "My people are richer than yours, Bob, and can better spare me," cried he. "I am going to leap at the rope, old fellow; let us shake hands." The lad tried to persuade him not to risk it, but rather to hope for rescue by means less desperate. But—"Don't unnerve me, Bob," was the simple heroic answer; "once, twice, thrice, and here goes." The other hid his face while the spring was taken, listening for the far-off splash, perhaps, that should tell him his friend was dead, who had spoken to him the instant before. But when he looked up, our Charley was holding well on to the rope, only he was deadly pale. He got to the cave again in safety, and the two rescued lads came up to life again, with their pockets stuffed with eider-down. Charles was a brave boy—his widowed mother's darling and mine, in whose care she left him, and beloved by all. He did not know her long, but loved her dearly, and had the strangest thoughts about her always. He thought that she was near to him, and upon the eve of any special peril he seemed to grow conscious of her presence. The night before he left us, as we wandered in and out the rocks by the sea-shore, and round the leafy paths that thread the copse, and up and down the level sands, all grown so doubly dear to him at parting, he was full of this. Perhaps it was but natural—having dwelt so long upon the happy past, and stroke by stroke together retouched many a picture hanging dim enough in the long gallery of memory—that we should come at last to her. With our eyes upon that boundless world of waters darkening as the night drew on, with that whisper of eternity breaking softly on our ears, alone, and in that beautiful spot, it was natural, I say, that we should speak of the beloved dead.

"Mother"—he called me "mother" even then—"she is listening to us now," he said. "I shall see her in my dreams to-night; she is quite close to us."

I begged him not to talk thus, and reminded him that it was time to go within.

"Nay," said he, "but let us once more climb the Down." So we toiled up the steep behind us in silence, under the innumerable stars.

"See you," said he, when we had reached the summit, "yon steadfast lights on ocean? There rides a mighty fleet, the guardian-angels of our land, and all night long they keep strict watch and ward because of us. There were they, still, though hid from view, until we gained the headland, and there will they be when we descend again. So it is, as I think, with some of us: few souls but have some spirit watching over them, although unseen, save, haply, when a more than common danger threatens, when heavenly stoops to earthly, and the fleet sails rounds to us."

I do not mention this because I think that such a belief was to Charles's credit—for I believe it to be a false and weak one—but to prove that he was no mere samphire-gatherer and pillager of gulls' nests, a youth of nerves and sinews only. Had he been so, would Janet, the enthusiastic, the poetess, have ever loved him so dearly as she did? Would gentle Alice, for whom I have heard him weave full many a fairy tale? Would Herby, whose young head he filled with visions of tilt and tourney?

It was terrible the parting from a lad like this; but he thought the Fusabad appointment was too good to be let slip, for our sakes; although, for himself, he would have much preferred the military service. We watched the mighty vessel that bore him out, rounding the point and speeding into space, farther than any other dewy eyes in Britain. Our roof, I think, is the last English home the exile sees, and the first speck which, after weary years, grows gradual to the sight on his return. Through all the war in the Crimea we saw the very last act of every equadron, the smoke-clouds streaming on the horizon's verge, and the first glimmering of those countless sails which brought up from the warring "underworld" our wounded thousands. If the wind was favorable, we could hear the martial bands—music, nay, even the cheers themselves, of the gallant soldiers, in the vessels outward-bound; and in the homeward, if the skies were clear, we could see, with telescopes, the very beds of the wounded, ay, and perhaps of the dead, brought up upon the decks for disembarkation. We were sad enough, indeed, but we had no miseries of this kind then to mourn for! Others, it is true, was then at peace, whether he was bound; the vessel that bore him was cleaving tranquil seas. The last letter, however, which we got from him was from Spain. The ship had been wrecked, with awful loss of life—himself picked up on a shattered but "all's well," he wrote, "as far as I am concerned, except for my kit, and I bought that from Gibraltar in a lucifer vessel." A slip of paper enclosed for me: "I told you that a peril threatened me; remember our talk upon the Cliff at Dover. There was not a word in his account of the shipwreck of this neediest, which we read of in the newspapers:—"Among other deeds of heroism during the confusion, and when it was plain that the ship must go to pieces in a few minutes, the chief Mr. Charles Brooke, R.I.C.S., deserves especial mention. Observing a young lady—Miss Claud, daughter of Lieutenant-General Claud, of the Royal army, who was on her way to join her father in Calcutta—unprovided with a life-preserver, and removed his own from his waist, and fastened it securely on her; and in the water afterwards, preferred to be drifting out to sea, he brought, by his incredible exertions under the protection of the headland, and into the bay, where she was picked up. Mr. Brooke was picked up subsequently insensible; but we are happy to state that the young noble young fellow has since entirely recovered." All this had happened two years later, we should not have considered this proceeding so entirely extraordinary, as after that period Miss Claud began to figure in his letters pretty prominently under the more familiar title of "dearest Ellen." In due time they were married, and last January wrote us a most enthusiastic account of their little boy "now seven month old, and already" beginning to take a great deal of notice."

"Next Christmas," wrote our Charley, "we hope all thrus to spend in the beloved island,

"Where groves of pine on either hand
To break the blast of winter stand,
And, east and west, the hoary Channel
Tumbles a restless ice cliash round.

"Where underneath the milky step
The ships of battle slowly creep,
And on the leaning noses of light sail and shadow
Glimmer away to the lonely deep!

We have the latest pacific accounts of you, you see, up here at Fussbull, which, indeed, is almost as much in the world, and quite as civilized a Town, as your Southampton. Alice and myself will take his leave at the same time with us for England. How I long for you all to see dear Ellen and the child!"

Not more than we longed for them, be sure! How we planned ourselves with reserves of apartment of person—pretty and good-tempered, we were certain—Charley's Ellen would be! And that sweet baby, too, whom we loved in advance even so much, and kissed, and dandled, and made much of, already in anticipation! Whose head would our Charley himself be changed or no? How much would he have to tell us, after his five years' absence! What a merry, merry, Christmas we would surely be!

Then came the first rumors of revolt to shadow this fair picture. Again the soldier-crowded ships began to pass in quick succession, before us over the eastward sea; but, this time, how much more of our selfish hearts they bore with them! How prayerfully, even though we were sure, we wished God-speed to rifle-ball and bayonet! One day we got a letter from our Charley, concerning our rumors; words which, from him who always was the most cheering view of matters, filled us with sacred grief.

"It is folly," wrote he, "to disguise our position from any longer. The irregular cavalry here are not to be trusted, and our lives are in the hands of the general can not afford to say anything to our little band of European soldiers: they are watched all around us; and this is probably the last dutch that will go safe to its destination, so I write in haste to catch it. I have looked death in the face before now, mother, but never with such dear ones in my company: this is what makes it so terrible. Some of us here think better of our situation, and fancy that their duty may be right: but I—I am her last night, and you know what I hold such a sight to mean. You will not soon forget me and mine, wherever they may be, I will leave them when you all."

Our Charley never wrote to us again. The very next telegraph ran thus: "An outbreak of the I. C. at Fussbuil; their officers were fired upon; all the civilians in the station massacred except one. Never, surely, had oracle of old the power to cast be among those "three." After nearly two months of wearing hopes and fears, the names were published, giving joy to other households—to ours despair. They were all three strangers. Captain Arden, poor Charley's friend, was one of the few officers who escaped with life; he wrote us a sad letter, with but one cold gleam of hope, in a report that he had heard of some European who Fussbul being still alive in the revolted district, under the protection of a native rajah; but we were sure too deep in sorrow to be buoyed by such a floating straw as this. We gave the wife or credit for good intentions, but were not more wretched when we found, in his second letter, that the last spark of hope has, I fear, died out. I come to England by the earliest packet, and my first visit will be to you."

Such was the history of the first fruits of a very terrible interest. By this time autumn had fairly set in, and our Channel was springing with snow-white pall, lightly and tenderly, as in our island he never spread a fall, like a father covering the face of his dead child. But the mourners themselves could bring no such change upon nature as it seemed, in the darkness of our hearts. We were not suffered. The breeze that swept our lofty downs in gusts of lamentation, the surges that broke in ancholy sighs: the laughing sea had become a series of sorrows, and our favorite place, where the evergreens flourish as in spring, might have been full of withered leaves, so both were we to walk there; because our Charley would not be associated with all these things, as the scent with the flower, or as the soul with its beautiful form. If this seems to be exaggeration, it must be remembered that we had launched in a very simple one, and alone in the world, and that our Charley was all in all to us.

The time had now arrived when the steamer that was to bring Captain Arden might be expected, and we watched for it attentively, but without impatience; with quiet tears, indeed, but followed that retreating vessel years ago, but with no fearful hope.

Herbert had been dispatched to Southampton to forward the expected guest to him on to us at once; so that, when the black ship came in sight, we knew that we should see him that same evening. He did arrive at last, with the tide, in the most constantly wistful and anxious that the girls and I entertained to walk up the cliff-road to meet our guest.

"There comes the carriage!" exclaimed thoughtlessly Lucy impatiently, clapping her hands.

A look from her sister reminded her at once of the failings which our guest must needs have to tell us, and the poor girl (who had been in a heart as any of us) hung her head down, and let fall her curls. Jane must keep them hidden, however, about the carriage, as it must have by this time rounded the corner of the rock. Instead of this, a solitary horseman, rode up, and set it himself. "Arden is not come on," cried he, "but I have with him a few lines from him. By news, the very best: the baby is saved—Ellen is saved—Charley is saved: the rajah took the very greatest care of the whole family. I will read you the letter."

"They are here," murmured Janet, faintly; they are all here, I know."

"Well, dearest, I was going to tell you that myself: they are waiting round the cliff yonder, till you have warned him up your minds to see them."

And there in very truth they were—the three: the mother, the fair child, the little boy, and Charley, safe in their island home. Thanks be to God, we had indeed a time of great joy. I would that I could tell you how, but I fear that the vacant chairs had been as blithely filled!

Miscellany.

The Boy is Father to the Man.

A recent biographer of Daniel Webster says:

"The Charter House has boasted of many others who have sprung into eminent men: among others, Crashaw, the poet; Addison and Steele, the essayists; John Wesley, the religious reformer; and Lord Ellenborough, the Lord Chief Justice. But the name that is added 'Old Pilos.' The pet name will be remembered by those whose reminiscences can go back some forty years or more. They will not have forgotten the man and thoughtful lad who used to stand looking on while the boys played their harmonious exercises, never procured for him the name of philosopher, subsequently diminished to 'Pilos,' and occasionally applied as a nickname with more malice by ulterior philosopher was the solitair at whose name the whole school would shout with honest pride, 'Old Pilos,' of the Charter House, was Havelock, the hero of Cawnpore."

—A writer in Blackwood has some very sensible remarks on the way in which fashionable social philosophy which turns out annually so many girls, that is to say, moulded to a certain monotonous pattern which no height have been jewels, but are, in fact, little centres of vanity, selfishness, and affectation.

"Our modish Cupid has overstrung his bow—his arrows don't hit home. Young ladies hide away the key of their hearts so carefully that nobody thinks it worth looking for. Who is to choose 'the one' out of a bevy of proper-behaved damsels like so many Miss Nancy dolls, of the height, and shape, and color? They all look alike, dress alike, talk alike, and are ready to say any thing that appears to the contrary, think alike and feel alike. Why, such a choice is an act of deliberate intention—matrimony proposes; few men have the nerve to venture upon it. No wonder they calculate the probable butchers' and bakers' bills before they take such a plunge as that.

Marrying a Young Lady.

"There was my nephew, Jack Hawthorne, not long home from the Crimea, six feet one, independent, hairy as a Skye terrier, brave as a lion (chaps for Alma and Balaklava), gentle as a greyhound, and I should say impressible, decidedly. 'What I missed most,' said he, in his spain-deserted, astonished simplicity, 'was the sight of a woman's face.' Whereupon I spoke: 'I wonder, Jack, you don't marry; it would make you a happier man than living half your days in the smoking-room of the "Army and Navy."' And he not pick up a miss grief, and set up the family name again at the old corner?' 'I would,' said Jack, 'but I can't decide softly between the puffs of his cutty, 'but there are so many of them.' Poor old young ladies: catch me marrying a young lady!'

A Partner to Dance.

"Jack has mortally offended, I fear, a whole circle of previous admirers, cousins and old partners, by a very innocent and well-intentioned little speech he made at one of his last public appearances. A young lady was begging him to dance. Jack 'didn't seem to care about dancing.' Hap-py-go-lucky fellow, he was in a mood to enjoy his sight sitting down, and the men were so stupid!' Jack would have danced with a she-bear sooner than be really rude or ill-natured; so he consented. The patroness was charmed and grateful. And now, which should be the fair lucky partner? Why, in Miss A.? sweet girl! Miss B.? very sweet girl also, only so quiet! The two Miss C's? both darlings! And Miss D., in a whisper? twenty thousand, and not engaged!? 'Thankye,' said Jack, after casting his eyes along the line of the ball-room parade, 'they all look very much alike. As I am, he it's continued he, without moving a muscle of his countenance, 'I can be no more than a partner as well do it handsomely; so I'll take the tallest and the thinnest, as a shade of rel in her hair.'"

At hour to the Brave Girl of whom the author of "John Halifax," heroine will be proud as an English lady, will exclaim:

"A young girl, an elder sister, had to receive for step-mother a woman who ought never to have been any honest man's wife. Not wealthy, as it turned out of her father's house, she did a most daring and heroic thing—she left it. She went with her the brothers and sisters, whom by this woman only she believed she could save from harm. She settled them in a London lodging, and worked for them as a daily governess. "Heaven helps those who help themselves," and it helped her. She did never was dependent upon any human being, but while there is work to be done, and bread protected more than I could count—pupils and pupil children, friends and their children, besides brothers and sisters—these nephews and nieces, growing to the slenderest tie of blood, or even mere strangers, will find in her a friend to whom any thing but a poor governess, always independent, and never ready to assist others, because she never was and never could be tempted to any one, except the few for whom she lives, and for a grave when she dies. May she long enjoy present the can and want the other!"

—Dr. Yan, the Chinese Consul at Chinese fast, heard a cricket sing, and was delighted with the music.

Celestial Love of Home

Dr. Yan, the Chinese Consul at Chinese fast, when traveling, is surrounded themselves with every thing that can remind them of family life. He was accompanied by a knowing friend, who informed him that it was the custom of the country to have a wife and family at sea, but for their purposely. Presently he become silent to a shadow of one of these cottages, when, from admiration at their song, he had named Master and Lucinda.

A Cricket Match.

"Two Chinese took down a couple of cages of bantams, about the size of pigeons, and placing a little palaces filled with silky herbs, and sat down before me. The two palaces contained Lubbahe and Mr. Dung, who were let out and placed in a porcelain bowl. Lubbahe was just what I had fancied—a bold, pugnacious, handsome creature, his voice: his rounded paunch caused the segment of his cairass to bulge out; his powerful fore-leg were armed with double nails; and through his brown visor could be seen two arched tusks which gave him a fierce look. His wife was smaller, more slim and graceful; his black armor fitted tightly round his waist, and his tusks were completely concealed by the front piece of his helmet. The two lasers no deavored at first to escape, but the polished sides of the porcelain bowl an insuperable obstacle to the attempt. Accordingly they took up their position at the bottom of the bowl, where they would have the advantage of meeting their foe with out needing to look for the intervention of Chinese perfidy. The two ladies remained in their cages with a large fan in the hands of the wicked the most harmless weapon becomes defensible. Mario's master, with the most admirable intention, pushed the blade of grass insolently beneath the nose of his champion; the latter, thinking the insult came from Lubbahe, who at this moment appeared to be beating time with his antenne, sprang at his head, and struck to the ground. Then on which he had the full Indignant at this unmerited aggression, the insect that had but now been the object of adversary, and leaned him with the first blow. Marie looked for the instant with surprise at his foe-foot, deprived of the right torso, and following only to the left. As he passes, seized Lubbahe by the hair, and dragged him three times round the bowl. Alas! it was not Achilles with the body of Hector; for Hector, suddenly recovering himself, fell with all his weight upon his adversary, crushed him in his entrance, and devoured a portion of his head. After gratifying his wrath the conqueror took up his position in the middle of the bowl, and waited for a new assailant; but no other knight had the audacity to present himself. Lubbahe returned in triumph to his palace, shaking proudly his solitary horn. All this long our fat-dog was the theatre of similar scenes."

Beauty and Wit.

"Handsome features are incapable of expressing real beauty, as speak alone is incapable of expressing wit."

—Has it ever occurred to the gentle reader to consider seriously on the amount of genuine suffering to the proper performance of that common trick of the ring—not the political arena, but the circus ring—known as the Summersault?

Here is the whole matter laid bare:

"Nothing but ever been born to me a greater mystery, or a cause of more painful and fruitless cogitation, than the art of throwing clear somersaults from feet to feet. As well as I can understand the matter, it seems that this is the only notable trick whose performance could not be perfectly accomplished at the very first trial; which stands, I say, confessedly to-day at that time, if ever. Here is an act, surely, the most difficult and complex of any, though it attracted the notice from the uninitiated, on account of its apparent facility, is said to be as much as difficult as the summersault. A clown performs the first about ten times on an average, in the course of a pantomime. It is his professional stock-in-trade. The first time he ever knocked down, Pantaloon, under the same circumstances, Harlequin, Columbine, is picked up by his nether drapery. But the clown allows the throws no sapping; and this is how he does it. Being put on to look for elevation by the spring-board aside, and then jumps quickly to his feet, taking the spring from the bending. That's all. It looks really very easy. Try it."

—Any thin calls to mind

A Yankee Trickle.

"Sitting at the table d'hôte, at Boulogne, once, it happened to start a conversation which became very general. It was in the matter of gymnastic exercises, and embraced, among others, the trapeze, and on the fearful exertion it called forth. A tall Englishman, who grave observation with a very serious of voice, both of which contained had gained with the serious conference of the company, said he thought he could perform the feat in question. One of the youngest and least reverential persons present proposed to bet him a dozen of champagne that he would fail on the first attempt. To the astonishment of the whole table, the serious gentleman took the bet; but how much greater was the surprise of every body, when, having laid his long undress coat on the floor, he threw the trapeze in a clever manner, and calmly pocketed his fusion! He was afterwards found to be the agent was an American clown, proceeding to Paris, on an engagement with Francouli."

—Thus is the age of Science, and it is commonly supposed, in the present man's duty to know a little of every thing. There are yet left, however, some conservative folk who believe that the only science worth study is the Tree of Knowledge, and swear by the old proverb that Ignorance is Bliss.

"Now, I am addressed to my personal comfort," says one of these, "to know to a decimal fraction what proportion of red earth I may expect to find in my meat and potatoes, or having become thoroughly conscious that my cuticle is mixed with ground glass, I should like to know the finest chicory; and that bisulphuret of mercury forms the basis of my cayenne. It was once my fate to have a friend staying with me, one who was a chemist and mining philosophers. He used to amuse himself after breakfast by reading Dr. Ure's analysis and diagnosis of the contents of the tea-pot, laid out on a kind of burnt sienna on his plate. 'This leaf now,' he would say, 'is genuine Souchie; observe peculiarity that's no tea-leaf—positively poisonous. This, my friend, is the real Mocha; these grains, privet, you may know it by the divisions in the particles; that's no tea-leaf.' A most uncomfortable guest he was, for knowing not a leaf connected in many respects, I felt my appetite improved the first time I sat down to breakfast with him. I went to do look into all your meals with a microscope. Of course there is a medium between these overcurious and unobservant persons, and that lies in every thing that is set before you. One likes in the main, through pretty well, to know ourselves, to know what one is eating. Hear, on the other hand the question, a recent preacher in China: 'Solicit earth-worms, my friends, which Providence set did not know until we had eaten them.' That was a true philosopher, for we can not all be expected to attain to the sublime."

—Lord Lyndhurst—the Doctor lord—tells a good story of a certain Scotch judge in the Great Seal, in 1846, showing the relative importance of the Law and Gospel.

"When I went to the palace," says his Lordship, "I alighted at the grand stairs—one I was received by the sticks gold and silver, and other officers of the household, who called, in sonorous voices, my name to leading, and apartment to apartment, 'Room for the Lord High Chancellor of England;' I entered the presence chamber; I gave the bible to the bishop, I took the book of blessing her hand; I left the apartment by another door, and found myself on a tack stair-case, down which I descended without any one taking any notice of me, until, as I was looking for my carriage at the outer door, a lackey bustled up, and, with a patronizing air, said, 'Lord Lyndhurst, can I do any thing for you?'" is akin to love, but often of a purer origin. A fair young child may pity the weak, infirm old man. And nothing on earth is more beautiful than infancy tending age.

Pity

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER VI.

The wreck cast back from Charybdis.
Souviens-toi de ta Gabrielle.

GUY DARRELL turned hurriedly from the large house in the great square, and, more and more absorbed in reverie, he wandered out of his direct way homeward, clear and broad though it was, and did not rouse himself till he felt, as it were, that the air had grown darker; and looking vaguely round, he saw that he had strayed into a dim maze of lanes and passages. He paused under one of the rare lamp-posts, gathering up his recollections of the London he had so long quitted, and doubtful for a moment or two which turn to take. Just then, up from an alley fronting him at right angles, came sullenly, warily, a tall, sinewy, ill-boding tatterdemalion figure, and seeing Darrell's face under the lamp, halted abrupt at the mouth of the narrow passage from which it had emerged—a dark form filling up the dark aperture. Does that ragged wayfarer recognize a foe by the imperfect ray of the lamplight? or is he a mere vulgar footpad, who is doubting whether he should spring upon a prey? Hostile his look—his gesture—the sudden cowering down of the strong frame, as if for a bound; but still he is irresolute. What awes him? What awes the tiger, who would obey his blood-instinct without fear, in his rush on the Negro—the Hindoo—but who halts and hesitates at sight of the white man—the lordly son of Europe? Darrell's eye was turned toward the dark passage—toward the dark figure—carelessly, neither recognizing, nor fearing, nor defying—carelessly, as at any harmless object in crowded streets, and at broad day. But while that eye was on him, the tatterdemalion halted; and, indeed, whatever his hostility, or whatever his daring, the sight of Darrell took him by so sudden a surprise, that he could not at once re-collect his thoughts, and determine how to approach the quiet, unconscious man who, in reach of his spring, fronted his overwhelming physical strength with the habitual air of dignified command. His first impulse was that of violence; his second impulse curbed the first. But Darrell now turns quickly, and walks straight on; the figure quits the mouth of the passage, and follows with a long and noiseless stride. It has nearly gained Darrell. With what intent? A fierce one, perhaps—for the man's face is sinister, and his state evidently desperate—when there emerges unexpectedly from an ugly-looking court or cul de sac, just between Darrell and his pursuer, a slim, long-backed, buttoned-up, weasel-faced policeman. The policeman eyes the tatterdemalion instinctively, then turns his glance toward the solitary, defenseless gentleman in advance, and walks on, keeping himself between the two. The tatterdemalion stifles an impatient curse. Be his purpose force, be it only supplication, be it colloquy of any kind, impossible to fulfill it while that policeman is there. True, that in his powerful hands he could have clutched that slim, long-backed officer, and broken him in two as a willow wand. But that officer is the Personation of Law, and can stalk through a legion of tatterdemalions as a ferret may glide through a barn full of rats. The prowler feels he is suspected. Unknown as yet to the London police, he has no desire to invite their scrutiny. He crosses the way; he falls back; he follows from afar. The policeman may yet turn away before the safer streets of the metropolis be gained. No; the cursed Incarnation of Law, with eyes in its slim back, continues its slow stride at the heels of the unsuspicious Darrell. The more solitary defiles are already passed—now that dim lane, with its dead wall on one side. By the dead wall skulks the prowler; on the other side still walks The Law. Now—alas for the prowler!—shine out the thoroughfares, no longer dim nor deserted—Leicester Square, the Haymarket, Pall Mall, Carlton Gardens; Darrell is at his door. The policeman turns sharply round. There, at the corner near the learned Club-house, halts the tatterdemalion. Toward the tatterdemalion the policeman now advances quickly. The tatterdemalion is quicker still—fled like a guilty thought.

Back—back—back into that maze of passages and courts—back to the mouth of that black alley. There he halts again. Look at him. He has arrived in London but that very night, after an absence of more than four years. He has arrived from the sea-side on foot; see, his shoes are worn into holes. He has not yet found a shelter for the night. He had been directed toward that quarter, thronged with adventurers, native and foreign, for a shelter, safe, if squalid. It is somewhere near that court, at the mouth of which he stands. He looks round, the policeman is baffled, the coast clear. He steals forth, and pauses under the same gaslight as that under which Guy Darrell had paused before—under the same gaslight, under the same stars. From some recess in his rags he draws forth a large, distained, distended pocket-book—last relic of sprucer days—leather of dainty morocco, once elaborately tooled, patent springs, fairy lock, fit receptacle for bank-notes, billets-doux, memoranda of debts of honor, or pleasurable engagements. Now how worn, tarnished, greasy, rapscallion-like, the costly bauble! Filled with what motley, unlovable contents—stale pawn-tickets of foreign monts de pieté, pledges never henceforth to be redeemed; scrawls by villainous hands in thievish hieroglyphics; ugly implements replacing the malachite penknife, the golden tooth-pick, the jeweled pencil-case, once so neatly set within their satin lappets. Ugly implements, indeed—a file, a gimlet, loaded dice. Pell-mell, with such more hideous and recent contents, dishonored evidences of gaudier summer life—locks of ladies' hair, love-notes treasured mechanically, not from amorous sentiment, but perhaps from some vague idea that they might be of use if those who gave the locks or wrote the notes should be raised in fortune, and could buy back the memorials of shame. Diving amidst these miscellaneous documents and treasures, the prowler's hand rested on some old letters in clerk-like fair caligraphy, tied round with a dirty string, and on them, in another and fresher writing, a scrap that contained an address—"Samuel Adolphus Poole, Esq., Alhambra Villa, Regent's Park." "To-morrow, Nix my Dolly; to-morrow," muttered the tatterdemalion; "but to-night—plague on it, where is the other blackguard's direction? Ah, here—" And he extracted from the thievish scrawls a peculiarly thievish-looking hieroglyph. Now, as he lifts it up to read by the gas-light, survey him well. Do you not know him? Is it possible? What! the brilliant sharper! The ruffian exquisite! Jasper Losely! Can it be? Once before, in the fields of Fawley, we beheld him out of elbows, seedy, shabby, ragged. But then it was the decay of a foppish spendthrift—clothes distained, ill-assorted, yet still of fine cloth; shoes in holes, yet still pearl-colored brodequins. But now it is the decay of no foppish spendthrift; the rags are not of fine cloth; the tattered shoes are not brodequins. The man has fallen far below the politer grades of knavery, in which the sharper affects the beau. And the countenance, as we last saw it, if it had lost much of its earlier beauty, was still incontestably handsome. What with vigor, and health, and animal spirits, then on the aspect still lingered light; now, from corruption, the light itself was gone. In that Herculean constitution excess of all kinds had at length forced its ravage, and the ravage was visible in the ruined face. The once sparkling eye was dull and bloodshot. The colors of the cheek, once clear and vivid, to which fiery drink had only sent the blood in a warmer glow, were now of a leaden dullness, relieved but by broken streaks of angry red—like gleams of flame struggling through gathered smoke. The profile, once sharp and delicate like Apollo's, was now confused in its swollen outline; a few years more, and it would be gross as that of Silenus—the nostrils, distended with incipient carbuncles, which betray the gnawing fang that alcohol fastens into the liver. Evil passions had destroyed the outline of the once beautiful lips, arched as a Cupid's bow. The sideling, lowering, villainous expression which had formerly been but occasional, was now habitual and heightened. It was the look of the bison before it gores. It is true, however, that even yet on the countenance there lingered the trace of that lavish favor bestowed on it by nature. An artist would still have said, "How handsome that ruggamuffin must have been!" And true is it, also, that there was yet that about the bearing of the man which contrasted his squalor, and seemed to say that he had not been born to wear rags, and loiter at midnight among the haunts of thieves. Nay, I am not sure that you would have been as incredulous now, if told that the wild outlaw before you had some claim by birth or by nurture to the rank of gentleman, as you would had you seen the gay spendthrift in his gaudy day. For then he seemed below, and now he seemed above, the grade in which he took place. And all this made his aspect yet more sinister, and the impression that he was dangerous yet more profound. Muscular strength often remains to a powerful frame long after the constitution is undermined, and Jasper's Losely's frame was still that of a formidable athlete; nay, its strength was yet more apparent now that the shoulders and limbs had increased in bulk, than when it was half-disguised in the lissom symmetry of exquisite proportion—less active, less supple, less capable of endurance, but with more crushing weight in its rush or its blow. It was the figure in which brute force seems so to predominate that in a savage state it would have worn a crown—the figure which secures command and authority in all societies where force alone gives the law. Thus, under the gaslight and under the stars, stood the terrible animal—a strong man imbruted—"SOUVIENS-TOI DE TA GABRIELLE." There, still uneffaced, though the gold-threads are all tarnished and ragged, are the ominous words on the silk of the she-devil's love-token! But Jasper has now inspected the direction on the paper he held to the lamp-light, and, satisfying himself that he was in the right quarter, restored the paper to the bulky, distended pocket-book, and walked sullenly on toward the court from which had emerged the policeman who had crossed his prowling chase.

"It is the most infernal shame," said Losely, between his grinded teeth, "that I should be driven to these wretched dens for a lodging, while that man who ought to feel bound to maintain me should be rolling in wealth, and cottoned up in a palace. But he shall fork out. Sophy must be hunted up. I will clothe her in rags like these. She shall sit at his street-door. I will shame the miserly hunks. But how track the girl? Have I no other hold over him? Can I send Dolly Poole to him? How addled my brains are!—want of food—want of sleep. Is this the place? Peuh!"

Thus murmuring he now reached the arch of the court, and was swallowed up in its gloom. A few strides, and he came into a square open space, only lighted by the skies. A house, larger than the rest, which were of the meanest order, stood somewhat back, occupying nearly one side of the quadrangle—old, dingy, dilapidated. At the door of this house stood another man, applying his latch-key to the lock. As Losely approached, the man turned quickly, half in fear, half in menace—a small, very thin, impish-looking man, with peculiarly restless features that seemed trying to run away from his face. Thin as he was, he looked all skin and no bones—a goblin of a man whom it would not astonish you to hear could creep through a keyhole. Seeming still more shadowy and impalpable by his slight, thin, sable dress, not of cloth, but a sort of stuff like alpaca. Nor was that dress ragged, nor, as seen but in starlight, did it look worn or shabby; still you had but to glance at the creature to feel that it was a child in the same Family of Night as the ragged felon that towered by its side. The two outlaws stared at each other. "Cutts!" said Losely, in the old rollicking voice, but in a hoarser, rougher key—"Cutts, my boy, here I am, welcome me!"

"What! General Jas.!" returned Cutts, in a tone which was not without a certain respectful awe, and then proceeded to pour out a series of questions in a mysterious language, which may be thus translated and abridged: "How long have you been in England? how has it fared with you? you seem very badly off? coming here to hide? nothing very bad, I hope? what is it?"

Jasper answered in the same language, though with less practiced mastery of it—and with that constitutional levity which, whatever the time or circumstance, occasionally gave a strange sort of wit, or queer, uncanny, devil-me-care vein of drollery, to his modes of expression.

"Three months of the worst luck man ever had—a row with the gens-d'armes—long story—three of our pals seized—affair of the galleys for them, I suspect—French frogs can't seize me—fricasseed one or two of them—broke away—crossed the country—reached the coast—found an honest smuggler—landed off Sussex with a few other kegs of brandy—remembered you—preserved the address you gave me—and condescend to this rat-hole for a night or so. Let me in—knock up somebody—break open the larder—I want to eat—I am famished—I should have eaten you by this time, only there's nothing on your bones."

The little man opened the door—a passage black as Erebus. "Give me your hand, General." Jasper was led through the pitchy gloom for a few yards; then the guide found a gas-cock, and the place broke suddenly into light. A dirty narrow stair-case on one side; facing it, a sort of lobby, in which an open door showed a long, sanded parlor, like that in public-houses—several tables, benches, the walls whitewashed, but adorned with sundry ingenious designs made by charcoal or the smoked ends of clay-pipes. A strong smell of stale tobacco and of gin and rum. Another gaslight, swinging from the centre of the ceiling, sprang into light as Cutts touched the tap-cock.

"Wait here," said the guide. "I will go and get you some supper."

"And some brandy," said Jasper.

"Of course."

The bravo threw himself at length on one of the tables, and, closing his eyes, moaned. His vast strength had become acquainted with physical pain. In its stout knots and fibres, aches and sharp twinges, the dragon-teeth of which had been sown years ago in revels or brawls, which then seemed to bring but innocuous joy and easy triumph, now began to gnaw and grind. But when Cutts reappeared with coarse viands and the brandy-bottle, Jasper shook off the sense of pain, as does a wounded wild beast that can still devour; and after regaling fast and ravenously, he emptied half the bottle at a draught, and felt himself restored and fresh.

"Shall you fling yourself among the swell fellows who hold their club here, General?" asked Cutts; "'tis a bad trade, every year it gets worse. Or have you not some higher game in your eye?"

"I have higher game in my eye. One bird I marked down this very night. But that may be slow work, and uncertain. I have in this pocket-book a bank to draw upon meanwhile."

"How?—forged French billets de banque—dangerous."

"Pooh! better than that; letters which prove theft against a respectable rich man."

"Ah, you expect hush-money?"

"Exactly so. I have good friends in London."

"Among them, I suppose, that affectionate 'adopted mother' who would have kept you in such order."

"Thousand thunders! I hope not. I am not a superstitious man, but I fear that woman as if she were a witch, and I believe she is one. You remember black Jean, whom we called Sans culotte. He would have filled a church-yard with his own brats for a five-franc piece; but he would not have crossed a church-yard alone at night for a thousand Naps. Well, that woman to me is what a church-yard was to black Jean. No; if she is in London, I have but to go to her house and say, 'Food, shelter, money;' and I would rather ask Jack Ketch for a rope."

"How do you account for it, General? She does not beat you—she is not your wife. I have seen many a stout fellow, who would stand fire without blinking, show the white feather at a scold's tongue. But then he must be spliced to her—"

"Cutts, that griffin does not scold—she preaches. She wants to make me spooney, Cutts—she talks of my young days, Cutts—she wants to blight me into what she calls an honest man, Cutts;—the virtuous dodge! She snubs and cows me, and frightens me out of my wits, Cutts. For I do believe that the witch is determined to have me, body and soul, and to marry me some day in spite of myself, Cutts. And if ever you see me about to be clutched in those horrible paws, poison me with ratsbane, or knock me on the head, Cutts."

The little man laughed a little laugh, sharp and eldritch, at the strange cowardice of the stalwart dare-devil. But Jasper did not echo the laugh.

"Hush!" he said, timidly, "and let me have a bed, if you can; I have not slept in one for a week, and my nerves are shaky."

The imp lighted a candle-end at the gas-lamp, and conducted Losely up the stairs to his own sleeping-room, which was less comfortless than might be supposed. He resigned his bed to the wanderer, who flung himself on it, rags and all. But sleep was no more at his command than it is at a king's.

"Why the —— did you talk of that witch?" he cried, peevishly, to Cutts, who was composing himself to rest on the floor. "I swear I fancy I feel her sitting on my chest like a nightmare."

He turned with a vehemence which shook the walls, and wrapped the coverlid round him, plunging his head into its folds. Strange though it seem to the novice in human nature—to Jasper Losely the woman who had so long lived but for one object—viz., to save him from the gibbet, was as his evil genius, his haunting fiend. He had conceived a profound terror of her, from the moment he perceived that she was resolutely bent upon making him honest. He had broken from her years ago—fled—resumed his evil courses—hid himself from her—in vain. Wherever he went, there went she. He might baffle the police, not her. Hunger had often forced him to accept her aid. As soon as he received it, he hid from her again, burying himself deeper and deeper in the mud, like a persecuted tench. He associated her idea with all the ill-luck that had befallen him. Several times some villainous scheme on which he had counted to make his fortune had been baffled in the most mysterious way; and just when baffled—and there seemed no choice but to cut his own throat or some one else's—up turned grim Arabella Crane, in the iron-gray gown, and with the iron-gray ringlets—hatefully, awfully beneficent—offering food, shelter, gold—and some demoniacal, honorable work. Often had he been in imminent peril from watchful law or treacherous accomplice. She had warned and saved him as she had saved him from the fell Gabrielle Desmarets, who, unable to bear the sentence of penal servitude, after a long process defended with astonishing skill, and enlisting the romantic sympathies of young France, had contrived to escape into another world by means of a subtle poison concealed about her distinguée person, and which she had prepared years ago with her own bloodless hands, and no doubt scientifically tested its effect on others. The cobra capella is gone at last! "Souviens-toi de ta Gabrielle," O Jasper Losely! But why Arabella Crane should thus continue to watch over him whom she no longer professed to love—how she should thus have acquired the gift of ubiquity and the power to save him—Jasper Losely could not conjecture. The whole thing seemed to him weird and supernatural. Most truly did he say that she had cowed him. He had often longed to strangle her; when absent from her, had often resolved upon that act of gratitude. The moment he came in sight of her stern, haggard face—her piercing lurid eyes—the moment he heard her slow, dry voice in some such sentences as these, "Again you come to me in your trouble, and ever shall. Am I not still as your mother, but with a wife's fidelity, till death us do part. There is the portrait of what you were—look at it, Jasper. Now turn to the glass—see what you are. Think of the fate of Gabrielle Desmarets! But for me what, long since, had been your own? But I will save you—I have sworn it. You shall be wax in these hands at last;" the moment that voice thus claimed and insisted on redeeming him, the ruffian felt a cold shudder—his courage oozed—he could no more have nerved his arm against her than a Thug would have lifted his against the dire goddess of his murderous superstition. Jasper could not resist a belief that the life of this dreadful protectress was, somehow or other, made essential to his—that, were she to die, he should perish in some ghastly and preternatural expiation. But for the last few months he had, at length, escaped from her—diving so low, so deep into the mud, that even her net could not mesh him. Hence, perhaps, the imminence of the perils from which he had so narrowly escaped—hence the utterness of his present destitution. But man, however vile, whatever his peril, whatever his destitution, was born free, and loves liberty. Liberty to go to Satan in his own way was to Jasper Losely a supreme blessing compared to that benignant compassionate espionage, with its relentless eye and restraining hand. Alas and alas! deem not this perversity unnatural in that headstrong self-destroyer! How many are there whom not a grim hard-featured Arabella Crane, but the long-suffering, divine, omniscient, gentle Providence itself, seeks to warn, to aid, to save—and is shunned, and loathed, and fled from, as if it were an evil genius! How many are there who fear nothing so much as the being made good in spite of themselves?—how many?—who can count them?

HOW TO CATCH DUCKS.

ON the Rhine, in Europe, the finest of the game birds abounds in such quantities that at times the waters are covered with them. Sportsmen have visions of flocks of fat ducks whenever the name of the river is mentioned. The greater the massacre of ducks, and the larger the consumption, it seems, the more prolific the tribe, and the more abundant the supply the following year.

As sportsmen will at once believe, the duck tribe on the Rhine are wild and wary. The least sound frightens them. At the sight of a man they fly, and will not alight for half a day. Fifty miles is the least interval which the King of the Ducks on the Rhine thinks it safe to interpose between his subjects and the misshapen two-legged creature without wings or webbed feet who dared to threaten their peace and safety with a double-barreled fowling-piece. Even on our tranquil waters it is no easy matter to obtain a couple of shots at a family of ducks. To get one good shot the sportsman must stalk his game. On the rivers of Europe, which have been the resort of sportsmen for generations, necessary measures of precaution are transmitted from father to son among the ducks; and he must be an unusually skillful hunter who contrives to surprise the aquatic birds of that meridian. They see and hear him long before he suspects their vicinity. If he can get one long shot, he may consider himself repaid for several hours' watching in the swamps and the mud.

On the Rhine, however, a new plan has lately been adopted for the capture of ducks. At the mouth of a creek a funnel-shaped net is laid, with the mouth of the funnel open near the mouth of the creek. The net is contrived in compartments without divisions, each ring growing smaller and smaller as the net stretches inland. The trap is so managed that from the river only one compartment is visible. At the second ring the net turns a sharp corner, and natural or artificial brushwood conceals the rest of the apparatus.

When the net is laid some twenty tame ducks are let loose upon the river, near its mouth. The sportsman lies in concealment till a flock of wild ducks alight near the spot. Then the decoys begin to do their work. They flirt with the newcomers. They cajole them. They seem to tell them, in the duck tongue, of the delights of their existence. Their exertions are not in vain. The wild ducks, which at first seemed shy and sulky, soon fraternize and become affectionate with their new friends. They may be seen swimming in pairs—a wild male and a tame female, or vice versa —just as Anglo-Saxon sailors make friends with Sandwich Island girls, or as New York belles fall in love with Italian counts.

When the watchful sportsman perceives that his decoys have done their duty, he proceeds to bait the hook by throwing into the water, at the mouth of the first compartment of his treacherous net, a quantity of the most succulent food. Ducks are not gastronomers; wholesome food, and plenty of it, furinaceous if possible, is their choice. Accordingly our sportsman bestrews the still water at the mouth of his creek with the very comestibles which wild and tame ducks love best. This rouses a passion among the tame ducks which is even superior to flirtation. Their appetite is even stronger than their affections: the moment their experienced eyes detect the usual feast floating on the surface of the water they make for the spot.

We all know that when Flora M'Flimsey, of Madison Square, declared her intention to go to the Opera, young Alimelech Bushel, of Canandaigua, had no choice but to follow her thither, though he hates music, and always goes to sleep at the Opera. Ducks are like human creatures. When the wild ducks see their tame friends sailing toward the mouth of the snare they follow them. Each fascinating young tame duck has a couple of wild drakes in hot chase after her, and each imploring tame drake decoys a too confiding wild duck to the treacherous shade of the willows. Mankind may well learn a lesson from the scene.

Once inside the net, the practical superiority of civilization over barbarism is triumphantly asserted. With one accord the tame ducks fall to devouring the bait. They pay no attention to their lovers, but feed with conscientious activity. Not so the denizens of the forest and lake. Perhaps from the feeling which induces young Augustus De Vere to leap his horse over a stone wall, in presence of his lady love (he would be delighted to engage in single combat with a ten-foot ogre), the wild ducks, male and female, despise the scattered luxuries which they see on the water, and proceed to explore the locality. They seem to say that there is a very snug spot for love-making up yonder under the bushes in the shade; and, like young Alfred Spoonheart, they exhaust themselves in entreaties to decoy their tame sweet-hearts up yonder, promising themselves—the traitors—to desert them so soon as they have received their young heart's truth. They loiter so zealously, and lentir themselves so actively to find out the limits of this new love luxe in which they happen to be, that, after a time, twenty or thirty of them have passed through the ring dividing the first from the second compartment.

They are now out of sight of the river. The idea occurs to the most experienced of the group as he turns riverward. He gives the signal of escape. Horror of horrors! At the very mouth of the net stands one of those nefarious two-legged, unwinged monsters against whom every prudent drake warns his brood as soon as they are old enough to understand any thing. A man is watching them with calm, bloody-minded, relentless gaze. In an instant all thoughts of tender dalliance are dismissed by the ducks. Escape is now their sole consideration. And as the passage riverward is blocked by the monster aforesaid, they swim swiftly and tremulously in the opposite direction. They pass one, two, three, four rings, and, to their surprise, they find themselves crowded together in a very singular fashion. They begin to wish that they had a little more room. They have doubts whether they have pursued the right course. The leader turns round to look backward. There stands the two-legged monster, with his bloody-minded expression, looking at them as before; and now he actually shouts.

At this the hearts of the poor ducks fall them altogether. Reckless of comfort, they fly, they swim, they jump on each other's backs in their agony, and at last rush frantically all together into the cul de sac, the last compartment of the fatal net. They have no sooner reached the terminus of their journey than the mouth of the last compartment is drawn tight by a ruthless hand, it is unhooked from the ring, and one by one the ducks are drawn forth and strangled.

The most singular part of the story is that the ducks make no cry when they are caught and put to death. It is supposed that terror deprives them of their voice. Certain it is that they die, and make no sign; which is a great comfort to the sportsman, who renews his little stratagem three and four times a day.

We submit the plan to our American sportsmen. Canvas-backs and red-heads may be taken by this method just as easily as the common ducks of Europe. A hundred ducks a day—no uncommon haul for the owner of a net on the Rhine—would be something unusual even for the most experienced of our gunners.

A PACKET-SHIP'S COMPANY.

We had been a fortnight on board the mail packet on our way home from the West Coast of Africa, and had exhausted nearly every possible amusement it provided under these circumstances and within those limits. We had on board the usual complement of ship-building captains and traders from the River Bonny, and, after passing Acera, had watched the canoes come off through the surf at Cape Coast Castle, and landed and walked up to the Governor's house at Sierra Leone. We had played at whist and the game of the race at all unoccupied times, and had displayed our various vocal powers and musical acquirements —which, I must confess, were not of a nature to have enlivened any circle—and as we were homeward-bound we had no newspapers and very few books.

The passengers consisted mainly of officers going home on sick leave; one of whom—Whose father held a civil appointment of importance on the Gold Coast—was accompanied by his sister. Then there were five or six bronzed captains, and copper-colored merchants of gold dust and ivory, to that altogether our number amounted to fourteen. We were by no means a lively company, and as I have said before, at the expiration of a fortnight we seemed to have exhausted all our amusements, and consequently to have annihilated every possible subject of mutual interest.

Under these circumstances we had, for two or three evenings running, sat on the quarter-deck, beneath an awning, looking listlessly from one to the other, watching young Wilson of the Gold Coast Corps, who was going home on sick leave; envying him his power of unlimited sleep; or lazily following with our eyes the one-armed captain, who paced the deck in an uneasy, restless manner from morning to night. He had not been home for fourteen years, and had now left his ship, a stationary merchant vessel, up the River Bonny, to "have a look at the old country."

A more uncomfortable, unsatisfactory companion it would be impossible to imagine; and young Wilson, who shared a double cabin with him, was loud in his complaints, and pathetic in his appeals for sympathy.

"Sleep!" said Wilson, "I can't sleep—that fellow won't let me sleep; and it's all very well to talk, but you can't get any sleep worth having in the day-time. You know his berth is fixed just over mine, and no sooner have I turned in and fallen into a doze than—rat-tat-tat-tat—goes the iron hook fastened to the stump of his arm.

"The first night I thought he wanted something, so I called out, 'What's the matter, skipper?' but he only growled at me in reply. And I declare that every hour of every night since then, or whenever he thinks I am asleep, rat-tat-tat-tat comes that hook on the frame of the berth just above my head. I don't bear it meekly, I assure you, and I have used more bad language to that man than I ever used before in my life. But, upon my honor, I believe he would rather hear me swear at him than say nothing at all; for he'll often give a kind of a sighing groan after it, as though some one had lifted a heavy weight from his chest."

"You may depend upon it he has got a bad conscience," said our one lady. By-the-by, she was treated with as much deference as if she had been Queen of England; and she was a queen in her own small way, and not a bad queen either—Queen of Beauty—Wilson said, and one or two more who were inclined to be spooney.

So, of course, when she suggested "conscience," we all echoed the "depend upon it," and every one offered, laughingly, a possible explanation of the cause. And thus we fell into a talk about this same conscience and its torments, and began to tell stories illustrative of it. Most of them were, I must confess, neither very amusing nor very instructive; and pretty Miss Graham began to yawn, and her brother, Captain Graham, had followed the example of young Wilson, and was fast asleep.

Then, after two old sea-captains had spun a long yarn, there was a pause, which Miss Graham broke by exclaiming,

"Oh, Mr. Barkum, you have been to all kinds of places, seen such queer things, do tell us a true story."

The Mr. Barkum thus addressed—a jolly old trader—replied with a grin,

"What shall I tell you, miss?"

"I don't know. As we are on the sea, tell us a story of shipwreck—but not a melancholy one."

"Never told one in my life, miss!"

"But you have been shipwrecked, have you not?"

"Oh yes," said Mr. Barkum, "sure-ly yes, miss, sure-ly. Why I was shipwrecked here"—with a broad wave of the arm which included the whole Atlantic.

"You don't say so, Mr. Barkum. Do tell us all about it. What did you do?"

"Well," said that gentleman, "we was tossed here and we was tossed there for three days and three nights, and then we took to the boats. And after we took to the boats we was tossed here and we was tossed there for three days and three nights more; and wery cold and wery wet we were. Then the victuals fell short; and for three days and three nights we had nothin' to eat nor nothin' to drink, and wery hungry and wery thirsty we were."

Here Mr. Barkum made a long pause.

Miss Graham said,

"And was there no vessel to pick you up, Mr. Barkum? How did you manage?"

"Well, miss, we burned priming and made a fire in the dripping-pan that the black cook would not have believed. Then we cast lots, and the lot fell on the steward; so we stewed—"

"Good Heaven, Mr. Barkum!"

"Yes, miss, we did, indeed. We stewed his boots—Wellingtons. The tops was the tenderest. Then we cast lots again, and the lot fell on the black cook; so we stewed his pumps; but they was uneatable, though the soup kept us alive ten days. After that we cast lots again, and the lot fell on the captain, and we stewed his water-boots; but they was tremendous tough, sure-ly."

At this point Mr. Barkum was interrupted by a general shout of remonstrance.

"Well," says he, "when a lady tells a man she wants a story of a shipwreck, what's he to do? I told the wery best I could." And with another grin Mr. Barkum, who seemed not so much to have told his story as to have had it jerked out of him, leaned back and looked round him, apparently well satisfied with the effect he had produced.

"Humph!" was uttered in a hoarse growl behind him, at which we all started—for it came from no other than the "silent man"—an old sea-captain, who had been picked up nobody knew where or how, and who had not uttered a syllable since he had been on board. He would stand all day long looking over the stern of the vessel, gloomy and intent—giving no answer to whomsoever addressed him. But now he stooped over Miss Graham, and laying one rough hand on her shoulder while with the other he pointed out beyond the stern of the vessel:

"She'll do it," he said, in a hoarse whisper; "she'll do it—she's bound to do it."

And he walked rather unsteadily to his old position.

"He's been at our grog-bottles; that's what's opened his lips. He never has any of his own, and you saw him come up from the saloon," said Captain Graham, shaking himself out of a doze.

But his sister was all astonishment. "Who is she, and what is she bound to do? It can't be this ship, for he pointed out to sea."

"Never mind, miss," said Mr. Minchin—a lean, yellow-faced man, who looked like an American, though he called himself English. "Perhaps he's got somebody after him; who knows?" and he winked mysteriously, not so much at any one person as at the whole ship's crew. "Though when I'm after a man myself I take good care he sha'n't know much about it."

"You after a man, Mr. Minchin! why, what do you go after him for?"

"Well, ma'am, for various reasons; sometimes for one thing, and sometimes for another. Now, there was the captain of the Golden Fleece. I followed that man four years, and I'll tell you how it happened.

"The Golden Fleece was bound from California to Liverpool, and, besides a very valuable cargo of furs and such like, she had on board a quarter of a million in gold dust and nuggets. Pretty pickings among that, I can tell you, and so thought the captain—Jones, his name was. Now, I dare say, Captain Jones didn't like the risks of a voyage home; so after he had been at sea ten days he ran the Golden Fleece on a rock about a mile from the shore, and then he and the crew took to the boats. Well, of course he wrote home to the owners how the Golden Fleece was wrecked off the coast of California, and how he and the crew only just escaped with their lives. And, of course, the owners didn't like it; nor the underwriters didn't like it; for they were let in for a quarter of a million, besides the worth of the vessel and the fifty thousand pounds sterling that the cargo was valued at; and that's no joke.

"So after a few months they sends for me. 'Mr. Minchin,' says they, 'this is a very lame story!'

"'It is,' says I, 'very lame.'

"'Captain Jones don't come home,' says they.

"'No,' says I, 'nor I don't suppose he's very likely to come home.'

"'Mr. Minchin, will you go out and see after the Golden Fleece?'

"'I will,' says I.

"'And will you,' says they, 'learn something about Captain Jones? Never mind the time and never mind the expense, but don't come back to England without Captain Jones.'

"'If Captain Jones is to be found,' says I, 'I'll find him, dead or alive.'

"Well, ma'am, of course this was not the first time by many that I'd been on some such errand; and for one cause or another I've been sent out from Lloyd's to places all over the world, almost, where vessels have been wrecked.

"But not to weary you, ma'am, and the company, with an account of the voyage and adventures—and indeed we had none of the latter, except that in crossing the isthmus of Panama, which was not so quiet then as it is now, we wiped out a small party of Indians—'

"Wiped them out, Mr. Minchin?"

"Well, miss, if we hadn't wiped them out they'd have wiped us out: I'll tell you the whole story some day. But to go back to the Golden Fleece. I went along the coast—and I found her. There she was, just in as good condition as on the day when the crew deserted her. I went on board at low water, and found that Captain Jones had run her on a sharp-pointed rock, which fitted into her just like a wedge; the water couldn't get in, and she couldn't get off or be got off without considerable trouble. I went over her and found the cargo all right enough; nothing touched there, and very little damaged. But all the gold was gone, ma'am, which I had expected from the first. Well, I first of all got out the cargo, and sent that home, and then did the best I could about the ship.

"After that, thinks I to myself, 'Now, Captain Jones, it's your turn; and a pretty stiff turn it'll be for you, or my name ain't Minchin.' I wasn't in no manner of hurry, you must remember—for I knew he couldn't spend the money, and I knew he daren't invest it, or make much stir about it in any way. So my object was to find him, and to find him quietly, and make him give it up.

"Well! You'll maybe hardly believe it, but it was three years before I could come upon that man's track. I did come upon it at last though, and I was pretty sure I had found him in a Mr. Weeks, settled in Canada. Naturally, business took me to the place where Mr. Weeks lived, and I soon picked up acquaintance with him.

"He was Captain Jones. I found out that; and before long I was more sure than ever that he had neither spent the money nor invested it; but where he'd got it I couldn't tell.

"After a time Mr. Weeks and I got to be very great friends, and at the end of six months Mr. Weeks began to talk of how he should like to go into business—something in the commercial line—as he had a small capital to invest. 'Very small!' thinks I to myself. 'Only a quarter of a million!' However, I said that was just what I was looking out for too, and so, to make a long story short, we agreed to enter into partnership, and by my advice we were to go first to Liverpool, and make arrangements with different firms there.

"I must confess that voyage home did seem rather a long one; but it was over at last, and Mr. Weeks and I were walking along the streets of Liverpool. So I put one hand to my belt, where I had pistols—and he knew it, and carried pistols himself—and the other I laid on his shoulder.

"'Now Captain Jones, of the Golden Fleece,' says I, 'I've been after you this four years, and I've got you safe home at last.' Ma'am, if you'll believe it, that man never said a word, but just fixed his eyes on me and staggered against the wall. Now, I didn't want to give him into custody if I could help it; for I knew that those who employed me would a good deal rather let him go free and they have their gold, than see him transported and carry with him the secret of where it was hidden.

"So I told him that he might let me know next morning whether I should hand him over to a police-constable, or whether he'd tell me where he'd got the gold.

"He never spoke a word. So I led him to an inn, and locked myself in a room with him till the next morning."

"Were you not afraid he'd shoot you, Mr. Minchin?"

"No, I wasn't afraid he'd shoot me, but I was terribly afraid he'd shoot himself. However, I kept a sharp eye on him, and as he saw he'd no chance of getting off anyhow, he just made a clean breast of it. So the end was, that we got back nearly the whole of the gold dust, which he'd buried soon after landing from the wreck. I knew all along that he hadn't got it with him. And they that employed me made me a present of a thousand pounds over and above what had been agreed on for that job."

"Well," said young Wilson, who looked wide awake, "you're a queer fish. May I ask if you're after any body now?"

"Maybe I am, and maybe I am not. But, I suppose, you don't think I am after you?"

"Why, no. I am pretty sure of that, anyhow. But I wish you were after that one-armed fellow."

"Keep your mind easy, Mr. Wilson. He'll put his own head into the halter, if there's one made for him; and I do know that there's friends awaiting for him in England, who'll be very glad to see him home again."

"There, now, I knew there was something! Now, Minchin, do tell us what it is; there's a good fellow."

"Not I, Mr. Wilson. No, ma'am, nor I don't tell you neither: nor we don't have no secret about the matter."

And Mr. Minchin kept his word. So, who the one-armed captain was, or what he had done, we could not find out until we reached Plymouth. Every one avoided him instinctively, our own captain setting the example; and all the latter part of the voyage young Wilson slept on deck, rather than share the same cabin with him. But it was only when, in answer to our signals, two police officers came off to our vessel in the river and arrested this man that we heard the story of the slow, cruel torture, the barbarous murder, committed by him on board his ship in the River Bonny, twelve years before.

The "Silent Man," after he had once spoken, was no longer inaccessible. We used to join him in his watch at the stern of the vessel, and say:

"Well, Sir, will she do it?"

His invariable answer, pointing backward over the sea, was

"She'll do it; she's bound to do it, and she'll do it."

As we entered Plymouth harbor he once more sought Miss Graham, put his hand on her shoulder, and, pointing in the invariable direction, said,

"She's done it. She was bound to do it, and she's done it."

I have no clear idea to this day who "she" was, or what she was bound to do, or what she did, or how or when or why she did it, or what would have happened to her or to you or to me if she had not done it.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

Definitions from a Popular Dictionary.—Life—A time to make money. Money—The end of life. Man—A machine to make money. Woman—A machine to spend it. Children—Machines to spend it on. Economy—Buying things because they are cheap, whether you want them or not.

During the Reign of Terror the mob got hold of the Abbé Maury, and resolved to sacrifice him. "To the lamp-post with him!" was the universal cry. The abbé was in a bad fix with a mob for his judges—the tender mercies of a mob! With the utmost coolness the abbé said to those who were dragging him along, "Well, if you hang me to the lamp-post, will you see any clearer for it?" This bright sally tickled his executioners and saved his life.

A good action is never thrown away, and perhaps that is the reason why we find so few of them.

Mr. Trelawney, the author of "Recollections of Shelley and Byron," when Byron was lying dead at Missolonghi, sent his servant Fletcher out of the room by a stratagem, uncovers his friend's feet, examines them, and then publishes to the world that both Byron's feet were clubbed, and his legs withered to the knee—the form and features of an Apollo, with the feet and legs of a sylvan satyr.

It happened once that the Kadi (a judge) of Sarry-Hissar (a village near Constantinople) got drunk and fell asleep in his vineyard; the Khojah, walking with a friend, passed by the place, and seeing the Kadi's condition, stole his gown and placed it upon his shoulders. When the Kadi awoke and missed his gown, he summoned his attendants, and sending them in different directions, commanded them to arrest the person with whom it should be discovered. One of the officers recognized the gown on the Khojah's back, and seizing him, dragged him to the Melikemeh (the public tribunal). When the Kadi saw him, he demanded: "Khojah Effendi, where didst thou find this gown?" The Khojah answered in a loud voice, so that all the spectators might hear: "As I was walking this morning with a friend, we saw a Kadi so reckless of the holy law he was appointed to administer that he lay in an open field, dead drunk and asleep. My companion, in indignation, spit upon and kicked him; I took his cloak and put it on me. If it be thy property, I am willing to resign it to thee." "No, no, Khojah!" cried the Kadi, alarmed for his reputation; "it is none of mine! it is none of mine!"

Knowledge is Power.—While a worthy individual, of the march of intellect school, was "laying down the law," the other day, to a knot of acquaintances in one of the streets of Cupar, he caught the eye of a carter hard by, who had been vainly endeavoring to raise a sack of potatoes upon his cart, and who, on the instant, thus appealed to the man of knowledge—"Come awa, Mr. ——; knowledge is power, ye ken—gi'e us a lift on wi' this poke o' taties!"

A young man in "these parts," who had spent a little of his own time and a good deal of his father's money in fitting for the Bar, was asked after his examination how he got along?

"Oh, well," said he, "I answered one question right."

"Ah, indeed!" said the old gentleman, with looks of paternal satisfaction at his son's peculiar smartness. "And what was that?"

"They asked me what a qui tum action was."

"That was a hard one! And you answered it correctly, did you?"

"Yes. I told them I did not know."

Excessive labor, exposure to wet and cold, deprivation of sufficient quantities of necessary and wholesome food, habitual bad lodging, sloth, and intemperance, are all deadly enemies to human life; but none of them are so bad as violent and ungoverned passions. Men and women have survived all these, and at last reached an extreme old age; but it may be safely doubted whether a single instance can be found of a man of violent and irascible temper, habitually subject to storms of ungovernable passion, who has arrived at an advanced period of life. It is, therefore, a matter of the highest importance to every one desirous to preserve "a sound mind in a sound body"—so that the brittle vessel of life may glide down the stream of life smoothly and securely, instead of being continually tossed about amidst the rocks and shoals which endanger its existence—to have a special care, amidst all the vicissitudes and trials of life, to maintain a quiet possession of his own spirit.

A patriotic Austrian (a rare species in Austria, where there is so very little to be patriotic about) was bragging to the editor of Murray's "Hand-book" about his country. It took the lead in civilization—it was the grandest, the purest, the freest, the best Fatherland. "In fact, Sir," he exclaimed, "I tell you that Austria is before all the world." "Yes, much the same way that chaos was," was the happy reply.

"Friend B——, a Quaker of this vicinity," writes a Western friend, "had a daughter who, for some time, had attracted the admiration of a neighboring swain, whose visits to the domicile of friend B—— were not altogether agreeable. Elizabeth Hamilton narrowly escaped being left behind when Grammont was suddenly called away to France. The lady's brother pursued him to the coast, and, entering his chamber, said, "Monsieur, have you forgot nothing?" "Pardon, gentleman," was his reply, "I forgot to marry your sister!" He returned immediately, and La Belle Hamilton became Comtesse de Grammont.

Money is like fire, a good servant but a bad master. It may be charged with injustice for mankind, inasmuch as there are only a few who make false money, whereas money makes many men false. We hate to be cheated, not so much for the value of the commodity, as because it makes others appear superior to ourselves. Being defrauded would be nothing, were it not so galling to be outwitted. A Greek philosopher left his money in the hands of a friend to be given to his children in case they should be fools; "for," said he, "if they are wise, they will not want it."

"I'm afloat! I'm afloat!" screamed a young lady of powerful lungs and fingers to match, as she exercised both at the piano. "I should think you were," growled an old bachelor, "judging from the squall you raise."

At a meeting of the Board of Supervisors of Peoria County, Illinois, held a short time since, a question arose as to paying the constable and sheriff's fees in the Circuit Court, amounting to about eight hundred dollars. The Board were somewhat divided on the subject, a portion considering the amount altogether unreasonable, while others advocated an appropriation for its payment, and quite an animated discussion arose. After several ineffectual attempts, one M'Ginnis, who opposed the motion, obtained the floor. Throwing himself back in the true Websterian style, he commenced: "Gentlemen, at the last meeting of this Board I desired a small appropriation, a very insignificant sum, to clean the mice out of this room, who have been eating up the county papers. You denied my request, and you now ask me to vote for a large appropriation for rats. Gentlemen, I will not do it." This was a quietus—and the Board immediately adjourned.

"How do you and your friends feel now?" said an exultant politician in one of our Western States, to a rather irritable member of the defeated party. "I suppose," said the latter, "we feel just as Lazarus did when he was licked by the dogs."

Oil and truth will get uppermost at last.

"If you only said one half the witty things that, on reflection, we feel we might have said, we would be a wonder we should be!" Sure enough. Almost any body can be witty if you give him time. We have now in our memory a list of about twenty smart things that we might have said, if we had only thought of them on the proper occasion.

In old times it was often customary to add to marriage notices some compliments to the bride, such as "a very charming young lady," or "a lady possessed of every quality that is calculated to render the marriage state happy." But, since the degeneracy of the age, a gentleman in Massachusetts pays a marriage fee which great happiness is predicted, because the bride "has never met personally before, and has known each other only by correspondence, were fabulously rich, and the charms of the mind than by personal appearance."

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, April 26, 1858.

The foreign trade of the past for the six weeks ensuing dates as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending Apr. 24, 1858	$5,643,398	$1,596,202
Corresponding week, 1857	4,838,734	1,349,488
Decrease	$1,194,951
Increase		$30,671

The export of specie was nearly nominal, being less than twenty thousand dollars, and the import will be likely to show any change either way this afternoon, the steamer having a full probability either to import or export thirty-four millions. Money continues to decline in value: it is exceedingly difficult to lean any considerable amount, and if good, and there is but a shadow of prospect of such a revival of trade as would give employment to any considerable portion of the specie accumulated here. Sterling Exchange closed for the steamer at 109¾ @ 110.

Stocks have been very dull throughout the week, especially on Friday and Saturday. Prices have declined in price, but no activity of any kind. The speculators do not seem to see that the public funds afford, in the present condition of the money market, however, it is reasonable to expect a revival of speculation in stocks at any moment.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, April 26, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been more active for the week, at improved prices. The demand is good for home use and fair for export. Wheat has been in moderate request at previous rates. Corn has been in good nightly, closing pretty briskly and firmly. Oats have been depressed and have tended downward. Rye continues to be in good demand, especially on Thursday, when as much as 10,000 bushels were bought. Barley was wanted at 65 @ 68 per pound, but they now less in favor of purchasers. Provisions have been in active request, including Pork, here and to arrive, and holders have obtained full prices for all that has been offered for sale, mention of which prices. Sugars have been steadily purchased, closing at rather under quotations. Molasses has been quiet. Coffee for Rio and Laguayra and Java has been more sought after for home use and for export, at unchanged prices. Tobacco has been in only moderately inquired for at former rates. Hemp and Grass Seeds have been slightly dull in sale, and have attracted considerable attention at steady quotations. Purchasers have operated more extensively in Wool at uniform prices. Dry Goods are generally in somewhat better request, and the sales for the week are considerable. Bad Weather, and the immediate prospect of a failure in the productive of any remarkable alternations. The supply of Beeves at the Live Stock Markets last week was sufficient for all requirements of buyers, and the prices declined a shade.... Milch Cows were more abundant and in better request, at uniform rates.... Veal Calves were dull and heavy, with increased receipts.... Sheep and Lambs were in moderate supply and demand, at somewhat easier prices.... Swine were pretty freely offered, and the market was generally unfavorable to sellers. The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending Apr. 19.	Week ending Apr. 26.
Beeves	3,168	3,150
Milch Cows	104	130
Veal Calves	1,240	1,180
Sheep and Lambs	5,766	5,330
Swine	7,740	7,740

Of the Forty-fourth Street Market supply of Beeves last Wednesday there were received from

Illinois	1,603	Michigan	64
Ohio	681	Pennsylvania	56
New York	393	Virginia	16

ADVERTISEMENTS.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE OF HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, with an alphabetical table of contents, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application in person or by letter inclosing a post-paid address. Clerks in Public Offices.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, desirous of forming libraries or enriching their private collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to contain a complete list of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—a REFERENCE to more than two thousand VOLUMES—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the usual retail prices. Franklin Square.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., the Catalogue will be found a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary production; it is a record of books which have proven especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, wherever books can be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed directly to HARPER & BROTHERS, which will be promptly attended to.

The present Number completes the Sixteenth Volume of HARPER'S MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The accompanying Table of Contents and List of Illustrations will show that the Publishers have spared no labor in the abundant literary and artistic resources at their command. Every Number has contributions recognized as the productions of the most accomplished American writers; and the illustrations are more numerous and of greater variety of interest than have appeared in any previous Volume.

The Publishers believe that the plan of the Magazine combines elements of interest for the most numerous class of readers, adapted to the wants of the American public. The literary contributions are of a high and established character, and the pictorial illustrations, in addition, which have proved discourse to so many literary and artistic descriptions of the Editor's Table and Drawer, they trust that the Magazine is recognized as a necessary reflex of the times. The Publishers have also a "Easy Chair" and "Editor's Drawer" for the future. They will continue to fill the Magazine with the most interesting record there is Life and Morals; leaving, as heretofore, the discussion of sectarian opinions to Religion, and of party questions to Politics, to their own appropriate organs. Wine men of all parties, sects, and nations will find its pages welcome to them from month to month. The object of the Magazine will be to unite public favor by the merit of its Literature and Illustrations, and by the moderation of our common country.

The Publishers do not find it necessary or expedient to appeal to public attention by boasting "Spoilsen Sumbers" exclusively in the newest known type of illustrations. They intend that every number shall prove to be worth the price of the Volume. Subscribers, therefore, will obtain a larger amount of matter, more illustrations, and more attractive pictures, in a better manner, than any other periodical. Monthly Magazine and the Publishers are confident that the public will appreciate the difference between the cheap and ephemeral age which have been accorded to it during the early days of the Magazine.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," will be continued in HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE, and is printed from advance proofs received from the Author in advance of publication in England and the Publishers have paid for the Work the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

CAUTION.

LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

THE attention of Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS has been called to several spurious Works put forth as the "NARRATIVE OF DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA." One of these is a gross forgery throughout. It does not contain a single line written or furnished by Dr. LIVINGSTONE, bears no resemblance whatever to his genuine Narrative, but is altogether the invention of the fabricator. Another book professes to give, "in the language of Dr. Livingstone," a "complete account of his various journeys, omitting only incidental details and scientific matter." These "incidental details" which are omitted form more than one half of the matter in the genuine edition, embracing the most valuable part of the book, nearly all of the characteristic Illustrations, and the elaborate Maps, which are essential to a full understanding of the explorations and travels of the Author. The place of the genuine Illustrations has been supplied by coarse second-hand cuts, bearing no relation whatever to Dr. Livingstone's Book. This mutilated edition is designed mainly for circulation through the "Gift-Book" scheme of the publisher, although it is understood that reputable members of the Trade have purchased it, supposing it to be a genuine, unmutilated edition.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS respectfully caution the Trade and the Public against being imposed upon by these forged and mutilated Works.

The only genuine unmutilated American edition of Dr. Livingstone's Work is that published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, printed from an early copy purchased for a large sum from the Author. It contains 754 pages, large octavo, with a Portrait of the Author engraved upon Steel; two elaborate Steel Plate Maps, with Livingstone's Routes colored, and Forty-five large Wood-cuts, engraved in the highest style of the Art. The volume is beautifully printed and substantially bound. Price Three Dollars.

TO PERSONS IN THE COUNTRY.

Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS will send a copy of LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, upon the receipt of Three Dollars.

THE HAPPY HOME.
BY KIRWAN,
Author of "Letters to Bishop Hughes," &c. 16mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

"A work which treats at length of the moral training which is essential to the young, and of the religious culture without which no ethical inculcations possess vitality. These important themes are discussed in a tone of earnest appeal, and illustrated by a great variety of incidents drawn from the experience of real life. The writer never loses his characteristic vivacity, although his style, in this work as required by the nature of the subject—is greatly softened down from the vehemence which marks his well-known polemic productions. Without the slightest approach to stiffness or formality, he presents a collection of valuable didactic precepts, showing the true conditions of domestic happiness, and urging their importance by a happy selection of impressive examples.

BURNETT'S COCOAINE.
TESTIMONIAL.
BOSTON, July 19, 1857.
MESSRS. J. BURNETT & CO.—I can not refuse to state the salutary effect in my own aggravated case, of your excellent Hair Oil—(Cocoaine).

For many months my hair had been falling off, until I was fearful of losing it entirely. The skin upon my head became gradually more and more inflamed, so that I could not touch it without pain. This irritated condition I attributed to the use of various advertised hair washes, which I have since been told contained camphene spirit.

By the advice of my physician, to whom you had shown your process of purifying the Cocoa-nut Oil, I commenced its use the last week in June. The first application allayed the itching and irritation; in three or four days the redness and tenderness disappeared—the hair ceased to fall, and I have now a thick growth of new hair. I trust that others, similarly afflicted, will be induced to try the same remedy.

Yours, very truly, SUSAN R. POPE.

HON. JAMES S. GREEN, U. S. SENATOR FROM MISSOURI.

THE Senator from Missouri is another instance of the fact we referred to in our sketch of the biography of Hon. Mr. Green, that many of the most distinguished men in our nation have worked their way up to high position from the humbler walks of life. Our gallery of portraits and these biographical sketches will be of great aid by young men who almost fear to attempt to climb the hill of difficulty, and will help many to discover how the crop of success follows the seed-time of labor and self-sacrifice.

The subject of this memoir is a fair example of what may be done by plodding, persevering application. He was born in Fauquier County, Virginia, on the 28th of February, 1817, and lived there until he was nineteen years of age, receiving an ordinary education in common English branches. In 1836 he determined to leave Virginia, to seek his education, fortune, and future home in some new community. He first went to Alabama, but remained there only about a year, when he ascended the Mississippi River, and settled permanently in Missouri, in the autumn of 1837. He has ever since been identified with the history of that flourishing State, and, like all her adopted sons, bears the greater love to her for the benefits she has conferred upon him. The first few years of his residence in Missouri were attended with those struggles which so many professional men endure in preparing themselves for their calling. Perhaps few young men have made greater sacrifices, or persevered under more discouragements for an entrance into the legal profession, than did Mr. Green. He was frequently compelled to suspend his studies in order to earn by other labors means to defray his necessary expenses. It required a very resolute will to persevere as he did; but, having set his mark before him, he manfully strove, until in 1840 he was admitted to the bar.

During his probation he had made many friends in Missouri, and he soon obtained a lucrative practice. He confined himself to the duties of his profession during the next four years, and was immersed in legal business, when in 1844 the Democratic party nominated Mr. Polk for the Presidency. As soon as the nomination was announced, Mr. Green, being a presidential elector for Missouri, devoted himself to canvassing that State, and performed a great amount of labor in securing the election of his candidate.

His next important public service was in his active labors in a convention, of which he was a member, for the revision of the Constitution of Missouri. This convention was held in 1845, and was composed of the ablest men of the State. Mr. Green's activity and usefulness won for him so much commendation, that at the next election, in 1846, he was chosen as member of Congress, and took his seat in the House of Representatives for the first time in December, 1847. His congressional career commenced at an important time, during the war with Mexico, and the young member soon became noted for his ardent defense of the President, and the policy of the Administration.

He was re-elected by a large majority in 1848, and served through two Congresses. In January, 1849, he was appointed by the Governor of Missouri to argue, in the Supreme Court, the boundary dispute with Iowa, and made an argument which attracted much notice at the time, and placed him among the leading lawyers of the country.

In 1850 the people of Missouri became very much excited upon political matters, and the Democratic party in that State were much divided. Hon. T. H. Benton, whose demise we recently chronicled, was a candidate for Governor; and Mr. Green's party friends feeling desirous that some one should engage Mr. Benton in debate, chose him as the most fitting person. It required a good deal of courage, as well as skill, to enable any man to contend with the impetuous and overwhelming Benton. But Mr. Green met him in debate, and published a letter reviewing the veteran Senator's political course, and condemning it. Mr. Benton was defeated, and at that time his active political history ceased, although he was afterward candidate for Governor. Owing to the dissensions in the Democratic party, Mr. Green was twice defeated as a candidate for Congress; and in 1853 President Pierce appointed him to be Chargé d'Affaires at Bogota, New Granada, his official grade being afterward raised to that of Minister Resident. The climate of Central America proving injurious to his health, he resigned his position, and returned to Missouri in 1854. Again, in 1856, he was elected to Congress by a large majority, but before the time arrived for him to take his seat he was chosen by the Legislature to represent the State in the Senate of the United States. He is now serving his first senatorial term, and has been very prominently before the country during the present session as the leader of the Administration party, and the champion of the measure for admitting Kansas into the Union as a State under the Lecompton Constitution. Hon. S. A. Douglas, who is chairman of the Senate committee on Territories, finding his views opposed by a majority of the committee, could not, in strict compliance with parliamentary etiquette, present (as it was otherwise his duty to do) the majority report, and that duty devolved upon Mr. Green. He has discharged what he conceived to be his duty with ability and firmness; he has been untiring in his efforts to accomplish his own purpose, and has displayed a great deal of parliamentary skill.

In personal appearance Mr. Green is tall, somewhat spare, but well formed, and apparently fitted to endure great bodily fatigue. When speaking, his voice is full and distinct, free from these defects which characterize so many of our orators; his words flow in a clear unimpassioned stream; every word is uttered so as to be understood; and though he rarely uses notes, his arguments have the logical symmetry that would seem to indicate very careful preparation; his gestures are few, but earnest and appropriate; and he receives the general attention of the Senate. When in repose, his countenance, from anxiety or some other cause, indicates a greater encroachment of age than his years justify. We regret that we can furnish only this bare record of his public life. His public career is comparatively recent, and the speeches from which we should quote to illustrate his gifts have been furnished to our readers in the newspapers of the present. His term of service will expire in 1861.

DAILY WORK.

Wins logs from dread of daily work,
And his appointed task would shirk,
Commits a folly and a crime;
A pauper lazzarone—
A paltry knave—
A clog upon the wheels of time;
With work to do, and store of health,
The man's unworthy to be free;
Who will not give,
That he may live,
His daily toil for daily fee.

No! let us work! We only ask
Reward proportioned to our task;
Let us be measured with the great—
No fund with rocks—
With mill or bank—
No envy of a mint's estate,
If we can earn sufficient store
To satisfy our daily needs,
And can retain
For age and pain,
A fraction: we are rich indeed.

No dread of toil have we or care,
We know our worth, and weigh our powers;
This more we work the more we win;
Success to trade!
Success to spade!
And to the corn that's coming in!
And joy to him who o'er his task
Remembers toil is nature's plan;
Who, working, thinks,
And never sinks
His independence as a man!

Who only asks for humblest wealth,
Enough for competence and health;
And labors when his work is done
To read his book,
By chimney nook,
Or stroll at setting of the sun;
Who toils as every man should toil,
For fair reward, erect and free:
These are the men—
The best of men—
These are the men we mean to be.

CHARLES MACKAY.

TO THAT SWEET SINGER
OVER THE WAY.

At last I've seen thee! seen thee with these eyes!
Unthank'd, my soul has dared to look on thine!
Now, come what may, so much, at least, is mine,
Till earthly forms shall fade beyond the skies.
Music henceforth shall seem but Love's fair guise;
Air-drawn enchantment! Veil of the Divine!
Refrains have no refraining; and Love's shrine
Yields all its joy to true heart-harmonies.
Like the sweet May, "the daffodils-fond May,"
Ever with flowers and beauty crowned and led,
Even so thou cannest, music-heralded,
"A silken wonder," fresh from all the broadway!
Matchless thy voice, matchless thy bonnet's blue;
I can but hope thy heart still matches, too!

AMERICAN SYMPATHY WITH MURDERERS.

WITHIN the past few days the sessions of the Rue Lepelletier have been signally honored in the two principal cities of the United States. In New York a number of citizens have marched in procession by way of testifying their respect for their memory; in Boston a meeting large and respectable, has been held, and resolutions passed, enrolling Orsini, Pieri, and Rudio among the holy army of martyrs. There is this difference between the two celebrations: In this city no natives took part in the ceremony. One or two eccentric journals expressed sympathy with the assassins; but this was, probably, a shallow device to attract attention. The heat and burden of the performance fell on the shoulders of the naturalized foreigners of Germany, France, Italy, and Ireland, who have graciously condescended to make this country their home. In Boston, on the contrary, natives largely participated in the celebration. William Lloyd Garrison presided, and invoked other of the shining lights of New England philosophy imparted the color of their presence to the assemblage. The Boston representation can not be described as the work of mere foreigners.

It is not to be disguised that these transactions will have a weight far beyond the general anticipation. A few years since, when a number of Revolutionary exiles hired a room, showed and ran alongside a French frigate—then accidentally lying in the harbor of New York—singing the Marseillaise, and grunting, collectively at the name of "Monsieur Bonaparte," the French Government did not deem it beneath its dignity to make a demand for "explanation" of the facts to our Minister at France. We must not be surprised if the Orsini demonstrations at New York and Boston elicit still more significant marks of disapprobation from the Emperor of the French.

They will reach him at an untoward moment. The acquittal in London of the refugee Bernard, in the teeth of the most evident proofs, will have demonstrated to his understanding that the English people are not disposed to regard his life as very valuable; and the subscription for the children of Orsini, which amounts already, we are told, to a million of francs, and to which persons of the highest rank and responsibility in Germany, Italy, and Great Britain are subscribers, must have satisfied him that, in spite of the apparent deference paid to his authority, he is in reality, an unpopular man. Our little torchlight procession and the Boston meeting will not improve the proper sleep of supremacy by these discoveries.

In truth, however, the people of the United States are not anxious for the overthrow of Louis Napoleon. We are, as a nation, strong believers in the axiom that no people imbued with the sentiment of freedom can be successfully enslaved. In view, therefore, of the palpable slavery of the French, and of the grinding tyranny of the Imperial régime, the people of the United States have come to the conclusion that freedom is not particularly desired by the people of France, and that a despotic form of government suits them best. This conclusion flows naturally from a study of the indelicate theories of the republican politicians, and of the tranquil acquiescence of the French in the arbitrary measures of the Emperor. It may be an erroneous conclusion. The French may be suffering from a temporary paralysis. But we are apt to judge from our own experience, and that guide leads us to hold the subjects of the Emperor responsible for the monstrosities of the Imperial régime.

Our private concern with France is purely commercial. In a commercial point of view, the Imperial Government is neither more nor less advantageous to us than the governments of the Republic and the monarchy were. It is—for the time—a stable government. So long as it lasts, the French will consume and pay for so much cotton, and we shall be enabled to preserve so much silk and other manufactures at a fair price. If it were overthrown, the French demand for our cotton would probably cease, and the goods we need from France might cost us more. Commercially speaking, therefore, we are interested in the stability of the empire. And we are too practical a people for an opposite motive—such as the wish for the spread of democratic doctrines—to allow any possible influence over our actions or even our minds.

PROSPECTS OF CHEAP FOOD.

So far as returns have come in, the prospect of the crops throughout this country is favorable. The weather has been singularly propitious, and unless some untoward drought or deluge should intervene between this and harvest-time, we may look forward to even a more abundant crop than that of last year. The breadth of land sown is quite unprecedented.

Similar reports are to be found in the foreign journals in reference to the crops in Great Britain and France. It is too early for any firm and unerring like a reliable opinion; but there are the indications are favorable, and the dealers and farmers, both France and England, seem to have made up their minds to more than an average crop. Should these anticipations be realized, the world is about to eat cheaper bread than has been its portion for many years past. At present prices in this city, flour hardly pays the cost of growing it and sending it to market. Should the European crops prove bountiful, there will be but a slight demand for American breadstuffs in Europe. Our millers, too, by carelessness, dishonesty, and want of skill, allowed the French to obtain a decided preference for them in the English market. But the prospect is, that, besides the large quantity of last year's grain which must come forward in spring, we shall have the same advances, and an immense new crop which will have to be thrown on the market simultaneously with that. This is bad news for the farmer, but glorious prospects for the mechanic. Flour at three dollars a barrel was the usual standard after the discovery of California; but we may live to see it, and that without reaching a very surprising old age.

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION.

NEW YORK with thirty-six millions of specie other United States centres with thirty more, London with ninety odd, Paris with seventy-five; such is the financial return which the bank reports present. It may well be said to be unprecedented. No such spectacle of masses of unemployed bullion has ever been witnessed before in our day.

The cause is obvious; so is the effect. When the revulsion of last fall set in, the commercial world, that world was rushing headlong in a race of enterprise and speculation. Taking this country as a type, we found that it was a period at which more speculative enterprises were on foot, or at which a larger number of enterprises were more adventurously prosecuted. It happened at the time that both our leading products—cotton and breadstuffs—gave a year in which they were richly repaid for their labor. As a natural consequence, our capacity to consume seemed to increase with our activity of production; the more we sold the more we bought; and whereas the extraordinary amount of our exports called the bills prior they commanded, ought to have thrown the balance of trade in our favor, our extravagant consumption of foreign goods left the balance to rank against us. It was in the midst of this fever of speculation and commerce that the ill-judged and premature call for bids for a vast revolution in railway securities brought about the crisis which checks the commercial movement of the last autumn. It is now distant enough to judge it clearly; we can see—as plain as noonday—that it was the cause of the panic, and that it might have been averted had the managers of our financial interests displayed sagacity and prudence.

The revulsion came. It broke two per cent. of the trading firms throughout the country, and overwhelmed thousands with failure. Ninety-eight per cent. of our commercial houses which did not suspend, a very large proportion, indeed, lay saved themselves by the sacrifice of all they had, and nothing more. All lost something; some only a year or two's profits, others their entire capital. Hence arose the panic, the general incapacity and unwillingness to enter into new commercial operations. Those old firms which came through the panic without failure were each other the means not the will to embark in new adventures. The others are fiercely tranquil, and patiently nurse their wrath to keep it warm. Hence the accumulation of specie at the financial centres. Men who were in the habit of carrying about with them and circulating in their business a hundred dollars in specie, now find that ten will amply satisfy their necessities; the balance they lodge in bank. New York, as the healthiest part of the country, commercially speaking, recovers the first; the exchanges turn in her favor, and specie accumulates in her vaults. Where we did, last year, a trade to the extent of a hundred dollars, we are now content with a trade of fifty; the other ninety lies for safety in some well-administered bank.

What is to be the consequence of this? Evidently a sudden, and, we fervently hope, a healthy recovery. The very existence and weekly announcement of the immense specie reserve in the banks are going to stimulate enterprise. Last week the offerings for discount at some of the banks hardly left margin enough for profit to pay expenses of mail and clerk-hire. What can be expected but that the banks will themselves take every means of stimulating wasteful trade, in order to earn dividends? Every calm precedes a storm; every action involves a consequent reaction. As certainly as the native speculation and excessive enterprise of the spring of 1857 involved the revulsion of the fall of that year, so the stagnation and quiet of the present time are certain to give birth, sooner or later, to a period of excitement and inflation corresponding to the material which the bank returns now exhibit.

THE RATIFICATION OF THE YRISSARI TREATY.

We have intelligence from Nicaragua that the Yrissari treaty has been ratified, and that the transit route which has come to seem less than definitely placed under the protection of the United States, that protection, in such an application as this, implies military occupation. The transit route from Greytown to San Juan del Sur—or rather from the Atlantic terminus of the route may be located—can only be efficiently protected by United States soldiers fully armed and operating in company. Nor can this protection be temporary or ephemeral. If the protection is to amount to any thing, the troops must be permanently stationed along the transit line, otherwise they are worse than useless. We feel, therefore, justified in translating the word "ratification" into that of military occupation. By the Yrissari treaty the United States have taken the State of Nicaragua under a military protectorate. If England and France did with regard to Greece, as France did with regard to Rome, as the two powers did with regard to Poland—

The act is, of course, in contravention of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. That ill-advised convention, in the form of which poor Mr. Clayton was sadly overreached by the more astute English diplomatist with whom he had to deal, bilateral has been rendered a dead letter, and, consequently, in addition with the limits of the ancient kingdom of Guatemala, Nicaragua gain on the part of England, as that power was very unlikely to need to acquire territory or to possess herself of the transit route; it was a piece of ridiculous folly on the part of the United States, as the control of a mere intercoceanic transit route was absolutely necessary to the safety of their Pacific possessions: such as it was, however, it was a convention duly ratified, and recognized formally by the national compact of the United States have now, as we see, practically broken the bargain by establishing a military protectorate over the only important portion of Nicaragua.

It remains to be seen whether any diplomatic troubles will grow out of the act. The prevailing opinion seems to be, that a change has come over the spirit of British policy in America within the past few years, and that England will not complain of our securing to the commerce of the world a safe, speedy, and available intercoceanic route. It is said by friends of this new project—the Honduras railway scheme—which we illustrated in No. 64 of this journal, that Great Britain and France will make arrangements with the independent republic of Honduras for the speedy reopening of the Honduras route of that route. If this be so, of course they would have no ground for complaint at our operations in Nicaragua; though it would remain to be seen whether the interests of the United States were compatible with the location of European troops in any Central American State.

The practical result of the ratification of the treaty is the probable reopening of the Transit Route through Nicaragua. This will be hailed as a boon by all who have business with the Pacific States. But the disgust which has been aroused by the trickeries and frauds which have marked the contest of the "steamboat interregnum" for the right of way across Central America, there exists a very strong desire among the public for the opening of a rival to the Nicaragua route. Should the Yrissari treaty leads to the establishment of such a rival route, it will not have been a diplomatic bubble.

ROGERS'S MARINE SIGNALS.

A BILL is pending before Congress to oblige ship-owners to provide their ships with a set of signals invented by a Mr. Rogers, of Baltimore, likewise with a book to be renewed annually, explanatory of these signals. The principle which underlies the bill is quite plain. It is very desirable that all vessels sailing out of United States ports should be able to recognize each other and to communicate by means of signals. This is not now possible for want of a code of uniform signals. Mr. Rogers proposes to supply the deficiency. He goes further, and contemplates the adoption of his system by the Governments of England, France, and other maritime nations. If his scheme could be adopted, and a signal designated for every ship afloat, and every ordinary communication from vessel to vessel, the interests of commerce and navigation would be clearly benefited.

But has Congress authority to vote the entire shipping interest for the benefit of Mr. Rogers? Who is Mr. Rogers that he should pretend to a monopoly of marine signals? Congress assembly should invent a new system of rigging, would Congress be authorized to make its adoption compulsory on shipowners? Or would it be a decided improvement on the old systems? The principle of our legislation—which is opposed to the principle of European legislation—does not contemplate the education, or, as the French call it, the tutorship of the people. Our government leaves the citizen to find out for himself what is best.

If Rogers's system is the best that can be devised—and it may be—Congress may recommend it for general adoption; but we very much question whether a law making its adoption compulsory on shipowners would be held to be constitutional. Mr. Rogers has gone the wrong way to work, and we are not surprised that the British shipowners have already protested against his pretensions.

THE COST OF ROYAL GOVERNMENTS.

WE are fond enough of grumbling at the cost of our Government; it is unbelieving, once in way, to glance at the sums which royal governments cost other neighbors across the water. We note, for instance, that the new budget, which the English Chancellor of the Exchequer has presented to the House of Commons, contemplates an expenditure for one year, of no less a sum than £35,000,000: and this, we are told, is a favorable one, as the estimated receipts for the funds rose as soon as it was announced.

Perhaps it is hardly fair to allude to the private expenses of monarchies, as they may be defrayed out of their private revenues; but as an illustration of the lavish expenditures of courts, we are not debarred from copying the following description of the trousseau of the lady who is about to marry the King of Portugal. We copy from the Paris correspondence of the Times:

"The bridal gifts offered by the young and gallant King Don Pedro to his future Queen will cost, independently of the jewels, 150,000 francs. Of the list of the articles, for the perusal of the ladies: Seven Cashmere shawls, one of them embroidered in gold, and the rest in gold and silver; one of them, the red, embroidered in gold, at 20,000 francs; twelve Indian shawls, in gold, red, and blue, at 10,000 francs each; three French, yellow, at 5,000 francs each; and fifteen of different colors. There are twelve pairs of lace flounces, as follows: One of Brussels, at 30,000 francs; one of old Venetian point, at 25,000; one of Alençon, at 15,000; and a black one of Chantilly, at 20,000 francs. There are twenty-four pocket-handkerchiefs from 200 to 2000 francs each—the former by duchess. There are a hundred dozen pairs of gloves, six dozen of them white, and the six remaining of different colors. There are four Amazon dresses. The riding-whip is a model of beauty. It has head is formed of a large pearl of a bizarre cut, which enters into the combination of a number of gold figures. Each handle is beautifully studded with the arms of the two families, form a part of the magnificent trousseau."

Wonder how much Mrs. Buchanan's trousseau would cost, if such a lady should ever exist.

PERIM, AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

ABOUT a year ago we published in this journal an article reflecting upon the annexation, or rather the seizure, of the island of Perim by the British in the Indian Ocean. That act, which was prompted by some ill-natured suggestions of the London press in reference to our operations in Central America, was taken by us, at that, so long as England continued to appropriate, recklessly, every spot of land which her interests required, it was quite useless for us to reprimand the United States for taking ordinary precautions for the protection of the route between their Atlantic and Pacific territories.

Quite recently the British occupation has acquired a new importance. The French and Austrian Governments are said to be much excited in the opinion that the seizure of that island was a menace to all the European powers having interests in Asia, and a positive infraction of the Treaty of Paris. Perim, which is a barren rock, lying in the mouth of the Bab-el-Mandeb Strait, and is only visited once a year by certain Arab fishermen for the sake of catching turtles, forms the key to the passage between Europe and India and China. The Governments of Russia and France, as it seems, complain that England has stolen a march upon them by seizing this important strategical point, and propose to refer the matter to the Powers which signed the Treaty of Paris.

To all this Great Britain replies, through the Times, that no European Power has any interest either in Egypt or in Asia which can be compared to England's, and, therefore, that England can not be expected to share with any of them the incidental benefits of her commanding position in those regions. She adds that, as the occupation of Perim can, at best, only provoke representations either from the Sultan of Turkey or the Imaum of Muscat, neither France nor Russia can, for a moment, be suffered to discuss the question with England, as they are total strangers to the controversy.

Thus the quarrel stands, and thus it will stand until the new Embassador to England, the Duke of Malakoff, delivers the messages with which he is said to be freighted. So far as precedent is concerned, it would seem that the ground taken by England is untenable. France has quite as much right to interfere, in opposition to the monopoly by England of the overland route to India, as England had to oppose the acquisition by Russia of certain Danubian provinces of Turkey, or as the same Power has to interfere with our regulation of the Transit questions with the Central American Powers. If no nation is entitled to interfere in the private disputes of two of its neighbors, then the whole policy of Great Britain for the past century has been erroneous, and should be atoned for. If, on the contrary, Great Britain has been right in meddling with every acquisition of territory made by every first-class nation during the past century, then France and Russia are justified in demanding explanations about Perim.

Practically, Perim had far better be in the hands of the English than elsewhere. For half a century, at least—perhaps since the deluge—it has been an uninhabited, bleak, barren rock, with no inhabitants but turtles, serpents, and birds of prey. If England occupies it, it will become a useful and important coaling-station for the steam-commerce of the Red Sea. It will become a good stand-point for the cruisers, whose business it is to suppress the piracy which is carried on under shelter of the dominions of the Imaum of Muscat. It will be, in a word, as useful a spot to the commerce of the world as Panama or Aspinwall would become if they belonged to the United States. We shall see whether its destiny is of this character or not.

THE LOUNGER.

PICTURES AGAIN.

MR. GIFFORD is among those who exhibit better pictures in the Academy this year than usual. No. 460, Lake Nemi, is a lovely recollection of one of the loveliest landscapes in Italy. It is full of tenderness and tranquillity, and entirely Italian in its sentiment and impression. One would not soon tire of watching it; and its beauty would steal in unobtrusively upon every mood. There is always in a painting very much more than the mere subject, however skillfully treated. Incidents of life and views of places may be often so rendered as to command our admiration, but we presently exhaust them; we drink the sweet draught, and nothing remains. Hence it was said by a wise man that we can never see a picture but once. Yet there is a power of self-renewal in a really fine work of art. It has the perpetual freshness of Nature. We are never tired of a really beautiful landscape before the window; and no artist has truly painted a great work who has not so treated it that our interest constantly recurs in the contemplation of it. In Mr. Gifford's pictures this year there is a general similarity of color and tone. But his works are thoughtful and careful, and well worthy attention.

The same is true of Mr. Tait, whose sporting scenes are familiar and prized, but whose pictures are peculiarly interesting this season. No. 59, At Home, is a poem. It represents a buck and doe lying in the sweet security of grass, with one fawn near them, and another, exquisitely dappled, browsing at a little distance. It has been suggested that it is hardly true to the fact of natural history to represent the deer father and mother in such an attitude of family repose, for the does and bucks herd separately by themselves. But a painter whose speciality is animals, would surely commit no such impropriety without some good reason for it. Mr. Hays's Scotch Terrier, No. 39, is also capital.

In No. 13, West Canada Creek, Trenton Falls, Mr. Hicks has painted a portrait different from the ones he usually gives us. It is a wonderful piece of clear, daylight effect, with an admirable water perspective; entirely characteristic of the Trenton ravine. The bright, cheerful, American aspect is striking. Soft and beautiful, too, is Mr. Casilear's Lake George, No. 549—equally truthful and characteristic. But while Mr. Hicks's picture seems, so to say, too small for his style, Mr. Casilear's seems too large for his. Mr. Hicks's power is in portraiture of character; Mr. Casilear's in exquisitely delicate, vignette-like sketching. He is like a singer of rural songs, not such as bumpkins shout, but those that poets carol in Arcadia. A dreamy tranquillity of atmosphere, with delicate-hued hills, a thoughtful spire, a gleaming brook—beauty in repose and in detail—these are the subjects in whose delineation Mr. Casilear is so eminently successful.

Mr. W. S. Mount and Mr. F. W. Edmonds exhibit some of their character-pieces. Mr. Mount's "Any Fish to-day?" No. 536, is in his best vein, and Mr. Edmonds's Wind-Mill, No. 232, is as good as usual. In this kind of painting—humorous and characteristic incident—Mr. Blauvelt's Warming up, No. 219, is admirable. It represents a shanty interior—stage-office, groggery, and tavern—with the coachman taking his bitters and the half-frozen passengers warming themselves at a stove. It is thoughtfully elaborated, and has a great deal of humor. But this style requires very great care and talent. It easily degenerates into exaggeration and caricature, and Mr. Blauvelt's success is therefore the more commendable.

And in this style No. 590, "Ars celare Artem," by Mr. Ehninger, is unquestionably the best in the gallery. It is an old story capitally told. In the artist's quaintly-furnished room, while the dragon-papa is closely scrutinizing a picture, sitting comfortably with his back to the young people, the artist himself is gracefully bending over the hand of the fair young daughter. Why he is bending—what he is doing—the old gentleman may discover if he can. He admires greatly the art of the picture—perhaps the young woman does not frown upon the art of the painter.

Another week the Lounger will walk farther and talk more among the pictures.

CASTING PEARLS BEFORE ——.

"MY DEAR MR. LOUNGER,—I came to town with my husband on Wednesday evening to enjoy such a fifty cents' worth as was never given before in any country. Musard's orchestra was to play, under the masterly conduct of Anschütz, Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, and the overtures to King Stephen and the Namensfeyer—never before heard in this country—while Thalberg was to play in a Beethoven concerto for the piano, and Vieuxtemps in another for the violin; and, finally, Musard was to direct polkas, quadrilles, waltzes, and the grand Slambang Galop.

"Now I am not going to complain that people don't like Beethoven's music, nor that such music, with the greatest pianist and the greatest violinist in the world, did not cram the Opera-house; but I am going to complain, as loud as you will let me, that people who do like such music, and who came far to hear it, were not allowed to hear it by those who do not like it, and who had lounged in from some neighboring street. We sat in the balcony; and such scuffling, talking, rustling, tapping, beating time inanely with the feet, and general indifference and indecorous riot, I have never before encountered under similar circumstances.

"Why will not Mr. Napoleon Ullman, as you call him, reserve a few seats in the lower part of the parquette especially for those who want to hear the music? You have had a good deal to say about the Hog family in cars, but do they never go to the Academy? Are you willing to believe that the person (of what sex I forbear, in self-respect, to say) who sat just behind me, and thumped, and banged, and battered through the whole performance, was not a ——? Do you not agree with me that to play such music for such people was to throw pearls before ——?

"I think so, at any rate, and so, you may be sure, does every real lover of music. Please to print this letter for their sakes, and for the love you ought to bear to such human benefactors as the great composers.

"Yours respectfully,
"URANIA RUS."

—The letter of the Lounger's correspondent commends itself to the good sense of every body. He leaves it with but one word: If you, kind reader, who go to concerts, and who care nothing about music, and therefore talk as if you were at a ball, would only reflect that your neighbor, who is very silent and attentively listening, is probably really anxious to hear the music, would you not willingly forego the pleasure of saying nothing to John or Jane, who sits at your elbow, in order that the listener may hear something? If you don't think of it, it is only carelessness, and you can easily correct it. If you do think of it, and don't care—why, to what branch of the Hog family do you belong?

THE ACADEMY OF DISCORD.

MR. NAPOLEON ULLMAN requires a great deal of attention from all the lounging penny-a-liners in town. We have to keep him in full view in order to apprise the public of his varying performances. He has been lately surprising us all by his daring act of management, by which to keep people out and get them in at the same time. As a director of public amusements, he is naturally very anxious that people should come to his theatre; consequently, whoever incites them not to come is an enemy, and must be vanquished.

The principle that "newspaper people" who write about amusements must praise them, or not be admitted, is a dangerous one; for when it is put into practice the public instantly suspects that there was an attempt to make it see or hear something that was not worth seeing or hearing. But it would also seem that a manager has the same rights as other merchants. If Mr. Stewart, who keeps open shop, may decline to sell Mr. Smith a cravat at any price—and who can question his right to refuse—why may not Mr. Napoleon Ullman decline to sell the hearing of a concert at any price to any customer? It may be poor policy, but he must be the judge of that.

Of course, when the reason for refusal is that a notice of the performance was written which displeased the manager, by excluding the writer the manager has harmed himself more than fifty adverse writers could harm him. But still, if he chooses to import Messrs. Thalberg, Vieuxtemps, Formes, and Musard, and light up the Academy for them to play in for his own sole gratification, who has the right to take the law of him so long as he pays his bills? It may prove to be an expensive amusement. But may not managers be eccentric?

DR. MACKAY GOING HOME.

IN Toronto Dr. Mackay had success and a public dinner. Members of Parliament and others attended—the fact was telegraphed—and every body was satisfied. Nobody, certainly, was more satisfied than many a Lounger here and there, who did not know Dr. Mackay, who had never seen him, and who had watched with some regret his career in this country.

The truth is, that a great many foreign notabilities, seeing the success of other notabilities in this country, think they have only to come hither to reap the same harvest of applause. Especially if they have reason to believe themselves popular, they have natural hopes of which the disappointment must be very bitter.

There was the great Tupper—illustrious bard!—who measured off sentimental rhetoric by the yard, called it Proverbial Philosophy, and beheld the enthusiastic American public devour thirty or more editions in beautiful bindings, thinking it to be poetry—or something. Imitating the example of Mr. Dickens, Mr. Tupper naturally crossed the sea to receive the homage of his transatlantic subjects. He arrived in the lower bay, and threw up two sonnets like rockets toward the city. The moment he touched the land he planted his batteries and poured in a merciless broadside of verses and speeches, until his transatlantic subjects were willing to let him depart, and it is owing to his visit that Proverbial Philosophy is now Proverbial nonsense.

It is not surprising that Dr. Mackay should suppose that laurels were growing for him also in America. But he came at an unfortunate season; at a moment when every body was failing and apprehensive; at a season when every kind of public amusement had lost its usual prestige, and when the interest in ballad poetry was even less than usual. Besides this, his personal reputation was not imposing. The song "A good time coming" was well known, and the refrain was a proverb; but the name of the author was not familiar, and there were no particular associations with the name of Charles Mackay.

The consequence was that his visit was not very satisfactory. People did not throng to hear his really excellent lectures upon poetry and poets. The lectures themselves were too quiet for our lecture-taste. They were simple, sensible essays, but we understand by a lecture something different from that. He spoke in a simple, sensible English way, but the Reverend Spurgeon is the man for our money. If he had English good sense he understood the state of the case, and was not troubled. If he had not, there is reason to fear that he did not find Yankee land very lovely.

But in his foreign-native soil of Canada he found a hearty welcome, large audiences, a public dinner, and a serenade. Let us wish him, most sincerely, a prosperous homeward voyage, and hope that his last transatlantic days, and not his first, may color his remembrance of America.

SPRING FASHIONS.

MR. EDWARD COOPER, the new Street Commissioner, has introduced a new style, charming in itself and fascinating from its entire novelty. It will put altogether a new appearance upon our streets, and may make the city positively attractive. The captivating originality of the new fashion consists in the appointment to office of men who are capable of doing the duty of the offices! It is a thing without municipal precedent in the memories of men now living. To what it may lead, who will venture to predict? Who can say that it may not be the beginning of yet greater changes? Will the universal corruption of city politics be safe, in the event of the spreading of such a spirit? May not contracts be given out to the lowest bidders, if this sort of thing is to prevail? May not intelligence and decency gradually make their way into the City Hall? May not the civic government cease to be a by-word and jeer in the mouths of all decent men? Nay, if honesty and capability are to be considered indispensable requisites for municipal offices, have we any guarantee that the city tax will not be frightfully reduced? Is there not danger that, if the Mayor continues his career, it will turn out, as was prophesied, that Tiemann is Theman?

MONSIEUR L'AMBASSADEUR.

WHEN Rubens was Embassador in England some friends came one day into his studio while he was painting, and after complimenting him, said,

"Monsieur the Embassador plays the painter."

"No, gentlemen," replied Rubens, "Monsieur the painter plays the Embassador."

So might the tough old Duke of Malakoff say (whose portrait was in the Weekly of last week), although in another sense. He has crossed over to England as French Minister, surrounded by some of his trusty Crimean officers, and with a hundred thousand dollars a year to spend. But he and each one of his attendants bring with them, in addition, two eyes and one mind apiece, and they can do a great deal of quiet seeing and thinking as they go up and down the land, to the towns on the coast, etc., etc. A false friend is the most dangerous enemy, because you throw your arms wide open to embrace a friend, and the action entirely exposes your breast.

That last observation is a general truism. The Duke of Malakoff may be, in his heart of hearts, the most faithful friend of England. But how interesting, at a moment when the apparently amicable relations of France and England have been almost destroyed, and England is trying persons charged with attempting to murder the French Emperor—how interesting to behold the chief general in the Imperial army, attended by a staff of other generals, land in perfide Albion!

VERY HOT, INDEED!

IT seems difficult to say why a nobleman, because he owns a large telescope, should be supposed capable of seeing farther into a millstone than other people. But there is a great popular faith in telescopes, and a still greater faith in noblemen; so that all the papers in England and America published a statement that Earl Rosse, the proprietor of the famous heavenly spy-glass, had predicted a very hot summer, and advised people to prepare to stall-feed their cattle. Consequently, "many gentlemen" had made such arrangements before they had the satisfaction of reading a note from Lord Rosse, in which he says that, observing "his name is associated with some conjectures as to the approaching season, he begs to say that he has never expressed any opinion on the subject."

What, of course, even had he uttered them, could they be more than conjectures? It only shows that an E. M. is a necessity of modern society. And why do we not hear from that sage? Might not he and Lord Rosse together venture to exhort us to look out for green peas in May, accompanied—under favoring pecuniary circumstances—with salmon?

A WOMAN UPON WOMEN.

MISS MULOCK, the author of "John Halifax," one of the best and most popular of recent novels, has just written a little book, A Woman's Thoughts about Women, which is sure to please almost as many readers as "John Halifax." It is not a "Woman's rights" book, in the sense of the general use of that term. It is a very different performance from Mary Wolstencraft's, on the one hand, and from such young-lady-pattern-mongers as Miss Austen and the earlier women-novelists, on the other. It is, in fact, a simple, healthful, sprightly, and very entertaining and intelligent discussion of the condition of women who are more or less well-to-do, with a careful chapter upon servants, which every sensible serving-woman would help herself by reading.

Miss Mulock's theory of the question is that women are to take care of the house; and if (as has been known sometimes to happen) they have no house to take care of, then they are to be kind, and patient, and full of good works. They are not to waste their time, nor be extravagant, nor frivolous, nor think it "lady-like" to be incompetent and imbecile, nor spoil their children, nor exasperate their husbands, nor wish to vote, or practice any profession, nor be thoughtless of their dependents, nor selfish in any way; in short, Miss Mulock accepts "the sphere of women" as it is generally understood, and wants them to make the best of it.

Her suggestions are no less valuable in this country than in England, although the book was written with especial reference to the state of English society. Any one who had thought very earnestly upon the subject, however, would hardly be satisfied either with her premises or conclusions. But every one must hail with hearty welcome a word spoken so clearly and strongly—if not very profoundly—for "Heaven's last best gift to man."

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—MR. BEN LOPER is a poet whose legs appear to sympathize, in an unpleasant manner, with the season. He declares that

"Though ten thousand poets rise
To praise the name of spring,
There's jaundice in my mind and legs,
And that's all I can sing."

And he incontinently does sing it in many stanzas such as these:

"'The flowers!' The first I set my eye on
Is the yellow dandelion,
But 'tis sweeter than sweet candies,
If 'twill cure the jaundice!

"Though birds get mated and get animated,
I shall not fall in love while thus I'm fated—
Such lifeless legs and body sickly,
Would fall into a ditch more likely!

"What cares man for melodious strains
Among the limbs, when he complains
Of strains in his own limbs abundant,
And, perhaps, somewhat redundant?

"As long as I am sick, I sha'n't
The same time be a sycophant.
Old Winter is more mild than Spring is—
He relieves me of the jaundice."

Mr. Ben Loper has one consolation—that his jaundice can not be better—or worse, than his poetry.

—THE SEAMSTRESS is a poem not so good, but of the same kind as Hood's Song of the Shirt. The Lounger believes that his readers would thank him more for reprinting that, than for giving them what must necessarily suggest it. Does not the author agree?

—TOMBSTONE wishes to know the name of the author of an article in an old number of Harper's Magazine. Does he not reflect that if the names of authors are not published, it is because they themselves wish them to remain unknown?

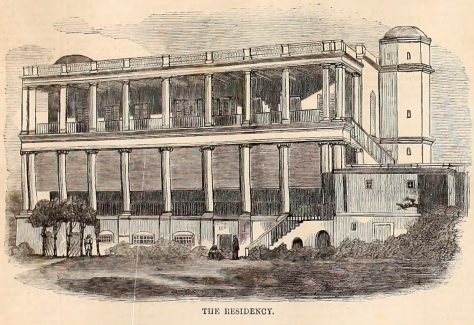
—ELEANOR T., being evidently a woman, has a woman's natural curiosity, and inquires:

"What is the reason, pray tell me, dear Lounger, that the newspapers which are so eloquent upon the subject of a woman's duty to her husband, never mention the possibility of deficiency on the part of the husband? Is it because the men have taken all the rights, and assigned to woman—'lovely woman'—all the duties? Reading these newspaper admonitions, one would suppose a woman to be an article kept for ornament and to enliven and adorn the leisure moments of man, instead of her being, as she nearly always is, the sharer of his burdens (besides bearing a great many of her own which he can not share). What right has a husband to expect always a smiling face, when his poverty requires of his wife the performance at once of the services of cook, washer and ironer, and housekeeper, 'of the peculiar duties of a mother,' the handicraft of tailor, dressmaker, and seamstress in general. Add to this her compliance 'with the requirements of social life,' and her rôle of actress—for must not a woman be somewhat of an actress when she is called upon suddenly to exchange her kitchen-attire and brow of care for company-dress and company-smiles?"

Eleanor T. also proposes that young men and women be set up in housekeeping before they are allowed to be engaged; that the young woman shall wash and mend and dust, and that a new-born infant be procured from the hospital, and that she have the charge of him in addition to the rest of her duties. She is of opinion that this process would "disenchant" the young couple! Cruel, cruel Eleanor T.! Suppose every young couple in the world were thus previously "disenchanted!"

THE FINAL CAPTURE OF LUCKNOW.

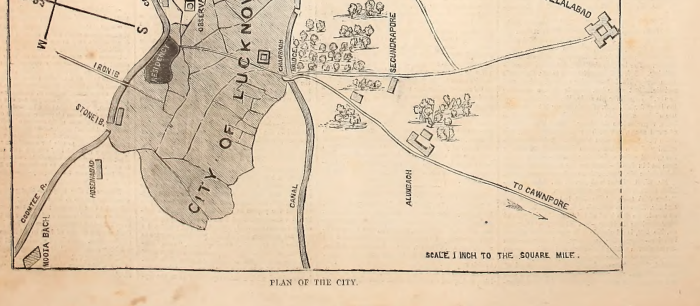
For the third time since the Indian war broke out Lucknow has become a centre of interest. In No. 54 of this journal we presented the reader with three views of conspicuous parts of the city, designed to illustrate the relief of the Residency by the famous Havelock. We now give four pictures, two of them representing general views of the city, another the Residency, which was defended at such cost by the gallant garrison under Inglis, and another, the Martinière College, which was one of the chief points of resistance in the late attack. We also subjoin a plan of the city, which will be of peculiar interest to the students of Sir Colin Campbell's attack; and in this connection we recommend our readers to study the news which is given on page 295.



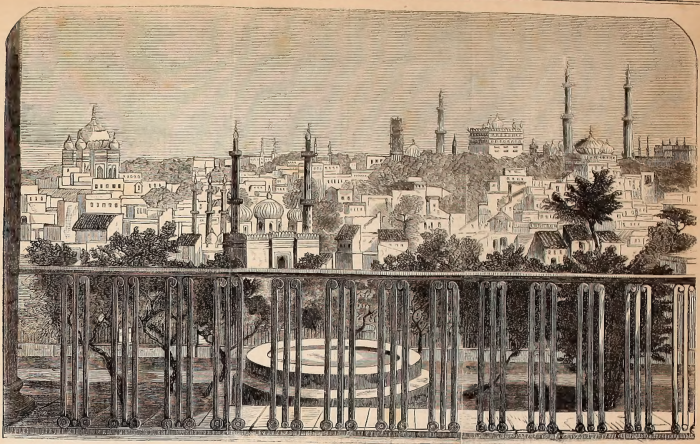
We may recapitulate here the principal facts in relation to Lucknow. It is a large city—one of the largest in Northern India—at the Goomtee, a considerable confluent of the Ganges. About a century since it became the capital of the kingdom of Oude, and continued to be the seat of Government until the East India Company annexed Oude to their dominions. Its population is variously estimated at from two to three hundred thousand souls. The city, which covers more ground than its population warrants, consists of equal parts of palaces and hovels. Some of the finest residences in India—with parks, ponds, summer and winter houses, and even menageries—are in the heart of the city of Lucknow. The palace of the Begum, the British Residency, and several other edifices, are cities in themselves. But beside these there are streets in Lucknow as narrow as any in Genoa or Florence, and built up on either side with the meanest and cheapest kind of buildings. Squalid poverty and luxurious ease repose side by side, as is usually the case in countries where democracy is unknown.

The heat of the summer is so intense at Lucknow that most of the houses have a large underground apartment, where the women, and not unfrequently the men, seek shelter from the noonday sun. Like Delhi, it is exposed to severe winds, like the breath of a furnace, and bearing with them clouds of heated dust. When these winds blow the only tolerable spot is the underground chamber. For several months of the year the gay ladies of the dissipated King's harem resided almost entirely in these luxurious retreats.

These peculiarities of the construction of the city will explain many features of the military operations of which Lucknow has been the theatre. For instance,



THE MARTINIÈRE.



THE RESIDENCY.

the loss which Havelock's corps suffered on their terrible march through the city to relieve the Residency was due to the narrowness of the streets. Every house was a masked battery from which cowardly Sepoys poured showers of balls upon the assailants. Nothing but the imminent peril in which Inglis and his garrison stood could have justified Havelock in attempting to enter the city with so small a force as he led. Again, the chief trouble of the Residency garrison was the incessant alarm from mines. Not a week passed but they discovered some mine or other running under their walls. These mines were sure sallies starting from the underground chambers of rich men's dwellings. To a people accustomed to subterranean retreats the idea of mines would occur naturally; the character of the soil favored them. The Sepoys were so craven-hearted that they never could storm the Residency, though time and again they made breaches wide enough for a storming party; but under cover and under ground they were valorous enough.

Lucknow should be rendered peculiarly interesting to us by the fact that two of the soldiers whose names are inseparably connected with its defence are those of persons born on American soil. The heroic commander of the garrison, Colonel Inglis, is the grandson of a well-known rector of Trinity Church, New York, and was himself born in Nova Scotia. The people of that Province have lately done honor to themselves by voting him a sword in testimony of their sense of his gallant behavior. He, like Sir W. Williams of Kars, has shed lustre on the British North American Colonies, and the people of those colonies will do well to keep their history before the eyes of their young men. Another native American, who unfortunately lost his life in the terrible assault of Lucknow under Havelock, was Lieutenant Edmond Joly de Lotbinière, a Canadian, who belonged to the British 32d Regiment. He was a youth of extraordinary personal beauty and remarkable promise. Not many months before his death he was in New York. He had served throughout the campaign in the Crimea as a volunteer, and had marvelously escaped unharmed. In conversation with a friend here, on the subject of his approaching departure for India, he exclaimed, "You are wrong in supposing that I am going to lead an idle life. I have such luck that there is sure to be something to do wherever I go." The prediction was too true; the gallant young soldier, a volunteer under Havelock, was struck by a cannon-ball almost within sight of the Residency of Lucknow, and died in the arms of his comrades, in the hour of the relief of the garrison.

The history of the last operations at Lucknow may be given in a few words. Of all the rebels against British authority the men of Oude were the only ones who deserved serious consideration. They were physically superior to any other race of Northern India, and had proved a turbulent and ambitious democracy under their own sovereign. They had frequently expressed to Colonel Sleeman their desire to be rid of the control of the imbecile and dissipated monarch who ruled them; yet it was the opinion of that experienced and sagacious officer that they were not fully prepared to acquiesce in European domination. Events justified his views. When the East India Company resolved on the annexation of Oude, the natives submitted reluctantly, and under protest; and at the first news of the conspiracy against their foreign masters they sympathized with the conspirators, and availed themselves of the first opportunity to become leading actors in the drama. Their brethren, who composed the best part of the Bengal army, were glad to return home on their disbandonment, and became speedily enrolled in new regiments under native chiefs. These, reinforced by fugitives from the northwest provinces on the one side, and from the opposite border of the Ganges on the other, formed the chief body of insurgents, and, after the fall of Delhi, made Lucknow the real centre of the mutiny. They imprisoned the garrison in the Residency, and besieged them for nearly three months. Relief by Havelock merely added a few more probable victims to those whose fate seemed hopeless before. Sir Colin Campbell rescued them from the jaws of death. But it was not till February last that a substantial attack, in accordance with military rules, was made upon the garrison of Lucknow. The details of that attack will be given hereafter. For the present we must be content with the brief telegraphic dispatches, which are to the following effect:

"BOMBAY, March 24, 3 P.M.

"Lucknow fell on the 19th; 117 guns captured; about 2000 of the enemy were slain during the siege. Mrs. Orr and Miss Jackson rescued. Eight officers killed. The townspeople and the villagers being protected, are resuming their occupations. The submission of the principal landholders has been accepted. About 50,000 of the enemy have escaped, making for Bahraich and Bundelcund. The army is in pursuit of the rebels.

"The delay of Sir H. Rose's force for three weeks at Sangor prevented the line of troops, intended to intercept the enemy, from being closed up. Sir H. Rose, with a division of the Rajpootana field force, was within twenty-five miles of Jhansi on the 21st of March. Thirty thousand rebels are said to be in his front.

"General Roberts's force marched from Nusseerabad to Kotah on the 10th and 11th. The distance is 120 miles. The Calpee mutineers have taken the fort of Churh[illegible], and made the Rajah prisoner. Whitlock's force remains in charge of Saugor, the cavalry only having pushed on to Allahabad. Stewart's brigade captured Chunderee on the 17th."

The following telegram has been received at the India House:

"TO J. D. DICKINSON, ESQ., INDIA HOUSE.

"Lucknow was completely occupied on the 17th of March (? 19). On that date the sixth (the last) post of the enemy in the Moosabagh was captured. The enemy had retreated northward. The cavalry is in pursuit. 117 guns have been taken. Captain Mitchell and Lieutenant Boole, of the Artillery, with a party of Ghoorkas, have rescued Mrs. Orr and Miss Jackson. The ladies had been protected by Meer Valeed Alby Derejal, and had been well treated by him. The restoration of authority in the city has been commenced, and great efforts are in progress for reassuring the population, which had fled in great numbers to the neighboring villages."

A telegraphic dispatch from the Malta correspondent of the London Times says: "The news from Lucknow is to the 19th March. The whole of the town is in our possession. Major Hodson killed; Sir William Peel wounded. Mrs. Orr and Miss Jackson were brought into Jung Bahadoor's camp unharmed. The commander-in-chief remains at Lucknow, restoring quiet and organizing the garrison. Fugitives from Oude to the eastward are threatening Goruckpore; the 13th Regiment was moved thither from Azimghur. Sir Hugh Rose's first brigade stormed Chansaree (?) on the 17th. General Roberts hoped to be before Kotah shortly, and, if the enemy showed signs of resisting, to open trenches on the 24th. The disarmament of Ouzerat was proceeding most satisfactorily."

LITERARY.

MR. CURTIS'S History of the Constitution is now completed by the publication of the second volume. (Harper & Brothers.) The accomplished author has proved for once the error in the statement that contemporary history can not be impartial; for this may certainly be called contemporary, though the men who were actors in it are mostly gone to be part of the dust of the land they blessed. He has not only written the history, but he has written it calmly, dispassionately, as one might have written it a hundred years hence, looking back to the formation of the American Constitution from the position it will then occupy. There is a coolness, a deliberation of thought, which is admirable as well as surprising when we remember the conflicting opinions, the heat of debate, and political discussion with which the author has been surrounded for some years past. It is certainly a curiosity of literature, the production, in this day, during the Pierce and Buchanan Administration, of an impartial history of the Constitution.

Ardent politicians, on all sides, may find lacking here the material to sustain their own peculiar notions, and be disappointed that Mr. Curtis fails to show the Constitution founded in the design to perpetuate this or that principle, but the reasonable mind of every intelligent man will yield to the calm certainty of the reasoning before him, and we apprehend that none, of whatever party or clan, will find fault with his views after a deliberate examination of them.

The second volume, now issued, is devoted to the history of the formation and adoption of the Constitution. It is a chapter of most absorbing interest to Americans, nor can any one fully appreciate the magnificence of its structure until he shall have accompanied Mr. Curtis through his analysis of the component parts, and his account of the method of putting them together.

The convention which was gathered for its construction was such an assembly as the world had never seen. Up to that period a national Constitution had been a growth of years, lifetimes, centuries. The British Constitution—the boast, then, of civilized Europe—was the slow accumulation of long periods, the accretion of time. It was, as it now is, a great fabric, but parts of it were old and weak, parts heavy and unwieldy, parts stiff and inflexible. The executive arm was—what we have all seen it in the conduct of the Eastern war—a bundle of red tape for sinews, and a mass of old notions for nerves. The weight necessary for a heavy blow was there indeed, but the machinery to move the blow was next to useless. There was no model in England on which to found a Constitutional Government, nor was there a precedent in the world's history which could guide the founders of the American Confederation. Here was a noble work for noble men, and the history of their accomplishment of this work is therefore one of the grandest stories among the lives of nations.

Let it be read in every house in the land. Let children study it, that they may grow up to honor and love it. Let fathers read it to their households, that the day may be far distant, which disorganizers and fanatics so earnestly wish to hasten, when this glorious Constitution shall be numbered among the shattered relics of old times, a curiosity of the past, to be gazed at by idle boys, laughed at by radicalists, mourned over by the devout lovers of all that is good and holy. We commend the study of Mr. Curtis's work to all who love their country and desire its permanent prosperity.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, 26th April, in the Senate, after some business of minor importance, the question of the embassy to Paraguay was taken up, and speeches in defense of Lopez were made by Senators Mallory and Simmons, and against him by Senator Mason. On motion of Senator Green, the Report of the Kansas Conference Committee was then taken up, and a protracted discussion held thereon by Senators Stuart, Crittenden, Douglas, Toombs, Pugh, Seward, Bayard, Cameron, Green, Johnson, Clark, and others. The Senate adjourned without taking a vote.——In the House, Mr. Quitman unsuccessfully attempted to introduce a resolution concerning the admission of new States. The question before the House being on the postponement of the Kansas question till May, remarks were made by Messrs. Marshall, Stephens, Stanton, Grow, Harris, and others, after which the motion to postpone till May was disagreed to by 104 to 100. The Deficiency Bill was reported back to the House with the Senate amendments. Mr. Spinner then began to read extracts from a newspaper assailing Senator Bright in connection with the Council Bluffs purchase, but was stopped by the Chair. The conduct of Senator Bright was justified by Mr. Hughes. After some discussion the House adjourned.

On Tuesday, 27th, in the Senate, the Report of the Kansas Conference Committee was taken up, and speeches thereon were made by Senators Crittenden, Hunter, Collamer, Hale, Wade, Green, and Seward; no vote was taken.——In the House, majority and minority Reports from the Fort Snelling Committee were presented. Mr. Hughes moved a vote of censure on Mr. Spinner for his attack on Senator Bright. Speeches on the question were made by Messrs. Hughes, Campbell, Giddings, English, and Spinner; after which the whole subject was tabled. The House then went into Committee of the Whole on the subject of pensions to soldiers of 1812; speeches were made by Messrs. Curry, Clark, Anderson, Curtis, and Quitman, but no vote was taken.

On Wednesday, 28th, in the Senate, the Kansas Report was taken up, and speeches were made by Senators Stuart, Pugh, and Doolittle.——In the House, a resolution was adopted for printing one-third fewer copies of the Patent Report than formerly. A resolution was adopted from the Post-office Committee appointing the Postmaster-general, the Attorney-general, and the Secretary of the Treasury a committee to settle the Post-office in Philadelphia. The Senate Bill for the payment of the expenses of the Utah Courts was passed. The Kansas Report was then taken up, and speeches made by Messrs. Howard, Davis, Stephens, Bingham, Clingman, Marshall, Garnett, and others.

On Thursday, 29th, in the Senate, a Committee of Conference was appointed to settle the differences between the Senate and the House on the Deficiency Appropriation Bill. The Kansas Conference Committee's Report being then taken up, speeches were made by Senators Douglas, Toombs, Brown, Green, Wilson, Bell, Seward, and others.——In the House, the Report of the Kansas Conference Committee was considered, and speeches were made by Messrs. Cox, Marshall, Lawrence, Sherman, Giddings, and others. Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, moved to lay the report on the table; negatived by 113 to [illegible]. Further discussion as to the day on which the vote should be taken ensued between Messrs. Jones, Garnett, Seward, Harris, Wright, Bonham, Phillips, Millson, and Quitman; but the House adjourned without deciding the question.

On Friday, 30th, in the Senate, Senator Houston moved to take up his resolution in relation to a Mexican Protectorate, which, after speeches in opposition by Senators Wilson and Mason, was tabled. The Kansas Conference Committee's Report was then taken up, and speeches made by Senators Broderick and Seward; after which the Report was adopted by 30 to 22. On motion of Senator Hunter the Senate receded from its amendments on the Deficiency Bill.——In the House, the Kansas Report was taken up, and speeches were made by Messrs. Clark, Bryan, Shorter, Campbell, Haskin, Cox, and others, after which the question was put, and the Report of the Conference Committee was adopted by 112 to 103. Mr. English moved to reconsider the vote, and to lay that motion on the table; agreed to by 113 to 100. After some personal explanations the House adjourned till Monday.

THE REPORT OF THE FORT SNELLING COMMITTEE.

The report of the majority of the Select Committee on the facts and circumstances attending the sale of Fort Snelling says that the sale was effected with such privacy, that outside of the Secretary of War none but the combination immediately interested had any knowledge of it, and that the facts obtained publicity only after the confirmation of the sale by the Secretary of War; that no special authority was given him to sell, nor did existing laws confer the power to sell military posts or reservations until they had already become useless, and not merely contemplated to become useless; that this legal occasion for the sale of Fort Snelling had not occurred, and hence was without legal authority; and that the preliminaries for the sale were being made while there were actual and threatened hostilities. The Committee show the value of the Fort as a dépôt, and that the price paid for it was below its intrinsic value, and say that publicity for the sale ought to have been sought and the land subdivided in parcels to enable men of small means to buy, and that the sale on credit was not authorized by law. The report is signed by Messrs. Morrill of Vermont; Pettet of Indiana, and Morris of Illinois, and concludes with resolutions that the sale of the military post of Fort Snelling, and so much of the reservation attached to it as was necessary for military purposes, made on the 6th of June, 1857, under the authority of the Secretary of War, was without the authority of law, and that the sale was and is now void. The minority of the Committee justify the sale.

HOW NEW STATES SHOULD HEREAFTER BE ADMITTED.

The bill which Mr. Quitman endeavored to introduce in the House sets forth that it is unwise, impolitic, and unjust to existing States to prematurely or hastily admit new States, thereby unduly stimulating the occupation of distant vacant Territories by forced and unnatural migration for political, partisan, and sectional purposes, producing strife and discord between different portions of the Union, and leading to corrupt political combinations in Congress. In order to correct these evils and give timely notice of the line of policy which will hereafter be pursued, the bill provides that no new States shall be admitted into the Union until it is ascertained by a census taken by the authority of Congress that the Territory asking admission contains a population sufficient for a representative to Congress, nor until the people have been authorized by Congress to hold a convention to frame a constitution and present the same to Congress.

THE PROPOSED BANKRUPT LAW.

The Herald correspondent writes: "Mr. Toombs's Bankrupt law is being actively considered by the Judiciary Committee, and it will probably be presented to the Senate early next week. It is understood it will be a general bill, including individuals, corporations, chartered banks, and any association of persons authorized to issue notes, bills, etc. It will provide for voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, and will be retroactive. The retroactive feature will be guarded so as to exclude all who, subsequent to January last, or any other time, have made assignments, in contemplation of the passage of a bankrupt law, which gave preference to one creditor over another, and the bankrupt in such cases shall not receive a discharge unless with the consent of a majority of his creditors who have not been so preferred. The involuntary bankruptcy applies to cases where the debts exceed two thousand dollars, and the person declared bankrupt is entitled to trial by jury—all transfers of property of any kind, for the purpose of giving any creditor, indorser, or other person any preference or priority over general creditors, to be null and void, and the parties obtaining them to be sued for such amount as assets of the bankruptcy. With regard to banks and other issuers of paper money, they are to come under the head of involuntary bankrupts; and, in addition to all the liabilities which attach to individuals, they may be declared bankrupt for the non-payment for ten days after demand of any bill, note, or other liability—all the expenses of proceedings to be paid by the parties interested, and under no pretense to be paid by the United States. These are the general features of the bill, we believe. It is to go into effect next November if now passed.

THE REINFORCEMENTS FOR THE UTAH ARMY.

The Leavenworth correspondent of the St. Louis Republican says that the Peace Commissioners, Messrs. M'Cullough and Powell, left for Utah on the 25th, with an escort of six men.

The Herald correspondent writes from Fort Leavenworth as follows, under date of 21st April:

"The main body of reinforcements, composed of the First cavalry and Sixth and Seventh Regiments of infantry, will probably not take up the advance till about the 15th proximo—perhaps not so soon, unless Congress is more speedy in supplying the sinews of war. There is no doubt but the messenger dispatched in hot haste a few days ago, carries instructions to General Johnston to suspend his advance till the arrival of the aforesaid Commissioners; and there is scarce a doubt, also, but what he will reach him in time.

"Officers of all corps and arms are concentrating here, some of whom take advantage of affairs to pursue scientific objects, preparing for future generations some further information concerning the vast plains and uplands stretching far away toward the setting sun. For many years the army has been engaged in this work, as the public records will testify, though under such restrictions as to still leave the work far from complete."

He gives the following table of the reinforcements going out this spring:

	Officers.	Men.
Light batteries of artillery	12	256
Foot artillery	40	800
Cavalry	40	900
Infantry	60	1400
Sappers and ordnance men	5	100
Total reinforcement of regular troops	157	3456
Force already in Utah	15	1989
Total grand aggregate	252	5445

PERSONAL.

Robert J. Walker is said to be in favor of the English Compromise Kansas Act.

Miss Teresa Esmonde has delivered a remarkable lecture on Irish poetry before a large audience in Mozart Hall.

The court-martial on General Twiggs reassembled on 29th ult. at 11 o'clock, at Newport Barracks, Cincinnati, General Jesup presiding. General Twiggs objected to Colonel Fontleroy's sitting as a member of the Court, on account of former differences between them. The latter said the differences had been long since discarded, but asked permission to withdraw, which was granted. The balance of the day was occupied in the examination of testimony.

The Court closed its session on 30th, but the decision will not be known until it has been transmitted to the War Department.

The Richmond Enquirer publishes the terms of negotiation between Mr. John A. Washington, the proprietor of Mount Vernon, and the Ladies' Mount Vernon Association of the Union. They are, the payment of $200,000 for two hundred acres of land, in which are included Washington's residence and tomb, and the landing-place: $18,000 of this sum were paid on the closing of the contract, and the remainder of the contract price is to be paid in four yearly installments. Mr. Washington, however, will allow interest upon any sums, not less than $5000, that may be paid before the bonds are due; and he retains the title to and possession of the estate until principal and interest are paid, except that, in case the whole amount is paid by the 22d of February, 1859, he will forego interests on the first year's payment, due in January, 1859. At the earnest solicitation of Mr. Everett and other friends, the "Southern Matron" has signed her baptismal name to the document announcing these facts. It is Ann Parmela Cunningham.

The Cincinnati Gazette says: "Some weeks since the Rev. John Lyon, a clerical gentleman of ability and attainments, teacher in a high school at Kirkwood, Missouri, became extraordinarily absorbed in religious exercises. These he so imprudently protracted as, by excessive fasting and unintermitting vocal prayer, gradually to destroy both his health and his sanity. His friends found it requisite to subject him to salutary restraint and to medical treatment, and therefore placed him in the Sisters' Hospital in St. Louis. There he soon grew violent, smashed the glass windows of his cell, and had to be pinioned and bound down. On Tuesday last it was concluded to convey him to the asylum for the insane at Fulton. Partly by stratagem, and partly by persuasion, the removal was quietly effected. He is single—aged about thirty-three years. At present he appears to be chiefly apprehensive that during the interruption of his prayers Providence will not take proper care of the world."

A. B. Moore, Governor of Alabama, has appointed delegates from each county of that State to attend the Southern Convention, to be held at Montgomery on the second Monday in May. Among the delegates are ex-Governors John A. Winston, C. C. Clay, and R. Chapman, Senator Fitzpatrick, and ex-Senator Bagby.

A letter from Bay St. Louis, in Mississippi, to the New Orleans Picayune, mentions the death of the Hon. S. B. Pierce, of Mississippi, by an accident. He was at Augusta, Perry County, attending court, and had been induced to accompany a party of gentlemen on a deer-drive. While in the woods his horse took fright, ran, and stumbled, when Mr. Pierce's gun, being at half-cock, was discharged, the contents passing through his thigh. The femoral artery was torn away, and the wounded man bled to death.

The Evansville Journal narrates an instance of sad reverse of fortune. One of the Green River packets recently put off. on a wharf-boat at that city, a poor, afflicted man, over eighty years of age. He was blind from cancer in the eye, and one of his legs was paralyzed; and utterly destitute, helpless, and apparently friendless, he lay upon the wharf-boat from Saturday evening until Sunday afternoon of last week, when Dr. Hallock prevailed on an old negro nurse to take him into her hut and provide what necessaries were in her power for him. The old man died on Thursday, and was buried by one of the charitable associations of the city. Among his effects were papers showing his name to be Dr. John Pocock Holmes, a member of the London College of Surgeons, together with a great number of letters from very distinguished men of science in London and elsewhere, proving the deceased to have been one of the most eminent men of his profession. The sum of $250 was found on his person, which seems to be all the property he had. The Journal says he was evidently a man of correct habits and great intelligence.

The Union says: "We understand that Señor Doctor Mariano de Briceño, who, for a short time, has resided in this city in the character of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Venezuela, yesterday took leave of the President for the purpose of returning home.

The Abingdon Virginian says that Honorable Fayette M'Mullen, Governor of Washington Territory, has obtained a divorce from his wife in the courts there, and intends returning to Virginia the coming summer, and settling in the county of Scott or Smythe.

Several of the former parishioners of the Rev. Dudley A. Tyng, in Cincinnati, met at Christ Church last week, to express their sympathy with his bereaved family, and their sense of the loss to the Church. The Rev. Dr. Butler presided.

Horace Mann, President of Antioch College, and Prof. Read, of the Wisconsin State University, have been elected as the Western lecturers before the National Teachers' Association, which meets at Cincinnati in August.

Colonel William Bent, of Bent's Fort, in Kansas Territory, on the head-waters of the Arkansas, about sixty miles from the Rocky Mountains, is now in Washington. Colonel B. has been noted in connection with the affairs of the frontier for thirty years past.

The authorities of Washington having been informed that a duel was on the tapis between a brother of Peter G. Washington, formerly an auditor in the Treasury Department, and a nephew of Governor Wise, caused both of the parties to be arrested last evening, by which procedure the contemplated duel was frustrated.

The Albany Evening Journal says: The trial of Ira Stout and his sister for the murder of her husband, unfolds a sickening chapter in the history of human depravity. Nothing more revolting was ever disclosed or imagined in the annals of the oldest cities or among the vilest of their festering population.

Stout, Ira's father, and the head of this family, has been several times convicted of offenses which consigned him as often to the State prison. The younger members, male and female, prowled for years about the country, indulging in degrees of crime and all descriptions of vice, until the group drew together and settled themselves down at Rochester, where the murdered man, Charles W. Littles, married Sarah, who had then or has since, become Ira's paramour. Littles's character may be inferred from his associations. There were frequent and bitter quarrels between Littles and his wife. Ira inflamed him by charges implicating her with other men, and finally, as is supposed, he was decoyed to Falls Fields the night of the murder, under a pretext that his wife had an assignation at that place. When there Stout, armed with a club for the purpose, killed him; and when, aided by his sister, he was dragging the dead or dying man to the precipice, all three went over it together. They fell twenty feet, and then were precipitated nearly a hundred feet more down a steep bank, breaking each an arm in the fall. What an appalling scene of crime and punishment! And yet, thus maimed, the wife of the murdered man assisted her own brother to cast the body into the river, when they returned to their guilty and degraded home, bruised and bloody, to pass a night of inexpressible horror. Truly 'the way of the transgressor is hard.'"

Major Gaines and Major Sherman, U. S. A., arrived in St. Louis on the 26th ult.

Mayor Wood, of Trenton, N. J., has resigned his office, and F. S. Mills has been elected in his place.

Vice-President Breckinridge was at Lexington, Kentucky, on the 24th ult.

Hon. W. A. Richardson, Governor of Nebraska Territory, arrived at Omaha City on the 13th ult.

At a church meeting in one of the "fashionable orthodox churches" in Anderson County, Kentucky, last week, a clergyman asked for and obtained a letter of dismission for himself and some of the members of his family. He then said, that if any of the brethren had any thing to say about him, to "now declare it, or ever after hold their peace." Whereupon another preacher said something which was not heard by all the congregation, but the lie passed between them. The preacher who called for the letter drew back his fist and struck the other preacher a heavy blow and then commenced kicking him. He kicked him so hard that he demolished his boot. The defendant, being a "non-resistant," made no defense, but went before a magistrate and made complaint. The assailant was fined ten dollars and costs, and submitted, besides, to a long lecture from the Court. A correspondent of the Louisville Democrat, in giving an account of the affair, says: "The pugnacious divine is a good-looking man, of fine talents, great pulpit orator, with prepossessing manners. The fight has raised his standing among his brethren. Some of the members of a neighboring church have sent him word, if he will go to their next church meeting and whip their preacher, they will pay the fine that is now against him, and any other one that may be imposed on him."

Captain Joshua Sands, lately in command of the United States frigate Susquehanna, reached his home at Stratford, Connecticut, on Saturday, the 24th instant, to the great delight of his relatives and numerous acquaintances. A salute of one hundred guns was fired in his honor during the evening, and the Captain assured the assembled people that it sounded more gratefully to his ear than any salute he had been ever previously honored with. He promised his friends a present in the shape of a large cannon taken in the Mexican war and now his property. After partaking of refreshments at his house, a large party wished him health and a long life and retired.

The Providence (Rhode Island) republicans have nominated ex-Governor Hoppin to fill a vacant seat in their State Senate.

The Washington correspondent of the Boston Traveler, in speaking of Colonel Orr, relates the following incident which transpired when Governor Banks occupied the chair:

"This reminds me of an incident of Preston S. Brooks, which is little known. During Governor Banks's administration as Speaker, on one day when debate ran high, Mr. Brooks persisted in making a statement when out of order. The Speaker said, in a calm voice, 'The gentleman is out of order;' but he continued speaking. 'The gentleman from South Carolina is out of order,' said the Speaker, in a voice that rang through the hall like a clarion; but Mr. Brooks continued speaking. Now the Speaker sprang to his feet, his gavel fell with a resounding clash down upon the brazen rail of the desk, and the echoes of the old hall were awakened by the sound as he said, 'The Sergeant-at-Arms will arrest the member from South Carolina.' Mr. Brooks dropped instantly into his seat a dead-weight, leaving a word half uttered. There was a death-like stillness in the House for a second, when the ball was set in motion by the Speaker calmly saying, 'The gentleman from Ohio has the floor.'"

The Quindaro (Kansas) Chindowan, of the 16th, says: "On Tuesday, the redoubtable Colonel Titus made an unprovoked assault upon General S. C. Pomroy, of Atchison. The circumstances, as nearly as we can arrive at them, are these: General Pomeroy had gone to Kansas City to attend a suit at law, as agent of the Emigrant Aid Society, and was coming out of the court-room, in company with the officers of the Court and others, when Titus approached and struck him on the neck with a club. The General threw up his arm to ward off the blows, and received a severe wound on the arm."

The will of the late Commodore Perry was lately admitted to probate in the Surrogate's office. In accordance with the wish of the executors the will was not among those of which copies could be taken for publication. It is stated that the items are only interesting to the relatives.

The first school taught in Chicago was opened in the fall of 1816, by William L. Cox, a discharged soldier of the last war. The High School was established in 1856. Now there are in the city seventy-nine teachers employed in the Public Schools.

The Cleveland Herald announces the continued existence of the Free-Love Water Cure at Berlin Heights, Ohio. It has about forty inmates, men and women, who live in perfect defiance of all decency and religion, regardless of marriage ties, and in accordance with their detestable system of "Free Love." They publish a Free-Love organ.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

ON 19th, in the House of Commons, Mr. Disraeli made his financial statement. He estimated the ordinary expenditures of the war at £63,600,000; but as £2,000,000 of Exchequer bills were falling due, and £1,500,000 had to be paid as sinking fund toward the war debt, the total expenditure would amount to £67,100,000; being about £4,000,000 in excess of the estimated revenue.

On 20th, in the Commons, Mr. Roebuck said he intended to ask the Government if they meant to proceed with the conspiracy indictment against Dr. Bernard. A motion for leave to bring in a bill limiting Parliament to three years was defeated by 197 majority.

In reply to a question from Mr. Ewart whether advantage would be taken of the opportunities afforded by the negotiations with the Chinese Government at Pekin for opening up commerce with Thibet and other countries under the Chinese dominions beyond the Himalayas, Mr. Disraeli stated that no negotiations were going on with the Court of Pekin at present, but when communications did take place, England would act in conjunction with the other powers, and lose no opportunity of assisting the extension of commerce.

There has been a debate on the Passport System, in the course of which both the Earls of Malmesbury and Clarendon denounced the system as foolish and unnecessary, and the former announced measures to make it as light a burden to the English citizens as possible.

ARRIVAL OF THE DUKE OF MALAKOFF.

The Duke of Malakoff, the new Embassador from France to England, landed at Dover on the 15th, and met with a civic and military reception. Three guards of honor were on duty. In response to an address from the Corporation of Dover, he said that nothing could have afforded him greater pleasure than the appointment which had been conferred upon him, and it would be his earnest desire to preserve those cordial relations which have hitherto existed between France and England. The Duke traveled to London in a state railway carriage.

The Queen held a court on Thursday, the 16th instant, at Buckingham Palace. The Duke de Malakoff had his first audience of the Queen, and delivered to her Majesty his credentials as Embassador fr m his Imperial Majesty the Emperor of the French.

TRIAL OF SIMON BERNARD.

The trial of Dr. Simon Bernard for complicity with Orsini and others, was terminated by a verdict of acquittal. The counsel for the prisoner, Mr. Edwin James, made a powerful speech on behalf of his client, appealing strongly to the anti-Napoleon prejudices of his auditors. He denounced the Emperor as a despot, and affirmed that the proceedings had been undertaken to serve a political object at the dictation of the abettors of foreign despotism who dared not appeal to the British House of Commons. He called for a fearless and independent verdict, let the consequences be what they might. The speech elicited tremendous cheering in the Court, as did also the verdict.

APPEARANCE OF THE COURT.

The Court has been daguerreotyped by a spectator, as follows: "On the extreme left of the bench sat Chief Baron Pollock, of course in his wig and robes; next him the Lord Chief Justice Campbell, bearing his load of years bravely; his eye still keen, and his hand still running over the page of the note-book with the swiftness which stenography imparted to it thirty years ago. In the centre, under the canopy adorned with the royal arms, and the sword of Justice hanging like that of Damocles (but with the hilt, not the point, downward), sat Mr. Justice Crowder, a jovial judge, with a sly look in the corner of his eye. Mr. Justice Erle made up the quartet. On either side were ranged various City Officials, distinguished by a good deal of furs and a great deal of gold chain. Conspicuous among them sat the Lord Mayor, hooked as to nose, frizzed and gray as to hair, and very wide awake as to look. His lordship, however, took his departure early, to play judge himself at the Mansion-house, ushered from the court by the well-known official in the muff. Opposite to the bench, a little to the left, is situated the dock, a large and roomy space, railed off from the body of the court. M. Bernard entered exactly at ten o'clock, accompanied by a gentleman, who presently sat himself down and read the newspaper. This was the governor of the prison. A man in a belt also followed the prisoner, and he was the jailer. M. Bernard was dressed in black, and wore black kid gloves. He was puzzled on reaching the front of the dock to find laid out on the ledge on either side of him a number of green sprigs the rue, which an old custom prescribes to be provided for the use of prisoners who may feel faint. On smelling one of the sprigs M. Bernard seemed satisfied as to what it was, but evidently continued at a loss to know for what purpose it was placed there.

THE ARRAIGNMENT AND OPENING SPEECH FOR THE PROSECUTION.

"On being asked to plead, M. Bernard denied the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore declined to say either guilty or not guilty. At one time of day—not very long ago, either—a prisoner who refused to plead was subject to be tortured until he did plead. The last person who underwent this barbarous punishment was Jack Sheppard's famous friend and accomplice, Blueskin. Blueskin resisted the torture to the last, and was pressed to death. No such fearful fate, however, awaited M. Bernard. The Chief Justice explained that, according to the more civilized law of these days of steam and gas, if a prisoner declined to plead, it became the duty of the court to enter a plea of not guilty for him. A plea of 'Not guilty' was entered accordingly. At eleven o'clock Sir Fitzroy Kelly, the Attorney-General, rose from the front row of the great crowd of bewigged and begowned gentlemen who occupied the centre of the court, and opened the case for the prosecution. Nothing could have been clearer than his statement. His gentlemanly tone was exceedingly winning; and every one must have been gratified by the entire absence of any thing like animus, or undue partisanship. Le Chevalier Estien, inspector of the French police, a fat-faced, red-haired, stumpy man (not without an expression of good-humor), created a great sensation by the production of a variety of weapons from a number of bags and boxes by which he was surrounded. First he produced Pierri's dagger-knife, which he opened, and shut up with a click à la Mr. N. T. Hicks. Next, a five-chamber revolver, which the Lord Chief Justice and the Chief Baron handled with a sort of distant curiosity. The Attorney-General looked a little afraid of it, but some young men on the jury handled the weapon with accustomed hands. A grenade, bristling horridly with nipples, also went the round, together with chips of the exploded shell, some portions of which had been taken from the body of one of the horses which drew the Emperor on the night of what the French inspector called the attentat."

THE SPEECH FOR THE DEFENSE—NAPOLEON'S CAREER.

Mr. Edwin James, for the defense, made a most remarkable speech, in the course of which he thus sketched the Emperor of the French:

"They could not appreciate the feelings of the men the rights and liberties of whose country had been trampled upon and destroyed. Every spark of freedom in Italy had been annihilated, the Pope was kept upon his throne by the French army, and although they might have the utmost horror of assassination, could they wonder at the Italian patriot resorting to some desperate scheme by which he might hope to throw off the yoke which enslaved his native land. His Majesty the Emperor of the French had been exiled to this country. He had lived on these shores, under the protection of those laws which he now sought to destroy. He changed places, however, with Louis Philippe, and in 1848 he was elected, by the unanimous vote of the French people, President of the French Republic. He had enunciated such sentiments of liberty as to induce the French people to confide their destinies in his hands, and the solemn oath he had taken to protect their rights and liberties was scarcely cold on his lips before he violated it. And what was the conduct of Napoleon in 1851? He caused Cavaignac and other distinguished patriots to be arrested; he turned his drunken soldiery into the streets, and upon the ruins of the institutions of that great nation he voted himself to the throne."

APPEAL TO THE JURY.

He closed as follows: "This country had been the home of the exiled monarch of to-day, but the object of this prosecution was to destroy the great principle of English liberty afforded to exiles, and he appealed to the jury not to allow the laws of England to be violated at the bidding of a neighboring despot. He trusted they would not. He had endeavored to do his duty on behalf of the unhappy gentleman at the bar. He had endeavored to do so, as an English advocate, fearlessly and honestly. That was allowed in an English court of justice, although it was not in France, where the Press was gagged, and where no person was allowed to express his opinions unless they coincided with the views expressed at the Tuileries. But it was the pride of England that liberty of speech was allowed, and, he repeated, he endeavored, knowing that freedom of speech was allowed, to do his duty to the best of his ability. He also urged the jury to do their duty fearlessly, honestly, and conscientiously, and he appealed to them to let their verdict be their own. Let it not be given in fear of French arms, French fleets, and French intimidation. Let not a foreign despot influence them in arriving at their verdict. Tell him that he may parade his armies, his bayonets, but he can not intimidate an English jury. Tell him that they had even arrested the influence of the Crown, supported by time-serving judges; and tell him, by their verdict, that the time-honored asylum should not be violated. Let him parade his 600,000 bayonets before them—let the French cannon be thundering in their ears—but let him see that an English jury even then was not to be intimidated. Tell him that nothing he could do or threaten could in the smallest possible degree influence their verdict. Tell him that the liberty of England was based upon eternal and immutable justice; and tell him that, whether the throne of a foreign despot was to be lasting or shattered forever, the institutions of England were built upon the liberty of a mighty people."

LORD CARDIGAN'S LAST SCRAPE.

The London correspondent of the Herald tells the following story: "You must know that our pet here—which in his case means the reverse of a great man or a great warrior—Lord Cardigan, has had a new escapade. The fascinating and aristocratic young lady, Miss Di H——y, although a virgin mother—that is, she has never entered the holy marital state—was desperately enamored of the olfactory lord—you know that he is remarkable for a proboscis—and expressed herself to her putative pater in language which means to convey, 'I can't live without him.' Now the pater-familias—at least the yachting world say so—was well aware that the lord occasionally visited the boudoir of his daughter, at which he did the usual, but dishonorable, winking business—that is, took no notice as long as the scandal was confined to his chez sir. When the public spoke of it the pater, 'disgustibus,' did the surprised and the indignant, in the language of the 'stern parient' of 'Vilikins and Dinah' renown: 'You must either quit my roof, or give up the jumping Earl, the Inspector-General of Albion's cavalry.' 'Never!' exclaimed the female, as she set about packing her luggage. To be as brief as Polonius, know that the Earl has settled £700 a year on her, and that she is now his cara sposa, à bras gaucherie, for obvious reasons, because he has one 'à main droite'—'Bella femmina che ride vecol dir borsar che piange,' as the Italian proverb has it. The veteran lord is supposed to have a long purse, so is certain of Miss Di H——y's smiles. She is now located at the Park Hotel, opposite the marble arch, with the usual gaucherie of the fallen—'hichécing' herself by her style of living."

A MILLION SUBSCRIBED FOR ORSINI'S FAMILY.

The same writer adds: "Apropos of Orsini. The time of reaction has arrived, and he who a fortnight ago was cursed for a parricide, is now venerated as a martyr. Having ranked with the Ravaillacs and the Fentons, he is now deified as a Scævola or a Brutus. What must the Emperor feel when he hears, as is the fact, that no less a sum than one million franks has been spontaneously subscribed for the family? The list comprises the names of men and families of repute in England, France, and Italy, and in this latter country the subscription is headed by the chief nobility of Tuscany."

A LADY WORRIED BY A BEAR.

On the 10th ult., at the Bristol assizes, an action was brought by a young Italian lady of the name of Besozzi against a hotel-keeper, named Harris, to recover damages sustained by being worried by a bear, the property of the defendant. Last September the plaintiff, who is said to be of high descent, but who, owing to misfortune, has lately practiced as a teacher at Bristol, went, with many others, on a pleasure excursion to the Steep Holmes, in the Bristol Channel, where the defendant kept a hotel. While walking in the grounds around the house, where there was no notice of danger, she was suddenly seized by the bear, which sprung from a kennel, where he was chained, and was not rescued from his grasp until she had sustained injuries so serious as to render necessary several surgical operations, and which would probably leave behind a permanent lameness. It was said for the defense that the bear had previously been harmless, was kept chained, and that the lady had gone where she had no lawful occasion to pass. A verdict was found for the plaintiff—Damages, £50.

ANOTHER ACCIDENT IN MR. SPURGEON'S CHURCH.

Accidents seem to follow Mr. Spurgeon. At Halifax, last week, while a congregation were dispersing from a large temporary building erected for his hearers, a wooden gallery gave way, and two persons had broken legs. Next day, after a fall of snow, which occurred to a considerable extent in the north, the whole structure came down with a crash. It was then, fortunately, empty.

FRANCE.

AN IMPERIAL TOUR IN BRETAGNE.

The Emperor and Empress intend to make a tour in Brittany this spring. The Mayor of Rennes having informed the municipal council sitting that the Emperor would visit that city, the council immediately voted the following address on the occasion: "Sire—Since the time of Henry IV., of glorious memory, no sovereign has entered our walls. Happy at learning that your Majesty and your august consort will deign to visit this city, we hasten to express to you our sincere gratitude for such a mark of favor. But soon our population, in thronging around your person, will express, better than our words can do, their gratitude to the prince whose paternal kindness protects our interests, and whose genius has restored to France order and glory, as well as her ancient predominance over the destinies of Europe."

EFFECT PRODUCED IN FRANCE BY THE ACQUITTAL OF BERNARD.

The acquittal of Bernard produced great sensation. The Paris Moniteur did not publish the result when first received. Several other journals confessed that they dare not publish the speech of the prisoner's counsel, while others gave garbled accounts.

The Paris correspondent says that the Emperor and his advisers do not regard with indifference the encouragement that the result will give the conspirators, but that no exciting language will be employed by the French press to create indignation.

It was rumored, but not credited, that Queen Victoria will meet the Emperor Napoleon at Cherbourg at the great railroad fête to take place there.

THE NEW REIGN OF TERROR IN FRANCE.

Signor Mazzini, in a letter to the London papers, gives a few samples from a stock of cases, in illustration of the working of Louis Napoleon's Law of Public Safety. M. Lebrun, a notary at Charot Bourges, was seized at his dinner-table without notice, thrust into a cellular prison van, and hurried off to prison. The shock seriously affected him. He implored leave to call in a medical man, but this was refused, and the unfortunate notary died. Jean Bartheix, an inn-keeper, seventy years of age, residing in the department of the Tarn, was transported to Cayenne in 1852, afterward removed to Algiers, and last February was allowed to return home on leave of absence for six months. Eight days after his arrival he was again arrested, and lodged in a prison at Marseilles, where he remains in a dying state, and he is not allowed to receive the visits of any medical attendant. An Italian named Custaldi, who was in trade at Marseilles, was ordered to remove his residence to Poictiers. He knew that the execution of this mandate would ruin him, and, having friends in Paris, he got it withdrawn, upon condition that an acceptable security could be found to guarantee a continuance of his peaceful behavior. A surety was found and approved. Custaldi returned home, and was shortly afterward rearrested. This time his enemies made sure of their victim. On the 2d ult., without any form of preliminary examination or interrogatory, he was sent to Lambessa. Doomed prisoners are continuing to reach Marseilles every night from all the départements. The names of the intended were chosen a few days before the promulgation of the Law of Public Safety from old and recent lists of names, merely marked with the word "republican." They are very numerous. The Governor of Algeria writes, urging that other places of confinement may be chosen. Algiers alone has already 700 prisoners. It is, in the midst of, at least, apparent tranquillity, a second and enlarged edition of the coup d'état.

NO SOCIAL INTIMACY BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT AND THE OPPOSITION.

The four opposition deputies, M. Emile Ollivier, member for Paris, Darimon (Paris), Hénon (Lyons), and Curé (Bordeaux), have been placed in a state of great embarrassment by the receipt of an invitation to dine at the Tuileries on Monday, the 12th. M. Emile Ollivier declined the honor in the following note, addressed to the Emperor's principal chamberlain: "I beg you to thank the Emperor for the invitation to dinner which you have sent me by his order, and to inform him that I can not accept it. I have the honor, etc., Emile Ollivier." MM. Darimon and Hénon, without consulting either each other or M. E. Ollivier, also sent letters of refusal. M. Curé, after much hesitation, decided to accept the imperial hospitality. He dined at the Tuileries on the 12th. The Emperor, delighted at finding his mahogany possessed attractions too potent to be resisted by at least one of the systematic opponents of his government, treated M. Curé with marked courtesy, and talked with him for a long while.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE REIGNING BELLE.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald says: "We have recently had a marriage here that, from the notoriety of the young lady, has caused considerable sensation in the English beau monde. A young lady of the name of Sneyd has for the last four or five years held the palm of beauty against all competition, and wherever she went, whether to the Opera, to the ball, or—proh pudor!—to chapel, all eyes were fixed upon her. At one time it was even said that the Emperor himself was in danger of falling at her feet, and that the Empress insisted upon her name being struck out from the Imperial invitation list. Whether this be true or not, it is certain that she has continued to be up to the present time a subject of perpetual admiration on the part of the male sex, and of very considerable abuse on the part of her own. Three days ago, however, she consented to forego the fleeting honors of public admiration for what—it is to be hoped—will form the more enduring laurels of domestic life. After scorning the present embassador at Florence, Mr. Howard, brother of the Earl of Carlisle—flouting various other private secretaries to attachés and heirs of splendid rent rolls, she has thrown herself into the arms of George Peze, Esq., one of her Majesty's attachés to the British Embassy, only too happy, as some spiteful young ladies say, to find such a termination to a career that had already ceased to be brilliant.

"The fact is, Miss Sneyd is an instance among ten thousand others of the power of mind over other matters. She was undoubtedly beautiful, but her beauty would have never of itself preserved her superiority. She had a certain esprit that came in aid and sustained her pre-eminence long after her good personal attractions had departed. This was her secret, and it has enabled her without the advantages of great fortune, of aristocratic birth or any possession more than may be found any day in thousands of her sex, to hold a place in aristocratic circles here, such as is given to few. What the advantages of the man she has delighted to honor may be, I do not know, except that he has long been remarkable for his handsome person; but in refusing to unite her fate with Mr. Howard, the recently appointed Minister at Florence, in the room of the Marquis of Normanby, and formerly Chargé d'Affairs at Paris, she has certainly shown an example of the wit which has so powerfully come in aid of her beauty; for of all diplomatic fools, surely few so great as he."

LAMARTINE'S SUBSCRIPTION A FAILURE.

The Paris correspondent of the Herald writes: "I am sorry to hear on all hands that the Lamartine subscription has proved a complete failure. It is a characteristic feature of the French nation that, however great and genuine their enthusiasm, it never stands the financial test—their feelings invariably subside when they have to put their hands into their pockets."

PRUSSIA.

WHAT LIFE THE NEW PRINCESS LEADS.

The Berlin correspondent of the Herald writes: "I had an opportunity on Good Friday of seeing the Princess at the English chapel, where I was seated only a few yards from her Royal Highness, and must modify and flatly correct the description I gave you of her extérieur in one of my former reports. Her figure is certainly petite, and she has nothing distingué about her, but the expression of her countenance is remarkably attractive. She has sweet, dove-like eyes, a nice little mouth, and the finest teeth in the world. There is an air of innocence and frank ingenuousness diffused over her that is perfectly charming; simple in her dress and manner, she looks more like the wife or daughter of a plain American farmer than the scion of one of the oldest and proudest royal houses in Christendom. As to her having carroty hair, that is a most atrocious libel; it is light brown or chestnut, sleek and glossy, and quite in keeping with the whole contour of her face. Altogether she is really a 'winsome wee thing,' whom any man might be happy to call his own. I am told she feels very much annoyed at the strict etiquette she is obliged to observe here, and which is quite at variance with her tastes and inclinations. Her first lady of the bedchamber, the Countess Perporcher, a formal old duenna of the ancien régime, is continually lecturing her upon the duties of her rank, and as continually aghast at the indiscreet condescension and unsophisticated naïveté of the poor little Princess, who can not be made to understand that she ought to talk, think, walk, ride, stand, sit, in fact do every thing different to other people. The other day, jumping up to look out of the window, she found the glass covered with steam, and snatched up a handkerchief to wipe it off herself, at which the Lady of the Bedchamber almost went into fits. Madame de Perporcher has called in the Princess of Prussia to her assistance; and what between her mother-in-law and her first Lady of the Bedchamber, the poor young creature leads a sad life of it; fortunately her husband is sincerely attached to her, and this probably makes up for the little annoyances inseparable from the station she occupies. She is said to idolize her husband, who is certainly a very fine young man—in person a good deal like his uncle, the late Emperor Nicholas, whom he resembles, too, in the somewhat stern expression of his eye, though he is not quite so tall, and his form is slighter and less symmetrical."

INDIA.

HOW LUCKNOW WAS TAKEN.

The Bombay correspondent of the London Times thus describes the attack on Lucknow, having dates from thence only to 15th: "Upon establishing himself on the further side of the river, Sir James Outram proceeded to force his way upward, thus completely enfilading the enemy's line of works along the canal. Then the Commander-in-Chief, with the second division, under Sir Edward Lugard, stormed and took the Martinière, after a heavy cannonade, and with slight loss. This done, he advanced over the canal and seized the line of works which Outram had turned and rendered untenable by his fire. This took place apparently on the 9th. On the 10th a house and inclosure, known by the name of its former occupant Major Banks, in rear of the line of works, was occupied with little loss. The next position of the enemy that the troops came upon was the Begum's Palace. This was stormed on the 11th by the 93d Highlanders, supported by the 42d, with the loss of Captain Macdonald killed, and about 100 other casualties. Simultaneously with this attack, Sir James Outram, on the farther side of the river, having forced his way upward through the low suburbs and over the King's garden and other inclosures, occupied the stone bridge above the town, destroying another 500 of the enemy who held it. In these operations he lost Captain Moosum, of the Staff, and an officer of the Rifle Brigade. On the same or the following day, the 12th, the Commander-in-Chief pursued his advantage by occupying the buildings in advance of the Begum's Palace. This movement brought him in front of the strongest of the enemy's positions, the Imaumbarrah. On the 13th, a sap was run up toward the wall of this inclosure, and a breach having been effected by the artillery, the place was assaulted at nine in the morning of the 14th. The Imaumbarrah was carried, and our troops, pressing close upon the flying enemy, entered the Kaiserbagh, or King's Palace which Outram had busily shelled, the last, I believe, of the formidable positions of the enemy, and, after a hard fight which lasted all the remainder of the day, obtained complete occupation of it, capturing twenty-two guns. Then the routed enemy began to fly from the city. Outram crossed the iron-bridge over the river and fell upon them in their rear, the thunder of the chief's artillery still crashing upon their front and flanks. One line of retreat lay open to them—that to the north-west, toward Rohilcund. On the 15th Sir Colin, finding that the enemy were availing themselves largely of this opening, dispatched after them at two o'clock in the morning a brigade of cavalry and artillery, under Brigadier Campbell, who moved to the left from his position in front of the Alumbagh. Sir Hope Grant, with one thousand sabres and two troops of horse artillery, was sent out in co-operation, but on the north side of the river, along the Seetapore road, which leads direct into Rohilcund, and a heavy battery, with a brigade of infantry, were to follow him on the 16th."

THE BAGGAGE OF THE ARMY.

Mr. Russell, of the Times, continues his admirable letters, from which we give the following extracts:

"I have already attempted to give some notion of the magnitude of the various impedimenta—necessary as they are, still they deserve the Cæsarean title—of an Indian army; but I feel that nothing but an actual ocular demonstration can give an idea on the subject to any one who has not seen troops in the field on Eastern warfare. Numbers fail to impress the mind, and the impression produced by a statement to the effect that we have many thousands of elephants, camels, horses, oxen, and camp-followers is most vague and unsatisfactory. Who can really bring before his mind's eye a train of baggage animals twenty-five miles long—a string of 16,000 camels—a siege train park covering a square of 400 by 400 yards, with 12,000 oxen attached to it, or a following of 60,000 non-combatants? But to the Commander-in-Chief each and all must be ever present—ever be an object of anxiety—a thing to be provided for and taken care of. It seems to me even now that no reduction could be made in these several items without impairing the efficiency of the troops, and some doubts I had on the subject of dooly, or litter carriage, have been dissipated by conversation with officers of experience. To each company of a regiment there are ten doolies attached, and to each dooly are attached six coolies, or porters, who receive eight rupees a month each for their services. You will thus have for each regiment on an average 80 doolies and 480 coolies, and yet you only provide for the carriage of 80 wounded men per regiment; but if horse ambulances were introduced matters would not be improved, inasmuch as to each horse of the ambulance you would have to attach a grass-cutter, and the loss of comfort to the wounded would be very great.

THE HIGHLAND REGIMENTS.

"Most of the regiments are in an efficient state, but the Highlanders are conspicuous, not only for their costume, but for their steady and martial air on parade and in the field. As they marched off in the early gray of the morning, with the pipes playing (really this time) "The Campbells are Coming," one caught a vision of the interior of Lucknow through the dancing sheen of their arms. The Chief inspected them, and seemed highly pleased with what he saw. As for himself, he wears a serviceable air, which bespeaks confidence and resolution, and gives a notion of hard work and success. Every thing about him is for service, even down to the keen-edged sabre, in a coarse leather sheath, not dangling and clattering from his side, and hitting the flanks of his horse, from gaudy sling belts, but tucked up compactly by a stout shoulder-belt just over his hip. Not that Sir Colin wishes to be looked on as a beau sabreur—he would 'drop on' to any of his staff whom he saw riding about with his sword drawn—but that he thinks most likely if a man wears a weapon it ought to be as handy and as ready as may be; and so of his nether man, not clothed in regulation, with gold stripes, but in stout brown corduroy, warranted to wear in any climate. The chief of the staff and the officers of the staff, for the most part, follow the example of the Commander-in-Chief, who leads the fashion in camp. Soon after they marched dark clouds began to rise rapidly over the plain—the lightning flashed in the distance, the thunder rolled heavily. Soon there came sweeping fast down upon us a cavalry of sticks, straw, and blinding dust, behind which marched columns of rain. Our tent men (kelassies) were busy driving in the tent-pegs and closing the flaps when this enemy made its appearance, and before it reached us our defenses were completed. In a few minutes more there was a thunder-storm overhead and a heavy fall of rain, accompanied by wind, but it passed on rapidly, and seemed to pursue the columns which had marched from camp.

SIR COLIN AND THE LADIES.

"The Agra convoy came in to Cawnpore to-day (Feb. 23), and thus one great cause of anxiety has been removed from the mind of the chief. These ladies and their little ones have been a most embarrassing ingredient in his calculations. At Lucknow he was in a fever at the various small delays which they considered necessary, and, courteous as he is to women, he for once was obliged to be a 'little stern' when he found the dear creatures a little unreasonable. In order to make a proper effect, most of the ladies came out in their best gowns and bonnets. Whether 'Betty gave the cheek' a little touch of red or not, I can not say, but I am assured the array of fashion, though somewhat behind the season, owing to the difficulty of communicating with the Calcutta modistes, was very creditable. Sir Colin got fidgety when he found himself made a maître d'etiquette and an arbiter morum among piles of bandboxes, 'best bonnets,' and 'these few little clothes trunks;' but he sustained his position with unflinching fortitude, till at length, when he thought he had 'seen the last of them' out of the place, two young ladies came trippingly in, wisked about the residency for a short time, and then, with nods and smiles, departed, saying graciously, 'We'll be back again presently.' 'No, ladies, no; you'll be good enough to do nothing of the kind,' exclaimed he; 'you have been here quite long enough, I am sure, and I have had quite enough trouble in getting you out of it.' The Agra ladies ought to have been ready long ago. They were warned over and over again, but—. Well, it's the old story. It's rather a bad joke—too bad to be appreciated—to keep a husband waiting while 'one is putting on one's bonnet,' but when the cares of the toilet prove an obstacle which an army can not overcome, which frustrate strategic combinations, delay great sieges, and affect the fortunes of a whole campaign, it is sufficient to make generals, at all events, wish that good mother Eve's earlier style was now in fashion among her daughters.

AN INDIAN BOADICEA.

"The Begum certainly does not conceal her apprehensions of the result of our operations, and is vehement with prayers and tears to the chiefs to make one great onslaught upon us ere we complete our batteries. Overcoming her timidity, she appeared in the field on the attack of the 25th, mounted on an elephant, but, as that sagacious animal never remains within range, it is probable she was not a very near spectatress of the fight. On one occasion she astonished the Durbar, and almost shamed them out of their senses. In an indignant harangue, with all the fire of Rachel making a grand coup de théâtre, she suddenly tore her vail from her face (which is said to be a very handsome one), and denounced them for their inactivity, and for their indifference to the wrongs of their countrywomen. I am told one must be an Asiatic to understand the full force of this demonstration. What the poor lady will do when Sir Colin makes his appearance this morning at Dilkoosha I can not conjecture. If she could but have seen the troops march this morning she would have been any thing but comforted. Lugard's division consists of the Third Brigade, consisting of the 34th (part detached), 38th, and 52d Regiments, and of the Fourth Brigade, formed of the 42d Regiment, 93d Regiment, and 4th Punjab Rifles. Soon after they marched dark clouds began to rise rapidly over the plain; the lightning flashed in the distance, the thunder rolled heavily.

"We have just heard from Sir James Outram's camp that the enemy came out in great force this morning (March 2), and attacked the position at the Alumbagh very much in the same way as on the 21st. They advanced in great numbers on the right, but Sir James Outram moved out a force of cavalry, artillery, and infantry to intercept them, and a very brisk action took place, in which we utterly defeated them and captured two guns. The Begum and her officers came out on elephants to view the fight, and soon left the field. We had two or three men killed and ten wounded, among the latter of whom are Colonel Berkeley and Captain Moorsom."

YEH'S VOYAGE TO HIS PRISON.

A letter from Singapore, dated March 1, says: "The Inflexible arrived here this morning, on her way to Calcutta. Yeh has endured the discomfort of his sea-sickness much better than we expected. He eats a great deal, sleeps a great deal, and washes very little. He may be pronounced, therefore, to be in very good case, and we hope to deliver him over to the Governor-General safe and sound. It was said at Hong Kong that Lord Elgin has left it to the discretion of Lord Canning to detain him at Calcutta, or to send him to England. Should the Governor-General resolve upon the latter course, Yeh will make but an intractable London lion. You will never get him to shake his mane and roar. In my next letter from Calcutta I hope to be able to give the first full-length study of a first-class Mandarin that has ever been submitted to the Western world."

THE LAST PRESIDENTIAL DRAWING-ROOM.

Washington, 21st April, 1858.

Yes, it was the last. It seems a very formal, uninteresting performance—to dress in elaborate costume, to spend hours over one's toilet-table, to throw away six months' pin-money on a single toilette, and, after all, to be merely hustled through a crowd up to the President, who says, in his stereotyped way, that we are growing younger and rosier as time floats o'er us; to bow to Miss Lane, who is ever graceful and kind-looking; and to squeeze one's way out at ten, or half-past; but que voulez-vous? it is the fashion, and we take to it kindly.

When I received your letter, Mr. Editor, I will tell you frankly, I read it at breakfast. Papa said (I can't repeat exactly his words, he has fallen into such a shocking habit of using vulgar words since he went to Congress) that you were very impertinent, and that I ought to write you a sharp letter, setting you down. Mamma (who reads the Weekly from the Contents to the Advertisements, and thinks it the only family paper worth taking—an opinion, by-the-way, in which many of our friends concur) said, that as you had been so polite as to print my tale, entitled "Our Charley," and my poems, the least I could do was to comply with your request, and write you an account of the Reception. Between the two I should have been puzzled, but that Senator —— happened to come in at that moment. I would have you to know, Mr. Editor, that there is nothing at all between the Senator and me, whatever gossips may have told you on the subject. We happen to like each other's society—at least, he likes mine, and I don't hate him; but we are both of us too reasonable to think of being more than mere friends. So I referred the question to him, and he agreed to decide it.

He said that in his State every respectable family had Harper's Weekly on their drawing-room table; that you didn't find it in the taverns or bar-rooms; but that wherever refined women were, there you were sure to see the Weekly. Therefore he judged that I could do no harm in complying with your request. As to the question which papa—rather unfairly, I think—raised, whether it was proper to go to a man's house, and then write an account of what you saw there, as though it was a hotel or a theatre, Senator —— observed that no analogy existed between a Presidential mansion and a private house. "Presidential drawing-rooms," he said, "are public ceremonials; people don't go there as private friends of Mr. Buchanan, but as loyal citizens, desirous of paying respect to the Chief Magistrate of the nation. For the time that he is President," he added, "Mr. Buchanan ceases to exist as a private individual. He becomes an institution—the Executive—and has no more claim to privacy in the discharge of his public duties—one of which is the entertainment of the people—than Congress or the Supreme Court. Just so with his surroundings. The White House is not a private residence. It is a public building, in the fullest sense of the term; and every person therein, who officiates in any ostensible capacity, from the door-keeper to the honored lady who receives the guests, is a public functionary for the time being, and has no more claim to exemption from the inseparable inconveniences of publicity than Chief Justice Taney or Secretary Cass. Therefore, my dear Maria" (the Senator is an old friend, and takes the liberty of calling me by my Christian name), "my advice is, that you comply with the request of the editor of Harper's Weekly, and furnish him with the report he desires. I am bound to say that he writes very much like a gentleman."

I always follow the Senator's advice. Accordingly, last evening, as he happened to call just as we were going to the drawing-room, I agreed to accompany him in his carriage, while papa and mamma drove together in theirs. [To tell you the truth, I hope you won't print this sentence—since the hoop fashion came in we ladies absolutely require a whole carriage-seat to ourselves.] We arrived at the White House just as the first of the guests were coming in. The Senator—he knows every thing, and is so quiet and thoughtful—took me by some quiet passage to the door of the dressing-room; I had managed so well that I wasn't crumpled in the least.

Dear Mr. Editor, I wish you could have ensconced some of your famous artists—Mr. Hoppin, or Mr. Parsons—in a corner of that room while the dressing went on. I do believe that half an hour in that room—remember, no males are ever admitted—would enlarge even the greatest lady-killer's knowledge of the sex. The first person I met there was Mrs. ——, of New York (you know her, she is gigantic); she was in an agony. She wore—dare I mention it?—steel hoops, and an accident had happened to them, in consequence of her persisting in bringing her brother (as stout as she is) in the carriage with her. She wanted a doctor to be sent for, and—privately, to me—she confessed that she had fears of lock-jaw. Her sister, who married the member from Wisconsin, and who has become un peu sauvage in that wild region, interrupted her confidences with, "Bother, Mary Jane! stick a bit of court-plaster on the place!" I suggested that the lady should ascertain, by actual experiment, whether the accident had lamed her; and, on witnessing her performance, I was compelled to confess that her walk—which resembles that of a heavily-laden vessel in a ground-swell—was uncommonly natural.

Other ladies were vociferous about their attire. A new regulation of the White House obliges every guest to surrender their outer clothing (I mean, of course, their cloaks, etc.) to the keeping of a guardian, who delivers a receipt for them in the shape of a numbered ticket. Frantic were the struggles which accompanied this surrender. Cloaks, shawls, hoods, gaiters, hats, gloves—all the indescribable articles of female attire—were roughly made up into bundles by the female Cerberus, and phlegmatically deposited in appropriate receptacles. It seemed to be the prevailing impression among some of the Western ladies that the ticket arrangement was fraudulently intended, and that they had taken leave of their property forever.

Of course the Senator was waiting at the door when I sallied forth in proper costume. He himself, as he always is, was sans reproche. Old as his enemies say he is, dear Mr. Editor, you would agree with me in calling him very handsome, if you saw him when he takes pains with himself. And when he squeezed my hand (you know he is so intimate with us that he can do what he likes without meaning any thing), and said, "Dear Maria, I feel so proud at having you on my arm!" I assure you I felt as if—as if—well, as if I could have loved him if he had asked me.

We entered the procession toward the Scarlet Room. In front of us was the famous Mr. ——, of Massachusetts, whose family made so much money in the slave-trade that they are able to afford the finest diamonds in the country. Mrs. —— certainly wore, as the wicked Senator observed, a cargo of healthy negroes on her back. Before them was my father's barber—a fine, jovial-looking person—who is a great friend of Mr. Stoeckel's, the Russian Minister; they say that the Russian has offered to make him a Prince if he will only go to St. Petersburg, but the barberess objects to crossing the Atlantic, sea voyages agreeing so badly with her. Behind us followed the Minister Plenipotentiary of Timbuctoo, who was covered with gold and diamonds. He was a very fierce abolitionist when he came here, but now he goes for slavery to any lengths, and won't have a Northern man at his dinners (where, the Senator tells me, no man is allowed to leave his chair till he has emptied at least one bottle). I noticed, still further in the rear, the whilom belle from Virginia, Miss ——, who had the sad affair with the German Count two years since. She was on the arm of a clerk in one of the Departments. They say she is going to marry him. She is very unhappy about it now; he will be hereafter.

Mr. Priggery Snob, who stood near the President, delayed the procession some time by his civilities to Miss —— ——, the great heiress. Poor Snob is quite a personage in these days; he dispenses honors and civilities with the air of a Prince, and to listen to him, you would suppose that he had the disposal of the Executive patronage, and the control of the nation at large. It is generally supposed that he will marry Miss —— —— before long, and the little child seems quite solicitous to have a connection of some kind with the political world. I trust poor Priggery will not waste time. A couple of years will make many changes; let him make hay while he can.

Miss Lane looked charming in a plain white dress. I send you a sketch of her, which was made surreptitiously by a dear friend of mine, and which we all think uncommonly like. She is queenly in appearance, and though some people say she resembles what Queen Victoria was fifteen years ago, I think the remark must have been made originally by some loyal Englishman who wanted to compliment her Majesty.

Few ladies in this country have had so brilliant a career as Miss Lane. Born in the quiet County of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, she spent her childhood in that beautiful region. She had the misfortune to lose both her parents at an early age, and became an inmate of the home of her uncle, the present Chief Magistrate. She accompanied him to London, when he went out as United States Minister to the Court of St. James, and won many an English heart by her unaffected kindness and genial amiability. She looks so English that many of her friends across the water affected to disbelieve that she was an American. Having done the honors of the bachelor Minister's mansion at the most stately Court in the world, it was natural that she should be solicited to continue to grace her uncle's household when he entered upon the higher function of President of the United States. Her reign over the gayeties of Washington commenced, accordingly,

MISS LANE, THE LADY OF THE WHITE HOUSE.

PREPARING FOR THE RECEPTION—THE NECK-TIE.

with the inauguration of Mr. Buchanan, and I assure you it is the unanimous opinion here that our ball-rooms never had such a Queen. Miss Lane, as you are probably aware, is a blonde, with handsome features and a commanding figure.

But I must bring this scrawl to a close.

The return home was uneventful. In the cloak-room there was the usual gossip about the toilet and looks of the reigning belles. Miss ——, of California, seemed to command the greatest number of suffrages for the title of Belle of the Drawing-room; though Miss ——, of New York, a fair lady from Tennessee, and a sweet creature from Massachusetts (I can not really give names, or even initials) prone to her close. But every body agreed that Miss —— (who, by-the-way, once gave herself airs as though she was going to marry my friend Senator ——) had terribly fallen off, and was positively a fright.

MARIA.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER VII.

THE PUBLIC MAN SEEKS BUT ONE PATRON—VIZ., THE LUCKY MOMENT.

"At his house in Carlton Gardens, Guy Darrell, Esq., for the season."

Simple insertion in the pompous list of Fashionable Arrivals!—the name of a plain commoner imbedded in the amber which glitters with so many coronets and stars! Yet such is England, with all its veneration for titles, that the eyes of the public passed indifferently over the rest of that chronicle of illustrious "whereabouts," to rest with interest, curiosity, speculation, on the unembla zoned name which but a day before had seemed slipped out of date—obsolete as that of an actor who figures no more in play-bills. Unquestionably the sensation excited was due, in much, to the "ambiguous voices" which Colonel Morley had disseminated throughout the genial atmosphere of Club-rooms. "Arrived in London for the season!" he, the orator, once so famous, long so forgotten, who had been out of the London world for the space of more than half a generation. "Why now? why for the season?" quoth the Colonel. "He is still in the prime of life as a public man, and—a CRISIS is at hand!"

But that which gave weight and significance to Alban Morley's hints, was the report in the newspapers of Guy Darrell's visit to his old constituents, and of the short speech he had addressed to them, to which he had so slightly referred in his conversation with Alban. True, the speech was short: true, it touched but little on passing topics of political interest—rather alluding, with modesty and terseness, to the contests and victories of a former day. But still, in the few words there was the swell of the old clarion—the wind of the Paladin's horn which woke Fontarabian echoes.

It is astonishing how capricious, how sudden are the changes in value of a public man. All depends upon whether the public want, or believe they want, the man; and that is a question upon which the public do not know their own minds a week before; nor do they always keep in the same mind when made up, for a week together. If they do not want a man—if he do not hit the taste, nor respond to the exigency of the time—whatever his eloquence, his abilities, his virtues, they push him aside, or cry him down. Is he wanted?—does the mirror of the moment reflect his image?—that mirror is an intense magnifier; his proportions swell

THE GLOVES.

—they become gigantic. At that moment the public wanted some one; and the instant the hint was given, "Why not Guy Darrell?" Guy Darrell was seized upon as the man wanted. It was one of those times in our Parliamentary history when the public are out of temper with all parties—when recognized leaders have contrived to damage themselves—when a Cabinet is shaking, and the public neither care to destroy nor to keep it; a time, too, when the country seemed in some danger, and when, mere men of business held unequal to the emergency, whatever name suggested associations of vigor, eloquence, genius, rose to a premium above its market-price in times of tranquility and tape. Without effort of his own—by the mere force of the under-current—Guy Darrell was thrown up from oblivion into note. He could not form a cabinet—certainly not; but he might help to bring a cabinet together, reconcile jarring elements, adjust disputed questions, take in such government some high place, influence its councils, and delight a public weary of the oratory of the day with the eloquence of a former race. For the public is ever a laudator temporis acti, and whatever the authors or the orators immediately before it, were those authors and orators Homers and Ciceros, would still shake a disparaging head, and talk of these degenerate days, as Homer himself talked ages before Socrates stood in the Pass of Thermopylæ, or Miltiades routed Asian armaments at Marathon. Guy Darrell belonged to a former race. The fathers of those young Members rising now into fame, had quoted to their sons his pithy sentences, his vivid images; and added, as Fox added when quoting Burke, "but you should have heard and seen the man!"

Heard and seen the man! But there he was again!—come up as from a grave—one up to the public just when such a man was wanted. Where was he wanted where? Oh, somehow and somewhere! There he is! make the most of him.

The house in Carlton Gardens is prepared, the establishment mounted. Thither flock all the Viponts—one they alone; all the chiefs of all parties—nor they alone: all the notabilities of our grand metropolis. Lord Lavell might be startled at his own position; but he transgenerationed its nature, and it did not discompose his nerves. He knew quite the value of power to be aware how much the popular favor is the creature of circumstance. By chance he had picked the time; had he then come to town the season before, he might have continued obscure; a man like Guy Darrell will be wanted then. Whether with or without design, his bearing confirmed and extended the effect produced by his reappearance. Gracious, but modestly reserved—he spoke little, listened beautifully. Many of the questions which agitated the world him had grown up into importance since his day of action, put to him by statesmen, had he traced their progressive development, with their change-ful effects upon men and parties. But a man who has passed a deep thought into practical principle might sleep in the caves of Trophonius for twenty years, and find, on waking, that the thought he had Darrell regained the level of the day, and seized upon all the strong points on which men were divided, with the rapidity of a mind accustomed to exclusive intellect—his judgment perhaps the clearer from the freedom of long years spent in the composure of dispassionate survey. When partisans wrangled as to what should have been done, Darrell was silent; when they asked what should be done, out came one of his trite sententiæ, and a knot was cut. It was curious to a true this man, round whom expectations grouped and rumor hung, was in the House of Commons Parliament; but that was rather a delay to his energies than a detriment to his consequence. Important consequences, nevertheless, were arising, were already on the look-out for him; a smaller contingency, in the interim, Carr Vipont undertook to procure him any day.

Always a Vipont ready to accept something—even the Chiltern Hundreds. Mr. Darrell, not without reason, demurred at re-entering the House of Commons at so late a period of his own years. He had left it with one of those rare reputations which no wise man likes rashly to imperil. The Vipont sighed. Ah, that was certainly the more useful in the Commons than the Lords, but still in the Lords it was a fine, a great use. They would want a debating hand, perhaps a lord acquainted with law in the contingencies of war if he preferred the army, and he pull downward still. The man's modesty was heartbreaking—its style of refusal showed not but that august assembly; and as to law—he could never now be a law lord—he should be a but a ci-devant advocate, wanting the air of a judicial amateur.

In short, without declining to re-enter public life, seeming, on the contrary, to resume all his interest in it, Darrell contrived with admirable dexterity to elude for the present every overpressed upon him, and even to convince his solicitors—but only of his wisdom—that the occasions more heeded, and his power in reconciling interest and jealousies was proportioned to what would have been the case if he had actually entered either House of Parliament, and thrown himself exclusively into the views of the party of one party, but of one section of a party. Nevertheless, such unpopularity as he had incurred he must decide at all events before the next session. Once he was seen in the arena of his old triumphs, on the benches devoted to statesmen distinguished by the Speaker's order. There, recognized by the other members, and greeted aplauses than the next day rang again through Ragland House and the Carlton Club, the very men with whom, in the old battle-days, he had been the most habitually pitted, in speaking now. His tones are remembered—his very attitude is found. Does he know who listens yonder? Old membership with—shoulder to shoulder, and glance significantly where Darrell sits.

Sits, as became him, tranquil, respectful, intent, seemingly, perhaps really, unconscious of the sensation he excites. Is he aware of it or otator? how like the eye in a portrait! it seems to fix on each other eye that seeks it—steadily fascinating. You distant members behind the Speaker's chair, at the far distance, feel the light of that steady inward beam. The weighty eyebrows massive among all those rows of human heads seems thrust forward, the eye slightly down, with the dark, strong line of the weighty eyebrow over it. But what is passing within that secret mind? Is there consciousness in the spectator? and there eagerness to renew the strife? Is that interest in the House's debate feigned or real? Impossible for him who gazed upon that face to say. And that eye would have seemed to the gazer to read himself through and through to the heart's core, long ere the gazer could have had a single guess as to the thoughts beneath that marble forehead, as to the emotions within the heart, over which, in old senatorial fashion, the arms were folded with no conventional ease.

CHAPTER VIII.

Darrell and Lionel.

DARRELL had received Lionel with some evident embarrassment, which soon yielded to affectionate warmth. He took to the young man whose fortunes he had so improved; he felt that with the improved fortunes the young man's whole being was improved;—assured position, early consummate with the best social circles; in which the quality of fashion smoothes away all disparities in rank, habit, and taste. Lionel struck of the wayward and morbid irritability of his boyish pride; he had the high spirit, the generous love of independence, the proper self-respecting calculation, were strong as ever; these were in the grain of his nature. Darrell was content all who in youth aspire to be one day noted from the mere mass of mankind, "Lionel had learned to himself a certain ideal standard, above the ordinary level of what the world is content to call honor, by which he had long since habituated into his estimate of life the heroic element, and undeniable one in the most practical social of view, for the world is so in the habit of decrying—of disbelieving high motives and pure emotions—of pigeonholing aloof such all its ugliest wrinkles, stripped of the true bloom that gives them a virginal charm, that sometimes those defects which it invites the sun to tinge, that we shall never judge human nature aright, if we do not set out in the first place with a fairest beauties, and our belief in its latent good. In a word, we should begin with the Ideal, if we would learn the Human. But though to himself Lionel thus secretly prescribed a certain superiority of type, in his watchful survey, to seem if never actually attained, he was wholly without pretension to superiority over his more contemporaries. From this he was saved not only by good-nature, animal spirits, frank hardihood, but by the very ardor of his ideal, which animated his tongue, colored his language, and whether to young or old, made him, by his conversation rary and original. He was a delightful companion; and if he had taken much instruction from those ideal views which he set himself, he so bathed that instruction in the light of a sunny and lively temperament, so warmed it at his own heating, impulsive heart, that he could make an old man's gleanings from his own young reaping, and yet not mislead him. truth. Faults he had, of course—chiefly the faults common at the failings of youth, perhaps, the most dangerous were—Firstly, carelessness in money matters; secondly, a distaste for study, in which predilection Darrell profoundest. His tastes were not in reality exclusive, but somewhat fitful; and with hands, leaving little to show for it; and when his quarterly allowance became due, ample though it was, always, perhaps owing to that very fertility, started up to some held of it. And debts, though not extravagant, were accumulated still with sufficient horror. Paid or put aside, as the case might be, they were merely linked upon to borne. Youth is in danger till it has found out them as furies. For advice, he took it with some little show of deference, but with no effect. In fact, with many talents, he had yet no adequate sense of common sense, and was not ever to get enough to steadily his bark through life's trying voyage, the moment's wind and wave skilful must be forcibly striken home less to his reason than his imagination or his heart. But if, some how or other, he got well into the business his vessel.

I know not if Lionel Haughton had genius; he never assumed that he had; but he had something more like genius than that prototype of mediocrity which is born on the mean. He had youth—real youth—youth of mind, youth of heart, youth of frame. He could aspire as he moved before you, with the eye to which light or dee sprang at once from a nature vibrating to every lofty, every generous impulse, he seemed more than young—the incarnation of youth.

Darrell took to him at once. Amidst all the engagements crowded on the important man, he contrived to see Lionel almost daily, had what may seem strange, Guy Darrell felt more at ease with that young man than with any one of his own contemporaries—than even with Alban Morley. To the last, indeed, he opened speech with less reserve to Lionel than to any one else, or of certain projects in the future. But still, even there, he adopted a tone of half-playful half-mournful satire, which might be in itself disguise. Alban Morley, with all his good qualities, was at times a little too quickening my pace until it was at least fifty yards in the rear. I am glad at last to see it planted to the ground. You will hardly wonder at that if you read what I am now going to set down.

In the summer of 1832 I was a young blockhead just turned twenty-one: to be sure, what an ass I was, half fop and ill-bred! I had served my time down in Suffolk (I shan't say where), and had learned my trade as a hair-dresser, by dint of several years' practice in the world. At the expiration of my apprenticeship, I came up to town with all my fortune—seven-and-a hundred pounds—in my pocket, intending to see the world and enjoy myself before I settled down in business.

Well, I did enjoy myself, notwithstanding. Every thing was a pleasure to me in these days—and then, as to Vauxhall, the theatres, the dancing-rooms, the free-and-easies, the shades—I thought them Paradise itself. I made friends with some young fellows as silly as myself, and together we fattened ourselves we "did the thing"—and many a preposterous and senseless thing we certainly did.

One day, having made an appointment to dine with one of these chance acquaintances, I was proceeding in full costume along Holborn toward the place of assignation, when a nop-headed, ragged urchin ran against me, and nearly tripped me up; and the next moment I discovered that I had lost my handkerchief from my pocket. I was too green to suspect the little vagabond of having taken it—besides, he had disappeared. The loss was nothing; it was only the thought of parading one other. I proceeded onward on the look-out for a shop, when I came suddenly upon the entrance to Field Lane, which disclosed to my view thousands of handkerchiefs dangling from walls, and lines, and open windows; and by a walked to make my selection. The queer aspect of the place tickled my fancy, and threatened to make me clattering, squabbling, and bawling—the coarse jokes I heard, the odd faces I peeped out on all sides—the myriads of silken spots that fluttered and shed and shed —all struck me with an agreeable sense of novelty; and, being in a humor for thinking I might as well see the whole of it, I wandered from end to end of the lane before troubling myself about the business in hand. The interest of the place, plump and unctuous, paid me market attention, and would fain have encouraged me into a bargain, but I was callous to their compliments, and held on my way. Having at length satisfied my curiosity, I retraced my steps, and entering a shop of the first I encountered to be shown some of the best of the wares. The shop was a sort of back-shop chamber, which was almost empty; the whole of the merchandise having been referred to the lines and poles without, where, as it hung thick in the air, it completely obscured the view of what was passing in the lane. The man who rose to wait behind the counter in answer to my challenge, seemed to my raw eyes a very old and grisly hair; but a pair of dark-black eyes twinkled under the bushy arch of brow that covered them both; and his bald-jaw combined with a grin to be asked: "Tulip, eh? your old Vienna pea, ma tear?"

Of course I wanted the best, and was not particular as to price.

The fellow eyed me leisurely all over as I gave him to understand that much, and, as I spoke, he took my measure to a hair. "Den, vil de shentleman step into de varens, and look at some vat is best-a-vat?"

He opened a whitewashed door at the end of the shop, and motioned me to enter. I did so, and stood, and threading a dark, narrow passage, some few paces in length, I was shown into a chamber not more than ten feet square, lighted by a small window in the roof, and totally empty, with the exception of what seemed a large wooden chest of very short bench, and some tools and bullets of wood lying about. Against this a dozen or so of big, square paving-stones, which seemed to have been brought in from Holborn, which was then undergoing repair.

The Jew produced a bunch of keys from his pocket, and selecting one, said, "It is, ma tear! I shall show yer de positival goods!" Saying which at the lock of the chest to open it. But somehow it would not open, and dashed all others, till the fellow began to curse the lock, and work himself into a passion. I grew impatient and bawled, and anathematized some absent artist in wood, who swore bitterly, had been meddling, and had tampered with the lock.

At first, the fellow's anxiety to please me, and all at once it occurred to me that he seemed unnatural and feigned; and now the queer reports I had heard of London traps and villainies rushed to my recollection; and the strange immobility of the chest that all was not as it should be. I turned toward the door, intending to depart, when a sudden thought, by flew open, and a figure in the guise of an old woman, supporting herself on a crutch, burred the way.

I say, in the guise of an old woman; for if that apparition were not the female sex I am the man in the moon. I had neven too many minutes beards during the last seven years to be mistaken on that point: the sensible chin covered with a sturdy rufflan of forty, not two hours shaved—I saw it at a glance—and the hard mouth and the blood in my veins bounding back to its source.

The Jew lacked a torrent of abuse at his confederate, and the latter, taking up the cheat, I was too much prepossessed to note his acts or to hear his words. I endeavored to maintain a careless air, but could not withdraw my gaze from the pretended old woman. I heard the box-lid thrown back, and the voice of the Jew reciting the wares within. I made a feint of turning to look at them as they were displayed, and saw the petticoated ruffian feeling with his left hand for what seemed a fragment of a broomstick, which round upon the box with his left hand. Some thing—perhaps my better angel—gave me courage. I struck it without a shudder, and seized fiendly in my grasp—it was a painted bar of iron. My worst suspicions were confirmed in an instant, and at the same moment the villain had his hand on their tools threw off the mask. The bigger ruffian lifted the cover of the chest, and seized a savage blow, which I luckily caught on the iron bar, and which shivered the crutch to fragments. Almost at the same moment the grisly wretch was by the throat. I dashed the heel of the bar into his face, and, as he fell back to the end of the room, carrying my lavender-silk neckt-ie and diamond pin in his hand. I expected the butcher assassin would have followed me out of that by a quick kick against the door—now firmly shut—and shielded himself with the counter, and the Jew, by this time was to be lost—the Jew would recover himself and return to the attack in an instant—heavy tools were lying about—I should be beaten down and slain. Madly I rushed toward the door, and was in the act of poising my weapon for a blow which should crush the skull of the burly ruffian, spite of his force, when suddenly the whole scene shot upward into the air; the last thing I saw was the fire-flushing eye and demoniac grin of my opponent—and I was falling, falling in a gulf of pitchy darkness.

THREE HOURS IN A LONDON DRAIN

FIELD LANE is now a thing of the past. That old-looking bower of dangling silk-banners, lettered with a colony of filthy Jew-fences with villainous faces, and with sleeves studded in skirt and tare of elbow, burrowed and sauttered in darkness and foul odors, has been long banished. London has lost something by the loss of Field Lane.

For more than five-and-twenty years I never have had occasion, or it without a shudder, and never passed, in all that time, its Holborn outlet without hurrying and quickening my pace until it was at least fifty yards in the rear. I am glad at last to see it planted to the ground. You will hardly wonder at that if you read what I am now going to set down.

Men of genius talk and write very fine things about the wondrous celerity of thought, and the freaks of imagination and memory under certain circumstances. I don't understand that kind of psychological subject; but it's all true they say, nevertheless. In those most horrible moments I saw myself a child in arms—a boy at school—an apprentice, shaving my master's customers in the old shop—and, what is more, I saw myself dead and dashed to pieces at the bottom of a frightful chasm, and my mangled body stripped and plundered, then packed away in a hole, out of the world, forever.

But this terrible vision was not destined to be realized. Instead of dashing on the floor of the ravine, I fell among trees into a mass of filthy fluid, the color of which informed me at once that I had been hurled into the common sewer. The drain was deep and I had to exercise some skill as a swimmer before I found my feet. Then, by means of the projections in the vile liquid, the effluvia of which threatened to poison me with every breath I drew, I finally, I had almost said, with more bodily injury by my fall, the force of which had been neutralized by the water, I landed up just at the trap-door through which I had descended was in the act of closing—saw it raised to admit a load, but heard the villains slipping the bolt that secured it. What was to be done? I gave myself up for lost. If I relied on it, none were likely to be sure that the fiends who had compassed my destruction, which, by any alarm on my part would only expose them to the penalty of the law, would not abandon their place? A rough sort of buttress of rubble-work projected from the inside, and in the angle of that I crouched half in the water, and tried to collect my wandering faculties. I was hardly reassured in this position, when a dull gleam shimmered faintly on the surface of the filthy water. The reflection of it came from the trap-door overhead, and waited in horror for what it might portend—half-expecting to see the muzzle of a pistol protruded, held in hand, to make sure of his work. I held my breath, for I knew that the villains were listening, and that the slightest sound from me would seal my doom. Then I heard a lumbering noise above, and the next moment there came a shower of the monster paving-stones which would have crushed the life out of an ox had they fallen on my head. Then the trap closed once more, and again all was darkness.

How long I crouched there, devoured with terror and apprehension, I can not say: To me it appeared an age; it may have been only a few minutes. At last came to the conclusion that there I should die, and not piecemeal, and never be discovered; and then I should have died in my own opinion, if a new cause of apprehension had not roused me. While I was in the height of my fit of despondency a red gleam shot along the dark water, from the distance of some thirty feet up the stream. I looked, and there, through the arch of the overhanging arch, caused by knocking out a few bricks, appeared the face of what I still identified from the compliment I had administered, and with with mingled rage, pain, and anxiety. The wretch held a horn-gutted in one hand, and in the other a lantern furnished with a bull's eye, which threw its searching rays wherever spot it pleased to. I was now sure that my hour was come; but lo! when the flash was turned in my direction, its full force fell on the intervening barrier, and I, lying still as I was I could remain effectually concealed.

Through a small crevice I watched the face of the Jew as he turned his piercing eyes in every direction, and I thought I read in his look and the conviction that I had perished—a conclusion to which he may have been helped by the fact that my hat cast up in the shallows on one side. In that case, I asked myself, what would he do? Would he wait to descend with his partners in crime and plunder my body? I had not a doubt of it—and my only chance lay in the possibility of my life they could not spare. The light which had shown me the Jew's face had shown me also something of the beauties of my position. I was sure that I could not proceed down the stream without getting into deeper water, but that upward the depth was nothing—the flow rippling over stones and offal that lay in its course. Therefore, as soon as the Jew's back was turned, I rose cautiously from my position, and groped my way through the cryptless gloom against the current. I was sure that I still retained my weapon, and it stood me in good stead as I held it above my head, by warning me when to stoop and save my face from the low impending brickwork. When once fairly out of hearing and sight-range of my persecutors—the fear of which I was aware from the angular curves I followed, my spirits began to revive within me, and sounding the hope once more sprang through my mind.

To my great relief, I found as I proceeded that the horrible gloom grew less dense, partly, perhaps, because my sight was becoming habituated to it, but partly also because a few feeble openings in here and there through some of the side-gullies of the drain, the ends of which were separated but by a grating from the street, but which were all too narrow to admit the passage of my body. At first, all I cared for was to hasten on and on, creep and still further away from the blood-thirsty assassins. Once or twice the main channel, or what appeared to be such, had branched off into other channels as large or nearly so. This gave me some concern; as in the case of entering any of these I had hurried onward for some hours, and left the murderous den some miles behind before my limbs began to fail me, and I found myself compelled to stop to recruit my strength by rest. I sat down by a side-drain whence a few rays of light shone in, and resting my head upon my knees, allowed the current to flow under my legs. I could hear where my head the noise of the traffic that rolled along the streets, the rattle of wheels, and the pat, pat of innumerable feet—and the tears sore for the first time started in my eyes, as I wondered whether I should ever again be restored to the busy world above. These melancholy longer I held way, however, put to flight by the tenth of a huge rat, which had crossed my path in the dark gloom of a vice. I had to crush the fellow with my weapon before he would let go, and the next minute had to do battle with another and another brace, which swarmed upon me from all quarters, dashing at my face and hands, and the rats didn't eat him any bit like hounds. It's the truth I'm a-telling' yer. I helped the gals all round was left dead and wounded, and we had to put the bones in a basket; they was all picked clean in a single night. There! I can't bear to think on it. Poor Bill.

This sort of revelation did not tend to reanimate my courage, and I was glad when the main drain, and whistling to his dog, proposed to go.

"The tide will be low enough to let us out," he said, "by the time we gits to the Thames, so we may as well be trackin it."

"And which way do you go?" I inquired.

"The way you came," he said; "there is nothother way."

"Why, I can't attempt it," I cried—and I really could not; my flesh crept with horror at the bare.

The man lifted his lantern to my face, and muttering my evident terror, began to scratch his head and consider to himself.

"There is another way," I said; "they are repairing the sewer somewhere between everybody you can find the places."

"Them repairs is done, an' closed up last night. But you say you did. I was told a guinea, didn't yer?" he asked, in a decided way.

"Yes," I said. "But one above ground, and the money in yours."

"Come along, then," he rejoined. "Step out arter me. I'll make it all right."

He held up his lantern, and struck into a road of sufficient size. I kept close to his heels, and the dog ran yelping before. We soon came to the main drain—descended it some quarter of a mile, and then, turning to the right, to traverse which we had to step to a sitting posture. After a considerable distance we had to bear at the best we could make, my guide stopped at a low outlet not more than twenty inches in diameter, and, by means of a rope which his various burden, began to crawl up the orifice, telling me not to follow him, but to wait where I was for less than a minute. I bawled out: "It's all right;" and the moment after, to my indescribable satisfaction, I heard him, through the aperture, soon above ground. I waited with what patience I could, but thought the confinement would drive me mad. At last I heard a deliver came sliding back again, heels foremost. His reappearance was welcome to me as a ray of hope and the clang of a crowbar on the grating above. My guide now held out his hand for the promised reward.

"Will you not also escape this way?" I asked. "Why, no, sir; I couldn't get my trap through. Besides, the old woman 'd be lookin' out for me at the river-side, an' she'll be wonderin' where the devil I am. No, sir. You're all right now. Just crawl up the drain, an' there you are: there's enough on 'em, I reckon, not to fear bein'-over."

Having recompensed my deliverer beyond his expectations, I followed his directions, more in a dream than with the consciousness of what I was doing. I was hauled out, more dead than alive, at the corner of a narrow lane, among a crowd of people assembled to witness my resurrection. I had barely sense enough to make known my address and landlord, to whose house I was conveyed, I believe, in a cart, upon a bed of straw, after several hours of the most sickening convulsions and declined the honor of my custom.

It was night before I reached home; and from that hour until the twenty-seventh after the day and the night were all alike to me, for I was raging in the delirium of fever, and declaiming loudly on the crimes of murder, and darkness, and skeleton situations, and rats, and gravy-spoons. My poor old landlord had to send for Dr. Sutton from Suffolk to the session of me. But at last I got well again, in spite of the doctor and the old man's fears, and of all the nurse who crammed my mother with the notion that, because in my delirium I talked of rats, I was destined to be one.

The first thing I did when I recovered was to hunt up the person who had thought it worth while to [illegible] from Bow Street, and invaded Field Lane with the authority of the law. It was all to no purpose. The old rookery did not find the villains themselves, but I could not identify even the scene of their exploits. Not one house was in the place, I could only guess at its precise locality —of course could not swear to it. There was a whole inner quarter of it described in the—I mean no trap-door to be discovered in any of the floors; in fact, the whole scene which my terror had so definitely imprinted on my memory had all vanished together, and the search had to be given up.

I dwell upon this seeming mystery most be referred to the time I had lain on a sick-bed, having taken the report of my escape from the sewer reached my intending murderers; and it is likely enough that my deliverer may have talked of his adventure, and so put the assassins on their guard. Thus they had time, and so spare, to effect the metamorphosis of their premises, which deceived the officers of justice, and thus facilitated their escape from the gallows they so richly deserved.

Since then the desire has often crossed my mind whether the police of Bow Street really believed the strange story I told them. Be that as it may, the reader may rely upon its accuracy so far as my memory serves me at this distance of time, and we will hardly wonder that I do not regret the final erasure of Field Lane from the list of metropolitan items.

OLD LETTERS.

CAME they from sincer or from saint,
Cast them in, for the fire is faint;
The fire is faint, and the frost is strong,
And there will be no love less long.

How welcome once it matters not.
Their worth away with time has spot,
The love of the hero, the love is dead,
And the old friend has forgot.

Cast them in! they're hard to keep,
And will not let one's memory sleep;
For hints of age, and tales of change:
Oh, but the tarns of life are strange!

The world has altered like pretty place—
How bright they came, and how dim they part,
Their powder and their heart.

While life and we wear on.

Cast them in! why should they last,
When the light we read them by is past,
When their quite will gild our days?
Up like a sunset goes the blaze:

It is very paper, and burns away;
Some have been treasured up for years,
Some are blotted with heavy tears,
And some are creased and worn.

There are sprinkled with sunny a vow—
The love was never as warm as now;
There be a truster hand were penned:
Woe is me for that friendship's end.

There goes a page of boyish rhyme!
That was a sheet of maiden time,
We took our own way on the sea,
And danced upon the wind at all in time.

One closer curl of wavy gold
Was hid in this lurning letter's fold;
'Tis long since that golden head grew gray,
The dust grows where it once was gay.

Up in its might the brand flame flashes,
And there they lie, in what all our ashes,
Seekings, and strivings, hopes and schemes,
Must come to—dust and ashes!

YEARS AND YEARS AGO.

"Ainsi va ce chosen sont passées Comme l'ombre et comme le vent!"
Victor Hugo.

These things have passed upon their mournful way,
Like the wild wind, and like the shadow gone.

Years and years ago, ere yet my locks were barely nineteen, when we first met. She was the daughter, the only child, of a poor French widow, who had fled from the horrors of the chief of oldest atrocities of the French Reformed Church.

Years and years ago I was about as wild a scape-grace as you would see in any place I could name at this moment. I had been expelled from Cambridge for a row, and was fighting against the proper authorities; I had got into endless scrapes in every position in which my father had tried to establish me; had finished when I was eighteen by throwing off all restraint, crossing the Channel, and, a knapsack on my back, starting on a pedestrian tour through some of the French provinces, not with any object in view sim or object, or intention of any settled plan, but to exercise my usurped liberty, and to get rid of some of the superfluous life my boy-world sent me to rest. Of adventures I had plenty; but the relation of these is little to the point now. At La Rochelle, where, as I called it then, threw Suzanne in my way. Whether she was beautiful or not I hardly know. She was at any rate unlike any one I ever saw before or since:—a little thing with a pair of eyes that prevented my seeing any one else when they were before you—a pair of eyes which, like those of the German fairy, were always in the act of growing larger as I think they were two barley-corns bigger) than any body else's eyes in the world; but which loved me, and impressed me with the fact somehow, and laughed with you, and cried for you, and made you wild with delight, and desperate with despair, every times a day.

From the first time I saw her, I proved her constant admirer. Her mother (guided by those accidents that occur when two people do their best to aid Fate in her arrangements) took lodgings of the most attractive was a garden full of roses, and lilies, and jasmines, and all sorts of beautiful old-fashioned flowers that grow any where; you may plant them, but that can no more get common or worthless for all that, than a nightingale, though if they be supposed to be watered with Champagne. Beyond the garden is what is called a chateau, that is to say, a wood, surrounded by a low turf, moss, and wildflowers, overshadowed with magnificent chestnut-trees, and with a little stream, or rivulet, at the bottom. Only a paling and a wicket landscape-painter. and the wood, and the lot separated the garden and the rivulet. Here, in the long, old-fashioned, one day a right to wander there at will—a privilege of which the peasants in the neighborhood, knowing what I was of employing their time, seldom availed themselves; and it was, except at the chestnut gathering, generally deserted.

So there I used to repair in the glowing July days, with a book, generally, but both unheeded, and, lying on the grass, or leaning against a tree, myself half-hidden, watch for Suzanne. How it is all before me now—before me now, and in me, and about me—Good Heaven, how clearly—after all these years!

The broad, rugged trunks of the trees; the sunlight streaming with a soft, green light through the leaves: the warm, ripe, still heat that quivered before my half-closed eyes; and there, then beyond, through a narrower vista, an opening, as it were, into heaven, in the guise of a little bit of the pastor's garden, blazing in sunshine and flowers. On this my eyes would fix till the angel should come to give it a holier light. Sometimes I walked through the long hours in vain; sometimes I saw her pass and repass, coming and going like alternate sun and shadow, as the place seemed brightened or darkened with her presence and departure. Then, how my heart beat; how I watched, how I listened!—did the guess I was there?—did it add to its value?—was it thankful or indifference that prevented her turning her eyes this way?—Useless. She would not come to day and, cross and sick at heart, I left the house and wandered homeward to mine inn—the bare, hot chambers of which, with the old fumes of bad stale tobacco, were little calculated to soothe the nerves that had been stung and fretted and ruffled in the green, cool, perfumed chestnut-wood.

Next day all would be joy and hope again. Back once more to the sylvan temple, only to hoped to meet the shy goddess. An hour—two—would pass, and then she hosted to and fro across that bit of sunshine, gathering a flower here—tying one up there; watering, trimming, dipping for her own watering-pot, as her eye fell on one of the as I little grassed them, if I were there in the wood watching her. Presently, with a basket on her arm, she would turn into the shade of the arbor, and nearer come her footstep; fuller and fuller throbbed my heart; then, with her hand on the wicket, she would pause; had she changed her mind? would she go back? and at that thought my soul so yearned for her, that it seemed the influence must act to draw her toward me; and sometimes I almost thought it did so, for opening the gate, she stepped into the wood; and slowly, with downcast eyes, raved to and fro, in search, as I believed, of the yellow mushrooms that grow in the chestnut woods in France.

A few moments more, and we were together, she still pursuing her search, though many a mushroom was passed, many another trodden on; I, pacing by her side, speaking low, and at intervals, while she sometimes answered without looking up, sometimes gave me a glance from those marvelous eyes in lieu of other answer; till at last, loud words, and colds encouraging, the timid that at first dared not look in my face, opened all round her waist, the lips that trembled to pronounce her answers parted and whitened.

And now, shall I tell the truth?—a truth that many and many a time since has not only stung me with remorse, but with the thought, What if it hope—Well, will, that may or may not have been. But be my confession!

Young as I was, Suzanne was not the first woman I fancied I had loved; and though the feeling I had for her was widely different from that with which I had regarded others, still it was not then pure, and deep, and fervent as it ought to have been. At first, much as I loved her, much as I desired to obtain her love, I had no thought of indissolubly uniting my destiny to hers by the holy rites of marriage. I contented myself with letting things run their course, whatever they were likely to; with taking no thought, and making no engagement for the future.

At last our meetings in the chataigneraie became things of daily occurrence; and we needed no subterfuges of seclusion and mutual appointments to color them. Sweet, pure, darling Suzanne! Who, in her position, at her age, could have dreamed of the dangers of the situation as she did? She loved me with all the depth and warmth of a profound and passionate nature, yet in the midst of the delirium there was a purity, a starting, instinctive shyness—a turning of the head, a drooping of the eyes, at appearing unconscious of its vicinity—that at once captivated and repelled me. And days drew on to weeks, and still our relative positions remained unaltered.

One day we were in the chataigneraie together, strolling side by side, her hand in mine, when the unusual sound of footsteps rustling 'mid the last year's leaves startled us. We turned hastily, and at a little distance beheld her father.

He was not still in the grave of life. But indifferent health, and a ceaseless activity in the arduous duties of his calling, gave to his spare figure and fine face a worn and impressionable look. I shall never forget him, as, after a moment's pause, he advanced and confronted us. The veins in his bare temples swollen and throbbing with the exertion he sought to control, his face pale and rigid, and his lips compressed.

There was a dead silence for some seconds. Then his kindling eye flashed on his daughter's face, rising to the house, he said, in a low, stern voice, "Go in, Suzanne!" She went without a word.

"And then, young man," he said, "since she was out of hearing, "thus, for the gratification of a passing fancy, to kill the time you have on hand, to disgrace of you blot an honest and hitherto stainless name. You think a father's heart; you turn from her God—you destroy body and soul—you make motherless and unprotected. I will not tell you what Suzanne has been to me. I have labored for her, worked, hoped, prayed for her, loved and trusted her. All these things are, doubtless, tame and commonplace and contemptible to you. But if you had no fear of God or consideration for man before your eyes, could you not have had a little feeling, a little pity, an atom of respect for a father and daughter entrusted as you know us to be? Knowing, moreover, that it is my duty to be found in the hands of the Minister of God to avenge the wrong and shame done him by the vilest and other dishonored father adopt?"

Utterly absorbed and conscience-stricken, I strove to explain; but my emotion, and the sudden difficulty that came over me in expressing myself adequately in a foreign language—fluently as, under ordinary circumstances I spoke it—were little calculated to reassure him.

"No," he said, "I know all. Your daily meetings, your prolonged interviews, a certain embarrassment I have lately noticed in my child, hitherto so frank and fearless; her altered looks and manner—even note the demeanor of both when I surprised you—what can I conclude from such indications?"

"I swear to you," I at length found words to explain, "that your daughter is wholly and perfectly innocent. Think of me as you will, but at least believe me in this, and assure yourself that your child is stainless."

He looked at me inquiringly for some seconds; then his face and voice relaxed. "I believe you! I believe you! Judge you can now do, after my sincere in your wish to repair this evil. Promise me you will never see Suzanne again, and that you will never, by any means, quit this neighborhood."

I promised, and we parted.

How I passed that night it needs not now to tell, nor all the revolution the thoughts it brought worked in my mind. I should be able to recount a homelier result was, that next morning at dawn I rose from my sleepless bed, and, without a word, quitted my host's daughter's hand; not concealing the difficulties of my position, but adding that if he would overlook my present material disadvantages he might trust that no sin of omission or commission on my part should ever cause him to regret his having accorded his sanction to our marriage, and that I feared not but that with time, patience, and perseverance, I should be able to secure a means of existence. At nineteen it is so easy to dispose of these questions in the abstract—so easy to clear every thing and to dispense with every thing.

The answer came quickly, brought by the postman.

"You are an honest lad," he said. "I will not now enter into the question of your means to wed that of Suzanne. My child's reputation is at stake, and she is deeply attached to you. That of your progress is one we have yet to discuss. But the first neglect to be entered upon and fully explained is that of your not having communicated with me. In the first place, by the law of France, which is, I believe, different to that of England, no man or woman under the age of twenty-one requires anything proof of their parents' acquiescence. In the second, even were it otherwise, I should myself hold myself bound, for conscience' sake, not to take advantage of the most desirable proposal, if it were made against the will of those who have the watching of yours. Are you likely to obtain this?"

Here was a case that I had never anticipated nor provided for. I had thrown off all authority, deeming my own sufficient for my governance, and now, at the first encounter, I was to be put to proof its inefficiency to get me through my earliest difficulty. Knowing I must not, could not, would not admit my mistake, and ask my father's consent to my marriage, was it in the least likely that he would, under the circumstances, consent to it?

Never mind. I must make the attempt, and so, hesitating, I told him that I had not yet received for such a contingency, he left me to write to my father.

A week of agonizing suspense passed, during which I, in accordance with a promise made to Suzanne's father, kept away from the house, lest to avoid a shadow of suspicion, never even went to our chestnut-wood to get a peep of her in the garden.

At last the letter came, sad, sick with agitation, I tore it open. It was short, but not unsatisfactory, but yet not different to what I deserved, and what I expected.

My father said he had reflected much on my demand; that he saw many reasons why he should refuse it, yet was unwilling to withhold my wishes when they pointed to any course that was not likely to lead me into moral mischief, and that afforded me a chance of obtaining employment. Therefore, that if I could provide him proofs of my intended father's character and means, which should be presented then, he would not withhold his permission.

This was easily done. Proud and elate, I boldly presented myself at the presbytery, and within a month we received the answer to all our hopes and difficulties that the French laws, which seem especially framed to throw every possible obstacle, hindrance, and petty vexation in the way of the impatient lover, could find to circumvent us.

I look back to the days of old, through the spectacles — though a little dimmed, now and then—of years and years; and we Suzanne, the wife of my youth, as I saw her a hundred times in the old girl I remember to have known then. A hopeful, happy, foolish pair, we were, indeed, in the days of love; seeing all things, each other included, quite other than they were; yet so confident in themselves, in their experience, their knowledge, their precision; living from day to day, like the birds on the branch, as if all the world were their storehouse, and no to-morrow were before them; quarreling and making up our friends again; fretting about a look or a word; jesting and laughing; involving the most important material interests; received and returned marriage presents; and flower presented and lent; not a thought or a care or gold surpassing.

The place was to endeared to me and Suzanne, and her father felt so reluctant to part, that I resolved—and my father, with his usual kindness, made reasonable allowance, not objecting—to settle, for a time, at all events, in the neighborhood of La Rochelle.

So we took a little house in the midst of a garden, within five minutes' walk of the town, where, as there was set up our household, served by a plump Rochelaise cook, with her clear cotton gown, gold and gold ear-rings, heart and cross, were, on Sundays, the admiration of the place; and a lad emancipated from sabots to work in the garden and help Nannie in the rougher occupations of the house.

* The "carpet" is the hood-dress peculiar to La Rochelle and its neighborhood. It consists of a frame-work furred upright on the head, round which is loosely folded a dark satin dress three or four yards long, and about half a yard wide, of close muslin, bordered at each edge with lace, and terminating in a rounded end, pinned in front. Considerable skill and practice are necessary to attach the caped properly, as it is arranged on the head.

He fell in love with her, I remember, and he being some years her junior, and she being rather a belle and virtuous withal, she was moved by all these united considerations to box his ears on his attempting to demonstrate the state of his feelings by trying to kiss her when, attired as above recorded, her beauty shone forth too resplendent for him to succeed in controlling his youthful passion.

Baffle a year was out the two children had a doll to put in the baby-house, and to play with from morning till night. They were very constantly, and worshiped it, and had moments of jealousy about it, and quarrelled over it, and made it a miracle of genius and intellect, when to stranger eyes it was a thing of nothing but sleeping and sucking, and stretching its toes before the fire.

When it should walk! Oh, when it should walk, and run, and dance, and be a child of mischief! When it did, the child-mother lay in her grave in the Protestant cemetery at La Rochelle, and the boy-father took it then to his dwelling on his staff.

When I first awoke from the stunning effect of the blow I got from a ship that, going full fling, a tremendous breaker, stands for a moment paralyzed and grieving; then staggers blindly on, without rudder or compass—holds away in the general run.

The wild spirit within me, which the peaceful and innocent happiness of the last two years had soothed and stilled, broke forth again; and my first impulse was to rush from the scene of my lost felicity, and, in a fit of reckless adventure, seek to lose myself in the recollection of all I had won, all I had been bereft of, in that short space.

Think God, I had the child, and I had the doll.

And now, at twenty-one, when most men have hardly made their first start in life, I, a father and widower, was left to the first steps of my manhood's career, and was about to gather up the shattered fragments of my youth's hopes and affections, and try to patch them together to carry me through the rest of it.

I left my father, now all affection and sympathy since the change my marriage had brought, to regard my interests, and went to England.

But this a strange feeling, partaking perhaps more of jealousy than any thing else, made me decline doing. Sir Mabel. Wadeler was the person used to call her, half believing that that was really the translation of his name, I had now communicated all the love and interest of my life. Here she was all my own, I was all hers; nothing, nobody could lay claim to her affections, the time, or the attention of either, so as to distract it from the other. No one could be expected to take any part or share either to the excision or prejudice, in however slight a degree, of the other.

My child had no governess; no one else, therefore, however near or dear, should in any degree supply her place had no part. I would be all and every thing to her; and if she never missed her mother, it should be to me alone she should owe it. A foolish though, perhaps a selfish one, I may say; but who shall say, resting from what it doubtless saved me?

Happily the child was healthy, sweet-tempered, and really, all paternal illusions apart, singularly beautiful and intelligent. By the way, my little Queen Mab! I see her now, as in her black frock and straw hat she used to carry her dear doll in the still warm evenings, when the glow and the glare of the day had passed by, and the sea-breeze stirred the roses in the garden.

With her I did not feel quite so frightfully alone. Her signs, her utterances, her looks, her joys, her fulnesses, her caresses, her ceaseless claims on my aid and attention, withdrew me as nothing else could from overbrooding over my loss. Later, when I could bear it—I could not for a long time—I used to take her to the Protestant chapel, where was wont to watch for Suzanne; and sitting there as of old, leave her to play on the grass beside me, while, with half-closed eyes, I gazed on the glowing spot at the end of the green walk, dreaming, dreaming, with a yearning so vain, so hopeless, that what used to cross it, of the footstep that used to come along that shaded alley, of the peace with the hand on the wicket. Yes, I remembered that now not all the yearning and craving of my soul could, as I knocked it of old, bring Suzanne any nearer to me; and then my grief and desolation would find vent in passionate tears, and the child, who was too young to see me weep, and be shocked, as children mostly are, would climb up on my knees, and kiss my face, and put her arms round me, and kiss and soothe me with her sweet baby caresses.

It was a great though secret joy to me that, though gentle and tractable to all, she could be said to love no one but me. I think she excited pastor guessed the existence of this feeling; for, fond as he was of the child, and strong and natural was seem his claims to her affection, he never seemed to put them conspicuously forward, or to attempt in any way to interfere with her monopolizing.

For this, even more than for his many other proofs of regard and kindness, I was deeply grateful. I encouraged little to be familiar with him; but though she showed deference and duty, and even returned his caresses, I could see, with pain and sympath, that her heart was not in her acts, and that as soon as she thought she might without offense return to his, reaching the pearled drops that lay in its cup, then racing away suddenly, wild with strong young life, prancing and plunging in imitation of a high-mettled steed, or chasing the kitten that was not more graceful or lithe of limb than she.

And so on, till the opening of my latticn announced that I was astir. Oh, the sunshine of the radiant face! She had her mother's wondrous eyes, and with a fine fair English complexion and warm light-brown English hair. Then piled up the narrow stair-case came the quick step, the door was flung open, and in two bounds she was on my bed, hugging and kissing me, laughing, patting my cheeks, her fresh, sweet cool face against mine, and chattering the strange mixed dialect between French and English, that was the delight of my then purest happiness.

Then off again, like a butterfly, opening my beds, examining my boots, and my self looking solemnly curious at the sound; turning over my clothes, scribbling wild flourishes on my paper with pen or pencil, and quick as flight of bird, away again to announce to Nannie that "le grand Monsieur" was awake, and, true to rule, and so hungry, so hungry for his breakfast.

And so through the day, however I might be occupied, whether in my sawyer from me for an hour. Light and restless, like some winged thing, she was in and out of the room in the bright sun, and on all the live-long day; dancing, singing, talking to herself, when I was too occupied to attend to her, and then coming and to me to be raised upon than the sunshine that streamed in at my window, and the warm air that built and carried on the roses above it. Long walks we used to take together, she bounding by my side, now clinging to my hand, now dropping off at her wild desire to pull up and arms were full, all beaming and joyous with a happiness that, even in the bright hours, would lengthen, the step shorten, and the small money I always carried in my pocket to provide against such emergencies was brought home to me and given with willing hand and gentle words of pity and consolation, and for a time the pain for the little heart and brain were yet oppressed with the impression and the sight of suffering.

In the evenings, by the waning sunlight or the winter fire, we should climb to my knee, chinning a story; and I, whether I related remembered history, or improvised some original one, there she sat, with raptured face, gazing on mine, those eyes so full of wonderful interest, that, child as she was, showing the glistening teeth; putting in now and then some natural question, and, before long at the close of the narrative to muse over it and fully digest certain points that had made a deeper impression than the rest of the tale. Then, as the light fell and the stillness of evening deepened into night, her head drooped upon my knee, and, like a folded flower, the blossom that brightened and perfumed my lonely life, slept quietly, while I, sad and silent, wandered musingly through the past.

I look back now to that period of my life, and spite it is not from it when I see myself alone, it is one I knew, whose affections, cares, and troubles were as my own to me, but whose thoughts, interests, and occupations were not to what they then were hold, and on which I now act. The child sense of the word "home" had for me become every—the slightest—detail concerning her; she comes before me in my lonely hours like the remembrance of vivid scenes in a romance long ago; some vision sent to cheer and brighten my pathway, and which became long part of my existence that then seemed drawing on to its close.

We knew so little what we can live through and ever, till the moment is matured in the things that have been! till the pages on which are inscribed in black letter the events of our lives are turned, and those that contain pleasanter passages are laid over them!

Mabel had achieved her tenth year before I had reached my thirtieth birthday: and all that time we had never been a day separated. I had never lived any other life than the life I have been describing.

I had taught her to read and write, Nannie had taught her to sew; but other accomplishments I had none, and by that strange jealousy of other interference, partly a horror I could not control of subjecting my fairy to the drudgery of learning, stood like a lurking demon in the other aid to advance her education. It was better that it should be so. I was always glad now to think that I did as I had done.

My child had been, for me, not given. Her mother was dead and nothing in the marriage and help influence was granted to tame and save me. Perhaps it was well that she was taught to heal me through the first stages to heaven!

The task accomplished, He saw fit to recall the loan.

It is thirty years and upward now since Mabel died.

I have buried another wife since then, and two fair children; and four more yet remain to me.

They are good, dear children to me, most better and handsome boys and girls too. But they are those of them like my May, my little fairy queen—and I am not sorry; it is natural—the best loved.

PICTURES OF DOMESTIC LIFE.

THE two pictures on the following page are from exhibition now open at the Royal Academy. One of them is by Mr. J. J. Hill, and is contributed to the Exhibition of the Society of British Artists. It represents The Ballad, and is a very sweet domestic scene. A pretty country girl, resting from her labors in the cool shade, is regaled by the declamation of a ballad which is spread out before her on a crockshead. Over her shoulder, a young lad, with much more of vehemence than of grace, and who is usually the case with form boys, gazes at "The Lover's Parting" with as much interest as if he expected, at no distant day, to realize the scene in his own experience.

The other picture represents a childish piece of coquetry, and is entitled "Hook my Frock!" Mr. W. Hemsley is the author, and the picture hangs in the British Institution, Pall Mall, London. The coquetry of the little girl, and the voluptuous amusement and roguishness of the boy are happily depicted.

GOOSE!

He must have been seated opposite the nuisance, the reader will say, of course. But why this exhumation of foul should be a by-word for ridicule in our discourse, and an object of abomination at polite tables, is a riddle not easily explained.

Every one knows that the Roman State was saved by the cackling of geese—but which has not been lent upon misery of our digestion? Among the Romans the gander and his spoon were a favorite and fashionable dish; but learned commentators maintain that the particular breed to which the commonwealth was so much indebted was preserved, with its instinctive watchfulness—circumstance, doubtless, much deplored by the epicures of that day, since it became impossible to have a capital goose for dinner. Then, as now, the little giblets were thought a great delicacy, and good livers deemed the livers good; for does not Horace say—

"And a white goose's liver,
Stuff'd fat with figs, bespoke the curious giver"?

Queen Elizabeth was cutting up a goose when she learned that the Spanish armada had been cut up by a Drake. The goose has even had its poet—as witness, in his post-prandial apophthegm:

"O bird most meet! although there are Uncommon cannons on a common.
What man or woman
Can in one single term impugn
A proper name for flesh? An ancient Roman
Would answer, Anser. Sure I am that no man,
Knowing thy various affiliation, would
To call thee Goose!"

TAKE LIFE AS IT IS MADE.

Take it just as though it was—as it is—an earnest, vital, essential affair. Take it just as though you personally were born to live your life, performing a merry part in it—as though the world had waited for your coming. Take it as though it were a grand opportunity to do and to achieve, to carry forward great and good schemes; to help and cheer a suffering, weary, it may be heart-broken fellow creature. The fact is, life is underrated by a great majority of mankind. It is not made half as much of as should be the case. Where is the man or woman who accomplishes one tithe of what might be done? No one can set back the sands of time's restless feet, plans unchecked, thoughts crushed, aspirations unfulfilled, and all as it should be for want of the necessary and possible effort! If we knew better how to take and make the most of life, it would be far greater than it is. Every man or woman stands aside from the crowd, labors earnestly, steadfastly, confidently, and accomplishes in one success famous for wisdom, intellect, skill, greatness of some sort. The world wonders, admires, idolizes; and yet it only idolizes success, and not the do it he takes hold of life with a purpose. If a man bet up by set, and followed in the path marked out by reason he may not expect to accomplish. There is no magic, no miracle, no secret by him who life is to be had and determined in spirit.

—In considering upon the prominent characteristics of those men whom the world unites to call great, we feel invariably that it was their patient industry that was one final aim in life, and judicious resistance of difficulties in their way, which gave them their place upon the world's eroll of fame. Let be the watchword now, as it has been in all time. With this, says an Italian proverb,

"Demosthenes, that poor, stuttering son of a collier, became the most famous orator of ancient times. Virgil, the son of a baker, the most celebrated of Latin poets. Asop, the son of a slave, and also a slave himself, managed to acquire unperishable fame. Thomas Mudiey, the son of a butcher, became cardinal of the Church of Rome, and, next to the king, in the days when the powerful person in the English dominions. William Shakspeare, also the son of a butcher, yet one of the most famous poets the world has ever beheld. Oliver Cromwell rose from a comparatively humble station to be Protector of the English Commonwealth. Benjamin Franklin, who in his early days was a journeyman printer, subsequently became one of the most celebrated philosophers and statesmen. William Gifford, the editor of the Quarterly Review in Albemarle-street, was born in a humble shoemaker's apprentice, and, for want of paper, obliged to work his algebraic problems upon leather with an awl. Robert Burns, a plowman of Ayrshire, in Scotland, afterward the greatest of Scotch poets. James Cook, for a long time, was but a common sailor, but afterward, on voyages of discovery, sailed three times round the world. Sir Henry Taylor was a barber's boy, and afterward D.D. Thomas Tolfrey, the great civil engineer, was once a shepherd's boy. Ralph Allen was once a journeyman carpenter, and then the chief architect of his age. Hulley, the astronomer, was the son of a poor soap-boiler. Haydn, the composer, the son of a poor wheelwright. Haley, the chemist, was the son of a weaver. Smeaton was one of the most eminent engineers, were both of them, at one time, merely makers of mathematical instruments. And when you have read the lives of all these, ask yourself whether perseverance had not as much to do in making those men great as any other quality which they possessed."

DON'T ye see?

Mr. De Forest, author of "European Acquaintance," not an Irish doctor who cherished the old English idea that fighting is an essential part of a boy's education.

"Why, I'll tell ye an anecdote," said he. "Just before I left Ireland the little son of one of my old friends came to me—a bright little fellow, that I take an much delight in as if he was me own. So I told me how another boy had been insulting him. 'Well,' says I, 'an' what did ye do to him?' Says he, 'I hit him so, right aside of his head.' 'Well, says I, 'ye did wrong; ye shouldn't have hit him that way; ye should have hit him so, straight forward from the shoulder, and right between the eyes.' That's the kind of advice that I think is good for boys. Don't you see?"

—KINSAN, in "The Happy Home," speaks pertinently of the

which is so ruinous to the mental as well as physical constitutions of children in America.

"They are sent to school when they should be in the open air or in the fields; they are learning to read before they have well learned to talk; and instead of permitting the mind freely to drink in all the knowledge it can through the senses or by imitation, it is bowed down to study before it can comprehend what it is taught as a parrot, and before the body or mind has the requisite vigor to endure the evil influences of confinement. And all these evils are aggravated by sending them to dumpy and incompetent schools, where they are studied the laws of mind, and know nothing of the art of teaching that which is taught. Regulate the mind on the principle that the fruits of autumn should precede the buds of spring and the blossoms of May and June. Accustom it to think coolly and to breathe a confined air, and with the first of the two you will have a sickly mind; with the ways before them, their bodily powers are soon exhausted; they become diseased and nervous; their brain is liable to inflammation; any premature death often ensues! Indeed, many of our oldest physicians trace the insanity which is filling our asylums to the neglect of the physical training of children, and to the foolish, if not sinful, anxiety of parents to make their children learn."

—"SELF-MADE MEN" are said to be the most useful. If one young men who obtain expensive education in colleges or academies and begin professional life with that accumulation of facts which is called an education, they would soon discover the grossness of error which it is not to hoard away, but to use every day, that we should get truth and wisdom.

SELF-INSTRUCTION

"is the one great object of rational education, and mind as well as body we are indebted to it, only that we may afterward become sane; dependent upon others, in other than we must educate them. Such lessons as may tend eventually to our edification on an independent basis of our own. The knowledge of facts, or what is generally called learning, however much we may possess of it, is useful so far only as it forms the groundwork of a mental frame-work; but useless so long as we suffer it to lie in a heap, inert and without form. The interstices of ideas, compared with the information, is like the law compared with faith; a distinction of expression, though not always a knowledge master to lead us on to a state of greater worthiness, and there give up the charge of us."

In the name of the Prophet, Potatoes!

—The body-servant of Mahomet, whose name has been described in web-rusted strain as he here and he Allen, the "Prophet" of the "Green Mountain boys of "succotash" tout, the potato.

"Planted originally in the mountains of Peru the potato possesses the qualities which distinctly mark it as the destined food—in part, at least—of a large portion of mankind. Its cultivation is easy; every climate except the very warmest and the very coldest; more sensitive to frost than even the dahlia or geranium, it will be seen in perfection in every region of the globe except the tropics or the Arctic circle. During the whole period of summer it makes its way and arrives at maturity in every part of the temperate zone. It is not attacked by insects that are not much larger than a strawberry; under the festering hand of culture they swell to tremendous dimensions in the sun. Yet it is far more productive, when brought to perfection by cultivation, of food for the use of man than any cereal; it yields, on an equal space, three times as much for his sustenance as the best wheaten crop."

Potatoes follow a law of nature.

POTATO—not mad the Decay of Civilization.

Indeed, it is a fact of which there is no question, that, like the ancestor and prolific potato, the human race may be propagated by slips.

—Mr. Herbert Spencer, however, of which it is the attendant as I support, the potato involves in itself the seeds of its own decay. It is the food of the most advanced stages, which threaten exhaustion as great to the physical necessities of man as the depravity of the soil. Some nations, wealthy and luxurious society does to his moral. But the wisdom of Nature has provided against both these evils as well as for the other—like the human race, the succulent and prolific plant can be propagated by seminal decay as well as by the propagation of slips. Hence the new and untainted race be induced by the planting of fresh seeds in a fresh soil, and the potato, which has been degraded by a long course of artificial culture."

—MOTHERS can not commence too early the religious training of their children.

DEVOTIONAL FEELINGS

"should be impressed as early as possible on the infant mind; and it is not too much to say that a child, to feel the full force of the idea of God, ought never to remember the time when he did not love Him. We should endeavor to impress his mind by commencing religion with a variety of amiable objects, such as flowers, birds, and all that gives delight to the young mind with wonder or delight; thus, by deep, strong, and permanent associations, we lay the best foundation for practical devotion in future life. He who has early been accustomed to see the Creator in the visible appearances around him, to feel His continual presence, and to lean upon His daily protection, though his religious ideas may be mixed up with many errors which his reason will ultimately refine away, his mode large advances toward that habitual piety, without which religion can rarely regulate the conduct, and will never warm the heart."

—HEAR what says a self-made man on

Inherited Wealth:

"The less you leave your children when you die the more they will have when they leave afterward. Wealth inherited should be the incentive to exertion. Instead of that, 'it is the titled-deed to sloth.' The only money that does a man good is what he earns himself. A ready-made fortune, like ready-made clothes, seldom fits the man who comes in possession. Aimless, stimulated by hope and a half-filled purse, has a power that will triumph over all difficulties, beginning with the rich man's unsteadiness, and leaving off with the envious man's malice."

Happiness.

"A happy childhood," says Isaac Taylor, in his "World of Mind,"

"is a precious inheritance, with which, as a fund, is largely blended the practical wisdom and active usefulness. It is a great thing only to have known by experience that tranquil, tempered happiness which really attaches to our earth; and we should think so, if we knew how many have pursued a reckless career in search, or chiefly because, they early learned to think of happiness as a chimera, and believed momentary gratifications to be the most substantial good within the reach of man. Practical happiness is much oftener thrown away than sought after; but it is the most ready to be pursued, and overtaken, and husbanded by those who already possess the most essential elements of their lives, have been happy. To have known nothing but misery is the most portentous condition under which human nature can start on its course."

—HERE are a few gems gathered by the wayside:

Children.

"The man who has never tried the compendiship of a little child has carelessly passed by one of the greatest luxuries of life, or wasted a rare flower without plucking it or knowing its value."

Nonsense.

Sense that happens to differ from your own.

Precept

is instruction written in sand, and washed away by the tide; example is instruction engraved on rock.

True Politeness

is the last touch of a noble character. It is the gold on the spire, the weight on a well-built arch, the smile on the face of the noble knight lowering his sword-point to his lady-love.

Music

hath credible, and children will believe it; makes goodness lovely, and they will love it; make holiness cheerful, and they will be glad of it.

—THOSE poured at your own shoulder—generally find fifty great coat, above the fair worth—her loom offered as a definition of the word

Country.

We read that Minerva threw away the flute when she found that it puffed up her own cheeks, but if we, nowadays, cast away the flute, it is to use a more effective instrument of puffing by blowing our own trumpet. Empty minds are the most prone to rear above their proper sphere, like paper balloons, which the lighter they are the higher they go; while minds better stored are prone to humility, like heavily laden vessels, of which we see the less the more they are deeply laden. Shakspeare. The corn bends downward when its ears are well filled; it is the empty heads that wave highest in the field. Nevertheless, it sometimes happens that a really great man is also a great self-admirer—as was the case with Nostradge, the artist, whose intellectual powers were equal to his professional talent, and who used to say, with a smile, that a man to be his superior than his equal. Being once asked by Sir William Knighton what he thought of the Prince Regent's taste, "Taste!" said he, contemptuously with him."

"Why, his Royal Highness says he knows you."

"I know me! Pooh! that's all his brag!"

—THE above was a genuine case of Self-admiration.

Recollections says: "We always love those who admire us, but we do not always love those whom we admire." To which latter clause such a case as that of Northcote's may be put in as an exception, for he loved to the source of self-admiration. Moreover, this is the subject of all loves, for you and I, reader, may indulge in it without fear of a rival.

—HERE is a bundle of definitions by our own Solomon:

Coldness

A vow by which the priesthood in some countries contrive to contest themselves with the wives of other people.

Challenge:

Calling upon a man who has hurt your feelings to give you satisfaction by shooting you through the body.

Ceremony:

That which is considered necessary by many people in religion and friendship.

Charity:

The only thing we can give away without losing it.

Blushing:

A suffusion least seen in those who have most need to be excited.

Autobiography:

Drawing a portrait of yourself with pen and ink, knowing an accurate likeness by carefully omitting all the bad features you have, and putting in all the good ones that you have not. A species of moral and intellectual suicide, to which the act against needlessly taking life should be rigorously applied.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"A STRONG Norwegian" wishes to say, that the statement that the Prince Norwegians, on the first night of peace, dozed not beneath what they supposed were thundering off fire, is not true. He adds: "After one to inform you that wild roses are growing in latitude 64° Southern Norway, at Bergen and Drontheim, and that the abounds with all varieties of roses; oranges, grapes, etc., are cultivated there, and are plentiful. Norwegians from the south of Norway are only frozen when they have made acquaintance with the Arctic Circle."

THE REAM OF DEVOTION.

As sorrow is answered,
I never could find a good reason
Why sorrow is answered at all,
And all the bright joys of life's reason
Be driven entirely away.
Our cares would make no more emotion,
Were we to our lot but resigned.
Then pebbles thrown into the ocean,
That love creates a ripple behind.

The world has a spirit of beauty,
Which visits the mind of the best—
And, while it discharges its duty,
Do Providence bless it at last;
That spirit's the beam of devotion,
Which lights the whole heart to its close,
And sets, like the sun in the ocean,
Which vanished far from its rest.

A lie always needs a truth for a handle to it, else the fraud would not be carried which ought to be driven upon another. The word lies, therefore, are three times as long as the truth—hands enough.

At Newburyport a pious wife entreated a dissipated husband to go to meeting with her. He replied that he would, if one would pay him for his time. Whereupon Mr. Kenrick, that he would have the rum whether she gave it to him or not, and that he would be warm, and went to the meeting. When they returned she procured the liquor for him, and he slowly drank it. Before he had finished something better, and he now gives evidence of being a changed man.

In Louisiana, in one of the Parish Courts, his Honor Judge Bullard was presiding. "Prisoner," said he, "they usually call him. Old Ky was passing sentence on a culprit at the bar, when the prisoner interrupted him.

"Prisoner, stand up!" Mr. Rettler, this Court is not for the purpose of passing sentence of the law upon you, Sir. This Court has no doubt Mr. Rettler, that you have been guilty of the crime of which you are convicted, but the Court has also no doubt of the fact that of that in any view this Court abhors, it is intemperance. What has been the cause of intemperance, Mr. Rettler, it was considerably inclined to drink; and the friends of the Court have interfered in his behalf, and during the intervening time, and this Court had not stopped short of, and stopped the case of intoxicating liquors. But, Mr. Rettler, Sir, but what this Court, Sir, would have been in the Penitentiary or the prison."

"Why slave so," said Cousin, "your lifetime for gold? Contentment is better than wealth, I am told." "Content!" the poor wretch cried, "that is, to get, to get, "It ought to be in Heaven," the Parson said.

A sailor stopped out of the regicide of a ship of war, rouse fifteen or twenty feet, and fell groaning on the deck of the First Lieutenant.

"Wretch!" said the officer, after he had gathered himself up, "what has the devil got to do with you?"

"Sir sure, I came from the North of Ireland, yer honor."

LOL Mosier says it is strange to see what pains men will venture to take to avoid labor, and how very little pains they take to hold on to them.

"Mr. Smith, you said you once officiated in the pulpit and you must have had a fine time, I suppose?"

"No, Sir; I hated the light for the man who did preach."

"Ah, that's not uncommon among the laity." They suppose that the discourse come directly from you."

"No, Sir; I knew that it came from the Bible."

"Why are there so few convicts in the Michigan Penitentiary?" asked a friend of Governor Barry of new notoriety.

"Why," said Sam, "they send them by the Pontiac Railroad, and their time expires before they get there."

Admitting yourself out of Court" is a legal phrase which is frequently used in the Courts of Justice, and by which you are to understand that the plaintiff or cause of action was withdrawn by the Irishman who boasted that he had often admitted himself out of a scrape. "Sorry sirrah!" exclaimed an auditor—"that is a great distance: it must have been a considerable effort to get so far off himself." "To be sure it was; I admit that," said the ingenious Hibernian.

"Who is he?" said a passer-by to a policeman, endeavoring to raise an intoxicated individual who had fallen into the gutter. "Who is he? Why, he's a gentleman as ever count of himself." "Of course not; how can you expect an account from a man who has lost his senses?"

Why is a donkey like a venison steak? Because he's a hard to kill.

What is the best key for a Christmas box? A tur-key.

An old settler out West, who was elected Justice of the Peace, could not write, and was in a quandary how to endorse him in a bond to appear before a looking-glass and write his name.

Punch is merry over the threats of France, and jingles rhymes in Jonasy Chapman's fun after this fashion:

Louis, Louis, the night comes on,
The French Colonel's proposal for shooting or
Is heard in the air,
He cares not for Louis Napoleon's black boots,
And if he comes here he'll be sure to get his.
He lost sharps his shoulders, and "get it on his"?
"It upon it," the gentleman says I lose "it"?

Mr. P.'s little daughter came running to her aunt one morning, and said, "Aunt Kate, little Sam has swallowed a button!" Seeing her terror, her aunt calmly replied, "Well, what good will that do her?" She said very seriously, "Not any good as I see, unless she sews it on before she dies."

"Messrs. Editors,—Permit me, through your columns, to call your attention to a valuable medicine. My great aunt has been striving to reach heaven for twenty years. Almost every Sunday she has had the hope of the 'retired clergyman' whose 'sands of life have nearly run out.' She gathered around her the 'Judges of Judea, from which she gained strength, judging from the violence of her prayers. But, alas! the violence and her strength so increased that she was able to stand up day and night without intermission, and has now absolutely locked her in heaven. Thus, in a few years of time, she has lost the hope of twenty years. Any person afflicted of a contrary are realized for the sum of seven dollars and twenty-five cents."

Real or landed property is either held in fee or for an estate of freehold, or for a term of years. A fee in its simple includes all the interest in the land. A fee tail or feudo has been transmitted to an heir of the granted, where a judge, who inducted himself to the land, and "I'd have to last glance, "I'd have you to see what you've had been afraid to see," asked a learned clergyman of the Presbyterian persuasion, in the presence. His course was that he had been turning the work of Cole upon John into verse. The judge called for a sample, when the clergyman thus gravely delivered:

"A tenant in fee-simple is he
That shall have forever and his heir;
For I'd have you to know and to say,
'Tis to him and his heirs forever!"

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

Franklin Square, Monday, May 3, 1858.

The foreign trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending May 1, 1858	$1,501,487....	$1,256,093
Corresponding week, 1857	4,790,774....	884,523
Decrease	$3,289,287
Increase		$371,570

As will be perceived, the imports continue to fall off; private letters from Europe state that there never was a time when they had so few orders to fill from this side.

Money continues to abound; it is not likely that the Banks will show less than thirty-five millions this afternoon. Loans are freely made on good mercantile paper or stocks at 4 and 5 per cent. The specie movement of the week was as follows:

Received from California	$1,486,565
Received from Europe	165,000
	$1,651,565
Sent to Europe	136,873
Balance in favor of Banks	$1,514,792

Stocks, after a very dull week, brightened up on Saturday, and closed at an advance of about two per cent., with a very strong demand. The plethora of money seems to be driving the outside public into the stock market. The closing prices were, N. Y. Central, 90; Erie, 25¼; Reading, 48½; Illinois Central, 93; Panama, 107¼; Hudson, 31¼; Michigan Southern, 27½; Galena, 90; Rock Island, 79½; Michigan Central, 63½.

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

New York, Monday, May 3, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been freely supplied throughout the week with most kinds of Flour, and though the demand has been good, mainly for home use, prices closed in favor of buyers....Grain of all descriptions was also more abundant at reduced rates, yet purchasers did not operate with much spirit....Navigation was generally resumed on the State Canals on the 28th ult....Cotton opened pretty briskly, but it closed tamely, at an advance of about ⅛ c. per pound....Pork has attracted less attention, and holders have been obliged to make some concessions....Lard was in good request at buoyant prices up to the close, when a reaction occurred leading to a decline....Beef was freely purchased at rising figures....Coffee, Teas, Sugars, and Rice were in fair request. Prices were firm for all save Sugars, which declined ⅛ @ ¼ c. per pound....Hay has been more inquired for at firmer rates....Hemp, Hops, and Grass Seeds ruled quiet....Hides and Leather attracted considerable attention at uniform quotations for desirable lots....Domestic Wool was in fair demand and was more firmly held....Domestic Tobacco was moderately dealt in at former prices....Desirable styles of Dry Goods continued to find ready buyers on satisfactory terms.

The Country Produce Markets continue rather quiet, with free receipts of new Vegetables, prices of which favor purchasers....Apples are quite scarce, and held higher....Eggs are coming in in very large quantities, and rule low, the demand being somewhat restricted.

HUGH MILLER.

Just Published, from early Glasgow sheets, by special arrangements,

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF HUGH MILLER,

Author of "Testimony of the Rocks," "Old Red Sandstone," "Footprints of the Creator," "Schools and Schoolmasters," &c., &c. Prepared by Thomas N. Brown, the eminent Scotch Divine. Muslin, with Steel Portrait, 12mo. Price $1 00.

The life of so remarkable a man as HUGH MILLER, can not fail to excite attention and interest. Born in the lowest ranks of life, his indomitable will and wonderful genius raised him among the master spirits of science. The volume announced above presents a genial and appreciative picture of this marvelous man. Written by one of his most intimate friends, a former co-laborer with him on the celebrated "WITNESS" newspaper, and a resident in the same house with the subject of his Memoir, the author had abundant opportunities for studying his noble heart and manly character — opportunities which have proved invaluable, as his volume testifies. It is a genuine labor of love.

A GREAT NATIONAL WORK COMPLETED.

HISTORY OF THE ORIGIN, FORMATION, AND ADOPTION OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES. By George Ticknor Curtis. Complete in 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $4 00; Law Sheep, $5 50.

A book so thorough as this in the comprehension of its subject, so impartial in the summing up of its judgments, so well considered in its method, and so truthful in its matter, may safely challenge the most exhaustive criticism. The Constitutional History of our country has not before been made the subject of a special treatise. We may congratulate ourselves that an author has been found so capable to do full justice to it; for that the work will take its rank among the received text-books of our political literature will be questioned by no one who has given it a careful perusal.—National Intelligencer.

We know of no person who is better qualified (now that the late Daniel Webster is no more) to undertake this important history.—Boston Journal.

It will take its place among the classics of American literature.—Boston Courier.

The author has given years to the preliminary studies, and nothing has escaped him in the patient and conscientious researches, to which he has devoted so ample a portion of time. Indeed, the work has been so thoroughly performed that it will never need to be done over again; for the sources have been exhausted, and the materials put together with so much judgment and artistic skill, that taste and the sense of completeness are entirely satisfied.—N. Y. Daily Times.

A most important and valuable contribution to the historical and political literature of the United States. All publicists and students of public law will be grateful to Mr. Curtis for the diligence and assiduity with which he has wrought out the great mine of diplomatic lore in which the foundations of the American Constitution are laid, and for the light he has thrown on his wide and arduous subject.—London Morning Chronicle.

CAUTION.

LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

The attention of Messrs. Harper & Brothers has been called to several spurious Works put forth as the "NARRATIVE OF DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA." One of these is a gross forgery throughout. It does not contain a single line written or furnished by Dr. Livingstone, bears no resemblance whatever to his genuine Narrative, but is altogether the invention of the fabricator. Another book professes to give, "in the language of Dr. Livingstone," a "complete account of his various journeys, omitting only incidental details and scientific matter." These "incidental details" which are omitted form more than one half of the matter in the genuine edition, embracing the most valuable part of the book, nearly all of the characteristic Illustrations, and the elaborate Maps, which are essential to a full understanding of the explorations and travels of the Author. The place of the genuine Illustrations has been supplied by coarse second-hand cuts, bearing no relation whatever to Dr. Livingstone's Book. This mutilated edition is designed mainly for circulation through the "Gift-Book" scheme of the publisher, although it is understood that reputable members of the Trade have purchased it, supposing it to be a genuine, unmutilated edition.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers respectfully caution the Trade and the Public against being imposed upon by these forged and mutilated Works.

The only genuine unmutilated American edition of Dr. Livingstone's Work is that published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, printed from an early copy purchased for a large sum from the Author. It contains 754 pages, large octavo, with a Portrait of the Author engraved upon Steel; two elaborate Steel Plate Maps, with Livingstone's Routes colored, and Forty-five large Wood-cuts, engraved in the highest style of the Art. The volume is beautifully printed and substantially bound. Price Three Dollars.

TO PERSONS IN THE COUNTRY.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers will send a copy of Livingstone's Travels by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, upon the receipt of Three Dollars.

This be by far the most ABSORBING and THRILLING TALE of LIFE AMONG THE INDIANS ever published. The Heart-rending Trials, Sufferings, and Privations of the lovely heroine, BLANCHE BERTRAND, whose life was in constant peril, and who suffered more than pen can relate during her captivity, will enlist the SYMPATHIES of every reader.

The popular and distinguished author has executed his task in a masterly manner. In this class of Tales, it is universally admitted that he has no equal at the present day. In speaking of this new Tale, the Ledger says:—"It is a narrative of wild and perilous adventure among the savages of our western border, and is full of stirring incidents, intended by poetic fire and enlivened by subduing pathos. At the outset it takes hold of the heart with a vigorous grasp, and holds the imagination captive."

The NEW YORK LEDGER also contains contributions from the pens of the following distinguished writers:

GEO. D. PRENTICE,
MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY,
T. S. ARTHUR,
SYLVANUS COBB, JR.,
FANNY FERN,
ALICE CARY,
EMERSON BENNETT,
WILLIAM ROSS WALLACE,

And a host of other popular authors, whose names constantly appear in its columns.

As an indication of the popularity of the LEDGER, we need only mention the simple fact, that its circulation is larger than that of any TEN literary papers in the country. Its great success is owing to the fact, that it conveys the best writers in the country, and spares no expense in getting up the BEST FAMILY PAPER—a paper of high moral tone.

The exalted reputation of its well-known contributors, the practical and unobjectionably pure and healthy character of all its articles, and the care which is taken that not even one offensive word shall appear in its columns, have gained for the NEW YORK LEDGER a position that no literary paper has ever before occupied. We feel, and always have felt, since the LEDGER attained its immense circulation, that a tremendous responsibility rested on us, and have endeavored to discharge that responsibility conscientiously, feeling confident that ultimately we should receive the thanks of thousands and tens of thousands of families.

The LEDGER is for sale every week at all the principal stores throughout the United States.

The subscription price is $2 per annum when sent by mail, but no subscriptions are wanted from towns where there are news offices established.

HON. JACOB COLLAMER, OF VERMONT.

We present to our readers this week another portrait and biography of a distinguished gentleman, whose life has furnished the world with something more than a bare recital of official distinctions—one who has not only been honored with some of the highest gifts in the possession of his countrymen, but has won their confidence by his own unaided industry, energy, and talents.

Mr. Collamer was born in Troy, New York, in 1792; his father was a native of Scituate, Massachusetts, and his mother was of the nation who founded the Empire State.—While he was very young his father removed from Troy to Burlington, Vermont. The elder Collamer was a mechanic, and designed and built several of the churches and other edifices in Burlington. He seems to have been one of those sensible, industrious, plodding persons who possess the respect of their neighbors, maintain their families decently, furnish their children with a moderate education, and then pass away, apparently having lived very uneventful lives; when, in fact, they may have laid the foundation of important deeds, by the principles of sobriety and rectitude with which they have indoctrinated their offspring. The father of our subject could furnish him only with an ordinary education; and when that was accomplished he entered the University of Vermont, boarding at home, and defraying his expenses by laboring and teaching in his vacations. This carried him up to his eighteenth year, when he graduated at the university. Leaving college, he removed to Franklin County, in the same State, and began the study of law. While engaged in this preparation for his profession the war of 1812 broke out, and Mr. Collamer received a subaltern's commission. He served during the first campaign of the war, and was also present at the Battle of Bladensburg. In common with all who served in what has been styled the "second War of Independence," he was put to great straits for want of the pay due from the republic, whose coffers were empty. Badly fed, and in actual need of clothing, he remained in the service of his country till he was entitled to return to more peaceful avocations. He was admitted to the practice of the law in Franklin County in 1813. For some time he was employed in copying accounts for the army, and in collecting the war taxes. At this period he aspired to no higher professional position than that of "a collecting attorney;" but one of those apparently trifling events occurred to him, which often prove to be the turning-point in the history of a life. In the same village in which he had taken up his residence there was another young lawyer, who had the wisdom to perceive that the place was not large enough for the support of both, and the prudence to devise a plan by which each of the new beginners might be benefited. He proposed a partnership with Mr. Collamer, with the understanding that one of the parties should remove to Windsor County, where a lucrative practice was about to be abandoned by Mr. Chase, who had been elected to the United States Senate. As Mr. Collamer was to take the practice in Windsor County, his partner agreed to carry him over to his new field of operations, and on the way they were to begin their joint business by defending a schoolmaster who was to be tried before a magistrate for inflicting undue punishment upon a scholar. Up to this time so difficult was he, and so little conscious of the remarkable logical faculty which nature has bestowed upon him, that Mr. Collamer had never supposed it possible he could plead a case. Exhilarated by his winter ride, however, and really feeling strongly interested for his half-client, he made a speech—his first—which not only gained his case, but spread his fame all over the county. On that day, before a magistrate's court, he placed his foot upon the lowest round of a ladder which he has ever since been continually mounting. His practice gradually increased, and he was soon elected a member of the Legislature, in which capacity he served for several years. Mr. Collamer was remarkable for the industry with which he pursued his professional business at the period of which we are now writing; he has been known to argue every cause in Windsor and Franklin counties during the whole term of six weeks, passing rapidly from one court to another, and arranging his pleas while in transitu. Such untiring industry, united to a most strictly upright character, in a few years won for him a fame and popularity of which he seems to have been hardly conscious; for he was so utterly surprised by his appointment to the important position of Judge of the Supreme Court of Vermont, in 1833, that it was some days before he could make up his mind to accept it; at last his health, which was being undermined by his close application to a counsel's duties, turned the scale, and he became Judge Collamer.

He remained on the bench of the Supreme Court until 1841, when he resigned that position and returned to practice. He was first elected to Congress as a member of the House of Representatives in 1843. He was continued in this dignity, by re-elections, until 1849, when he declined any further occupancy of his seat, and again returned to private life; but not to remain long unoccupied with public affairs, for when General Taylor was elected to the Presidency, in forming his Cabinet he selected Mr. Collamer for the responsible position of Postmaster-General. He retained that post until July, 1850, when, owing to the death of President Taylor, and the consequent elevation of Mr. Fillmore to the Presidency, Judge Collamer and other members of the Cabinet resigned. He again returned to Vermont, and was immediately restored to his old seat on the Supreme bench, a position which he continued to fill with distinction until 1854, when he was appointed to the United States Senate for six years from the 4th of March, 1855, a dignity which he now fills with great honor to himself and credit to the State he represents.

Mr. Collamer has taken an active part in the Kansas debate in Congress; he was the reporter of the minority of the Committee on Territories, to which the Lecompton Constitution was referred.

In person, Judge Collamer is of medium height, with a slight, scholar-like stooping of the shoulders. His voice is as clear as a silver bell, and, when he is warmed with his theme, it rings throughout the Senate chamber with wonderful clearness and force. His talents, it is unnecessary to say, are of no mean order; and the best evidence of his scholarship is the fact that he has twice had the degree of LL.D. conferred upon him—once by his alma mater, the University of Vermont, in 1849, and, more recently, by Dartmouth College. But his peculiar and distinguishing trait is the possession of a logical power which is absolutely mathematical in its operation; his logic is that of a steel-trap; tread ever so lightly on his postulates, and his sequences instantly spring upon you, and hold you in an unyielding grasp. Repeatedly declining office, he is one of the few public men upon whom distinctions are thrust. His official positions have been unsought by himself, and have been conferred by the people of the district composed of Windsor and Franklin counties.

A distinguished journalist, who has been connected with public life in Washington for over forty years, says that he has never seen in any man the same wonderful gift (for it amounts to that) of logic which Mr. Collamer possesses. Add to this a large fund of anecdote, a personal bearing which indicates a thoroughly-conscientious act of motives, an eye that at times sparkles with keen intellectual light, and a private character upon which there is no spot, nor the slightest approach toward any of those vices from which, we regret to say, even our legislators are not always free, and into which, with many, the labor, excitement, and temptation of a Congressional career prove the facilis descensus Averni, and the reader has at once the secret of his success and the portrait of HON. JACOB COLLAMER, OF VERMONT.

HON. JACOB COLLAMER, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM VERMONT.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

ROSE AND REST.

CHILD, do not fear;
We shall reach our home to-night.
For the sky is clear,
And the waters bright;
And the breezes have scarcely strength
To unfold that little cloud.
That lies a shroud
Upon all its fleecy length.

Then have no fear,
As we cleave our silver way
Through the waters clear.

Fear not, my child!
Though the waves are white and high,
And the storm blows wild
Through the gloomy sky.
On the edge of the western sea
See that line of golden light
In the heaven bright
Where Home is awaiting thee.
Where, this peril past,
We shall rest from our stormy voyage
In peace at last.

Be not afraid;
But give me thy hand, and see
How the waves have made
A cradle for thee.
Night is come, dear, and we shall rest;
So turn from the angry skies,
And close thine eyes,
Lay thy head upon my breast:
Child, do not weep,
In the calm, cold, purple depths
There we shall sleep!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 15, 1858.

A BANKRUPT LAW.

TO THE mildest term, the President is unlucky. He tried to have Kansas admitted under the Lecompton Constitution, and failed. He tried to obtain an increase of the army, and did not succeed. He narrowly escaped having his Appropriation Bills rejected. Many of his appointments "hang fire" in the Senate. His first endeavor to obtain leave to make war on Paraguay failed. And now, at this late day, he can not persuade the Judiciary Committee of the Senate to report a Bankrupt Bill—though he expends much eloquence in his Message to establish the need of such a measure.

True, the minority of the committee, at least half of which consists of Senators from Georgia, have reported a Bankrupt Bill. There is nothing in the bill deserving of special remark. It is framed on the plan of the Bankrupt Law of England, and of the old Bankrupt Act which followed the revulsion of 1837. It is very long and elaborate, and would necessarily, if it became a law, give rise to interminable lawsuits.

The Senate heard the title of the bill read, but declined to hear any more. This course would have been more surprising had the Senator enjoyed a larger measure of general public confidence. Senator Toombs has the misfortune to be generally known as a loose fish in politics, and not particularly a sound authority on legal or social questions. His fame chiefly rests on his reported wish to call his slave-mill within sound of Bunker Hill, and on a vehement denunciation of the Puritans delivered in Faneuil Hall. In Congress his services have been slender. While some of his Southern colleagues have borne the heat and burden of the practical legislation of the country, Senator Toombs has served as a light skirmisher in harassing the flank of the enemy with occasional attacks. He has served the Democratic party in this humble capacity with the more zeal and bitterness as he was only admitted to their ranks as a deserter. His chiefs have never labored under any delusion as to his capacity; but they have been willing to use him, just as, in the war of 1812, the Irishman Henry was used by Mr. Madison.

It is necessary to bear these facts in mind in order to form a judgment upon the action of the Senate in refusing to hear his bill read. Had the bill been presented by Mr. Butler or Mr. Hammond, or Mr. Iverson or Mr. Slidell, or Mr. Mason or Mr. Brown, it would have been read and debated as a matter of course. But, in no uncommon thing for a legislative body to espouse the views of the minority of a committee. Only a few days ago, the House of Representatives took open ground in favor of the minority of the Kansas Committee. Had Senator Toombs possessed any substantial claim to the confidence of the Senate, his bill would have been duly read and debated.

But it is as well as it is. There can be no question but the last Bankrupt Act was an error. A new Bankrupt Act would be equally inexpedient. We require no Bankrupt Acts, and will have none.

The idea of legal bankruptcy grew out of the harsh and cruel laws against debt which were in force in Europe until late years. Under those laws, a creditor could imprison his debtor for the term of his natural life unless the debt were paid. The manifest injustice of this rule, when applied to the case of an honest but unfortunate trader, led to the invention of a safety-valve, which was called legal bankruptcy; by the aid of which an insolvent, who established his quality as a trader, could, on surrender of his effects and on proof of his good faith, obtain a legal discharge from his debts. That it was a valuable, humane, and politic system, no one who is conversant with the old common law of England can doubt.

But in this country the case is different. Here we know no imprisonment for debt. Here the creditor has no power to oppress his debtor. On the contrary, it is the creditor who is at the mercy of the debtor. A man may assign away his effects, run into debt, and laugh at his creditors. Certainly, no one who is acquainted with our civil code can doubt that the debtor requires fresh protection. On the other hand, it is obvious that no Bankrupt Law, however carefully framed, would avail in any case to the creditor the entirety of the effects of his dishonest debtor. We are too smart a people to run the risk of being forced to pay our debts. Those among us who propose to pay will do so without legal intervention; those who do not will take good care to contrive matters so that no legal compulsion shall be competent to strip them of their property. The effect of a Bankrupt Law would simply be that the honest insolvent would never take advantage of it, because neither he nor his creditors would be benefited by it; but the fraudulent insolvent would carefully assign over his property, and then would get a friend to put him in bankruptcy.

These principles are well understood by all persons versed in business. We are, then, to see that the majority of the Senate committee realize their justice. The fair dealing commanding need be under no apprehension of the Bankrupt Law; it will not pass. President Buchanan must eat humble pie once more.

ANOTHER MURDERER TO BE PARDONED?

MARION IRA STOUT, a common jail-bird, and a man of notoriously bad character, recently murdered a brother-in-law of Senator Broderick of Rochester, was tried, and convicted of the crime. The offense was characterized by circumstances of peculiar atrocity. Stout murdered man was the husband of the murderer's sister. Between the brother and sister such intimacy and affection existed as is very unusual, and in the absence of the murdered man, the same bad, and were associates in the deed of murder. Upon the circumstances which developed from the facts disclosed on the trial no decent person will even hint a doubt. Stout's guilt stood forth in the hideous depravity which clouds the social relations of the culprits.

The evidence which was found against Stout was conclusive, and the utmost fairness and care. The court was scrupulously solicitous that the privileges of the prisoner should be ample and unabridged. Nothing was left undone which could have been done by the counsel for the defense to establish his innocence. Any legal knowledge were wanting to secure an acquittal. They failed; and the convicted murderer now awaits his doom.

It is understood that he will escape the lawful sentence of death. He has published a letter in which he accuses his wife of maltreating the sister whose purity he (at all events) endangered, and boldly announces his opinion that the woman was naturally his wife, and killed by any friend of hers. He is not alone in his views. Rochester, which is famous as the birthplace of that most disastrous delusion called spirit-rapping, has also given birth to a number of women who have declared their entire disbelief of Littles, and vindicate the conduct of Stout. The shirtless Frenchmen who sing raving nonsense about the "sacred right" and independence of legal obligations than the ladies of Rochester and its vicinity. In their eyes the murderer Stout is a martyr, and they will make a section to the rights of women. Not content with celebrating the deed in ungrammatical prose, they have chanted it in unmelodious and halting verse.

There is no reason to doubt but they will succeed with their petition. It is hardly within peculiar privilege of that official to disgust his friends and to justify his enemies. Every prominent act of his predecessor has been a contribution to the load which his party in this State has to shoulder. His course in the Broderick matter is but would utterly extinguish the Republicans in New York. Especially has he been noted for his disregard of the public sentiment manifested it. Foolish men, in his position, have more than once exasperated the public by conspiring with criminals to defeat the ends of justice; but he is the only Governor who has ever stretched a protecting hand over a villain convicted of simultaneous rape and murder. We have no doubt, therefore, of the success of the appeal which is being made by the ladies of Rochester on behalf of IRA STOUT. Should they carry their point, we will venture to suggest that a neat and appropriate respect to the pardon would be the appointment of the pardoned convict to one of the many commissions which have been devised by the Governor and his friends for the maintenance of broken-down country politicians on the east of the City of New York.

THE "SICK MAN" IN ANOTHER AGONY.

THE famous "sick man" of Europe—the Sublime Porte—seems to be more ill than ever. This his antagonist is not Turkey, but England. In the first place, Great Britain has seized the Island of PERIM, over which Turkey pretends to exercise, if not rights of dominion, at least a sort of protectorate. Against this the Sultan is confidently expected to protest; and it is generally supposed in Europe that he will obtain the sympathy and support of all the Continental nations in the Straits of Turkey. And another grievance likely to give the "sick man" still more trouble.

For centuries Turkey has been the only slaveholding State of Europe. Ever since the Moslem first overran the Greek Empire slavery has been one of the most conspicuous institutions of Turkey. It is a different kind of slavery from that which obtains in the Southern States. Turkish slaves may be of any race, and of any color: English and French women have been frequently found as slaves in the harems of Constantinople. It is not a self-supplying system, but depends upon annual supplies from abroad; the facilities for the emancipation of slaves are unbounded, and, on the whole, the condition of slavery is not less favorable to advancement, in the case of meritorious men, than any agricultural or clerkship in Anglo-Saxon countries.

Ten or fifteen years ago, Russia, moved by considerations of policy as well as humanity, undertook to suppress the trade in Circassian and Georgian boys and girls. A treaty was signed with the Porte with a view of preventing their importation. It was, of course, violated by the Turks, and the Russians have had their hands full in the task of suppressing the traffic. Latterly it has been suggested to the English that the importation of boys and girls from Asia and Circassia was insignificant in comparison with the influx of African slaves. It has been shown that the direct export of negroes and other African States is negro slaves of both sexes. And it has been argued that Great Britain, as the self-constituted guardian of Europe and the especial ally of Turkey, owes it to herself to put a stop to a system which is, at least, contrary to the spirit of public policy.

It is understood that the present British Government has adopted these views, and that measures are about being taken to prevent the export of slaves from Morocco, Abyssinia, and other African States. Should the design be persevered in, before the end of the year the Turks will be reduced to great extremities for the want of labor.

Altogether the "sick man" is in a pretty bad way; if matters do not improve, the Sultan will soon be in a condition to appreciate the old fable of the generous lion, in order to escape the ravenous appetite of the fox, threw itself into the jaws of a hungry wolf.

WAR WITH PARAGUAY.

THERE seems to be a strong prospect that the new Session of Congress, unopposing the President to take what measures he may deem necessary for the settlement of accounts with Lopez, the Dictator of Paraguay, will pass the House of Representatives by a decided majority. It is urged that a demand for redress, such as the outrage committed on the Water-Witch unaccompanied by a threat, in case of non-compliance, would speedily provoke the derision of the Paraguayan chief.

In the second number of this journal we gave a full account of the State of Paraguay, of its institutions, and of the despot who succeeded Francia in the administration of its government. We have from time to time urged the probable argument in favor of a liberal use of the cannon in future negotiation with that State.

Paraguay is the Japan of America; with this difference, that it is the mistress of a river which is the only channel of communication between some of the richest parts of South America and the outer world. Lopez, the despotic ruler of the country, his like his predecessor, Dr. FRANCIA, has based his power upon a policy of excluding foreigners and preventing foreign trade. He considers that his people would be injured if they began to sell their surplus produce and to buy foreign commodities; and by the strictest precautions he has secured the monopoly of produce, he continues to keep the Paraguayans in a state of perpetual poverty. Like many of his Spanish-American fellows, he is a person of no integrity or honor. He has made a dozen treaties with this and other countries, but has always evaded complying with their provisions. He is ready, at any time, to promise anything; but it may be taken for granted that he will not perform his promises or depart from his settled policy until he is actually compelled to do so. He is, in fact, one of those sort of persons who can only be expected to act fairly when the stick is raised over his head.

We can hardly be suspected of any unfair designs with regard to Paraguay. All that the most ambitious citizens of this republic could ask would be the right of trading thither on fair and equal terms, and security against such outrages as that of which the Water-Witch was the victim. But we owe it to ourselves and to the commerce of the world to secure these small privileges; and the sooner Mr. Buchanan carries the Congressional suggestion into effect, the better will it be for his fame.

WHO MAY BE CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES?

NOW that KANSAS is out of the way, Congress comes up in due course for admission. And the first point which attracts attention is the clause in the Constitution denying citizenship, under any circumstances or after any term of residence, to negroes and Chinese.

As to the former, the clause is as strict construction will yield. The Dred Scott decision, which settles the question that negroes can not be United States citizens—though in several Northern States they help to elect the President. But as to the Chinese, the case is different. There never has been any question heretofore of the right of a Chinaman to be naturalized in the same way as an Irishman or a German. Several native Chinese are at the present time citizens of the United States; it is fair to presume that they vote, and it is undeniable that they are useful members of the community in which they reside. In one point of view they remind one of the Jews of the Middle Ages—industrious, orderly, hard-working, money-getting—they are the natural traders of the Pacific shores. Yet it needs no great foresight to perceive that, if no check be put upon it, they will be partials through out our Pacific States.

No one can disguise the dangers which environ the blending of hostile races into one people. Almost every country in the world has been retarded in the great work of development and progress by the struggles of antagonistic races. It is, therefore, easy to understand the opposition of our countrymen on the Pacific to the domiciliation of Chinamen among them on equal terms. At the same time, the precedent established by the Oregon Constitution may hereafter prove every grave affair. We have several races among us as it is; and some of them are undoubtedly undesirable. If hereafter a new State should propose to deny citizenship to this or that European race, how could Congress—without giving sanction to the establishment of Chinamen in Oregon—presume to object? And how could Congress consent to such a principle?

POST-OFFICE DELINQUENCIES.

WE are in receipt of a letter from Mobile, Alabama, complaining of the non-receipt of certain copies of this Weekly, which were duly forwarded to the address in question by the publishers of this journal. The failure occured several times successively. We draw the attention of the Post-office Department to the fact. If the Postmasters desire copies of the Weekly, we shall be happy to supply them at the lowest rates; but we would rather they suffered our subscribers' copies to reach their destination safely.

☞ We have to thank the Hon. John Cochrane for Congressional Documents.

THE LOUNGER.

MAY.

MAY-DAY was chiefly enough to justify all the sharp things said of it in the days when it was the very prime of the month. It was a gray, chilly day, but the cherry and plum trees were clouds of blossom, the grass was green, the borders and gardens plots were bright with early flowers, and the teeming tenderness of the life of the woods announced that summer was just at hand.

Something ought to be said for the old poets who have sung so sweetly of May, and that something is, that temperatures may have changed. There is no reason why May should not be colder more than June. There was no reason why they should call May soft and sunny, if it were not so. They would have expressed themselves in that manner; and it is therefore only polite to believe that May has changed, not that the poets were untruthful. And why, having always been in such close neighborhood with April, should not May be cold?

Let this, however, be said for her, even if the suspicion be allowed, that whether she loves the greater is her repentance. If the sweet May is born infected with April, she dies healed by June. If she comes into the world with many cradle, June flings roses upon her grave. In fact she is to thoroughly educated, that when dead at last and brightest we are sure to feel this is just what May meant to be, but it had not learned how.

NONE OF OUR BUSINESS.

THE Public, which is the most sensible, intelligent, and virtuous of entities, has yet some very dull conceptions of things it ought to understand perfectly well. About once a week—say on Saturday mornings—the Public gets furious at finding the fifth page or the eighth page of one of the be-lightful daily oasis newspapers covered with only one advertisement.

What the device is this? What's this for? What does this ——— paper mean?—et cetera, et cetera, bursts out the infuriated Public.

"This," then, is simply this.

The proprietor of a newspaper publishes it to make money for his private and particular benefit. He doesn't print it to please us—the public. In order to make it pay him something he needs a certain part of it for advertisements; and any body or bodies can have the benefit of as much of that part as they choose to pay for. If they want one line, they can have it. If they want all the lines, they can have them upon proper payment.

If Mr. Smith chooses to hire all the advertising space, and gives it an air of uniformity, why should we all lose our papers? If we are not customers, what particular difference does it make to us?

But if you are not content to read a column of advertisements, and therefore we shall buy some paper where we can find something else advertised besides Day & Martin's blacking—and if you say, we too are advertisers, and we will not send where we may be excluded or our advertisement partially paralyzed—why, you have a great deal of reason on your side. But why not suppose that the newspaper proprietor understands his business and knows all that as well as you? And so, if the proprietor allows the advertisement to encroach upon his reading matter, he will find that people drop his paper, and it will cease to be a desirable advertising medium.

All this is a matter for the proprietor to determine. It is strictly none of our business. If he never chooses to sell glaces at twenty shillings a pair, we shall probably buy elsewhere. But we may as well spare Mr. Stewart our wrath, for his business is only a commodity, and when we see men who are, and have been, making fortunes by advertising in newspapers, it is only modest to suppose that they understand their business.

MORE PICTURES.

THERE is something very touching in the country silence of a gallery of new pictures. They hang patiently and calm upon the walls, the idle spectators lounge and gossip and joke before them, the solicitor comes to sell, and ignorance to criticise, and partiality to praise, the weary artist to pace and thither, smiles, bows, chats, and is gone; leaving the pictures behind with their wonderful history unwritten and unread.

For, if you think of it a moment, how much hope, and care, and labor, and doubt, and fear, and honorable ambition, and crushing despair, have entered into those silent pictures, which reveal such secrets only indirectly, and to the artist's eye. For the little hand-scape which you pass with scarcely a glance, or of which you exclaim merely "how pretty!" or "too green!" or "who ever saw such water!" is, very likely, to the painter the spot of all the earth he loves best, consecrated by memories which shall keep his heart young forever; or it is a study made in his poorest days, when he had no success, thrown it to the public, as boys pitch copcorn into the air, hoping it might fall "heads" and win him the applause that would justify him in continuing his career; or that picture, as it progressed upon his easel, has been the solace and pride of his life change, his gained him the smile and the word which are dearer to him than his art; or so sin, it is the reverse to his every hope and aim, and he has not the skill without which no man is an artist, so that the picture is the sole monument of his own ambition, signed with his own hand. And so on with every picture, through all the varieties of human emotion.

Then, so few of the painters are successful. A few hundred men have reputation and commissions. But the great majority of those who make the walls so gay, since the amusement of the rich is artistic, do not drive in their own carriages, nor pin their shirts with Kohi-i-noor diamonds. And yet to guild is to deal with a more cheerful, more friendly, or more genial. Of course they have jealousies and hard feelings; of course Page is a Pharisee, his shoulders at Suggs, A.; and Cobbs, A., is really sorry that Dobbs, N.A., should make such a sad index of it; but then Page is a Pharisee, and Cobbs and Dobbs have their own opinion of their own works, and that produces a sense of power which is invaluable to success in art. What hints they wear, to be sure! And what beards they have! And how hard they look and how pre-occupied! And how they rail at the want of sympathy with artist and want of knowledge of pictures betrayed in this precious land!

—On the whole, what a vast superior set we Loungers and critics are, who look at pictures and talk about "nature," and "handling," and "treatment," and "tone" and "style," and this Exhibition is never any thing but "Portrait of a Gentleman" multiplied by three hundred!

Mr. Frost is one of the artists for whom we have only a gallery acquaintance. He lives at present in Lowell, and every year he sends us pictures which are always interesting from a genuine sentiment. His Peach, some years since, was the best we remember to have seen. Mr. Frost's pictures are always of the same general character. They represent sunshine, soft, quiet, and the influence of some romantic or intellectual emotion. Such are No. 28, The Young Philosopher, No. 29, Music of the Reeds, and No. 321, The Third Sorrow. The coloring is always the same; rather too chalky and cold, and the drawing is sometimes careless as in No. 362, The Evening Meal, in which the girl's face is curiously wrenched. But the sentiment carries you at once beyond the execution. Music of the Reeds is a little poem. A girl bobbing in her hand a reed upon which she has been playing, hears the wind singing among the reeds near her, and her face grows veiled as she listens, as if she understood the music. There are thought and feeling in this picture, and it is clearly the work of a man of imagination.

This is true, also, of Mr. May's sole picture in the gallery, No. 382, A Lesson taking the Story of the taking of the Mahaloff, in the Garden of the Israelites. It is by far the best thing we have ever seen from Mr. May. Hitherto he seems to have been entirely overwhelmed by his admiration of Couture; but this work, although French in subject and school, is yet independent and individual. A Zouave, in his African costume, sits before an old Invalide, telling the story of the Crimea with all the French fire. By his side stands another Zouave, and by the side of the old soldier, who is sitting, kneels one of his companions leaning upon a cane and listening with all his soul. The special auditor reminds you by his attitude of the Venetian picture-sequence; Venice Preserved is the eloquent expression of his whole face, which is mingled pity and pure daughter. The other Zouave hears his younger friend with patronizing approbation, while the old Invalide, with his stentorian voice, seems merely the organ of his ecstatic counsels, and his whole face is speaking.

This picture, with Mr. Edmonds's, No. 232, The Herdsman, and Mr. Mount's, No. 326, "I say Tuft, Stop!" Mr. Blauvelt's, No. 339, Saying his Prayers, Mr. Beard's, No. 349, Music of the Reeds, Mr. Ehninger's, No. 350, Fishing for Compliments, Mr. Hicks's, No. 360, John Gilpin, and Dudley's, No. 367, The Death of Seeing from the Battle-field Bower, are among the few excellent pictures of landscape and figure-painting in the Exhibition.

No. 52, Sleep, by Mrs. L. M. Spencer, is one of the characteristic works of this careful and industrious artist, very much educated and still incongruous. Many of the details are capitally done, but grace, and harmony, and beauty never appear upon the canvas. Indeed, the general impression of the faces in this picture are remarkably ugly and dull. The proud defiance, the angry hate, the malignant insolence, are natural enough; but the child tumbling into the tub, the dog stealing the meat, Mr. Tuft's Stop! are equally and vulgarly unnatural, are all equally conspicuous and impertinent with the chief group.

A FRIENDLY WORD.

"RESPECTED SIR,—I wish you would exit a great git what the cas de when she wishes to get a good education, and to be instructed by the best masters, she seems to buy books necessary, or to go to school, and who is ever obliged by circumstances to remain at home, besides having to attend to the duties of a family in this busy degreed of gaining knowledge and self-confidence equals to make her to speak correctly and readily and surely, should out at some future day to thrown into the world. This is my situation, Sir, and I request to ask me what I can do, will you not? Many thanks if you will.

Yours, in earnest,

"CHARLOTTE ——."

CHARLOTTE asks a question most difficult to answer, because there is no one way in which she or his as a recipe is given for making cake. How to be a good—skilful is the word—artist is a question to are questions that were never yet answered, and never will be, satisfactorily to words. Goodness is the secret of Goodness, and Art is the art of Art.

"Be good!" in a vague answer to one who is really interested in Life. "Be good!" to the boy who will not buy books, nor afford to go to school, she is probably constantly engaged at home; and if she wants to get an education, she must get it while she is making the time and borrowing the means.

But the other question, how to train herself rightly and correctly—is a matter of character. Good conduct is a fruit of good character. Good manners flow from a good life. Good taste in compositions ripen upon wood trees. They are exterior signs of an inward growth. They proceed, as do from the ground—they suck light, and heat, and gas from the air—they breathe with the leaves, and sun, and drink with their roots below, the ground. And so it is with character. From every circumstance and influence of daily life, from the observance of every individual is absorbing something—assimilating, elaborating, and forming. "Be good," Charlotte says, steadily that purpose and self-sacrifice are the most excellent of qualities—that the secret to be happy is to make others so—and every one in some peculiar circumstance—to have this, or to be the other, and each one must find out for herself the real of real importance is to be the best person she possibly can be, in the way that her own heart and conscience, which is God in her soul, shall dictate all of the wise and good of all ages, indicate, she may go into the world wisely, and consequently as Charlotte sets Catherine of Alexandria.

SAUCE FOR THE GANDER.

A LEGAL decision, in which all the gentler sex have the profoundest interest has been lately made in Germany. It is nothing less than the right of the married woman to the inviolability of the seal upon private admissive to her!

The case itself was very droll. A husband had married for money, and had obtained it, on the ground of infidelity, which he was confident he could get better from the lover. But the unlaunted wife immediately began a correspondence with her lover, not for opening a letter addressed to her! And the court decided in her favor, and fined the husband! This is a new kind of declaration of the rights of women which may have serious consequences. It is altogether that the husband was not the first one. But if it had been decided the other way—that a husband might open his wife's letters—then, of course, she might open his. We are glad, therefore, we may believe the Westphalian judges have taken a common sense view of marriage. If a wife's letters may lead to divorce, where would the opening of a husband's probably lead to?

A LITTLE LIGHT.

THERE is many an honest man who goes in the summer time to Saratoga or Newport, who quietly submits to pay enormous sums of money for a place to sleep in, in the fifth or sixth story; who has plenty of money and plenty of will to spend it freely, but who finds at the landlord's office that he cannot get any thing to eat. He eats himself at the dinner-table with a few hundred other people; he is lost in admiration at the military movements of the waiters; delightedly he watches them marching and counter-marching, turning and facing and trundling dishes, and is especially interested in that spare, fork, and plate procession which precedes the dessert. But he observes to his dismay, that although the fork, and the spare, and the plate, and all the choicest delicacies are planted directly before him, he no sooner reaches forth to appropriate some part of them than they are seized and borne to remote quarters of the house where they are—apparently—consumed by other guests.

This mystery often remains unsolved to the unsuspecting stranger, although it is perfectly familiar to every body else; and it is to the unsuspecting stranger that this paragraph is written.

You must understand, then, that when you have paid, as you generally have possible done, something to get a bill to be paid at the office, you will present it there, and, if you are lucky, you will get something to eat. If, in fact, the little fee to the waiters to bring you at dinner, something to eat. Every gentleman at table whom you observe to be diligently dining, tips pays the landlord for the dinner and the waiters. And the unfortunate fact that you never know how much your neighbor may have given, and whether, in fact, you have not been overcharged. Of course the unlucky stranger can that the gigantic who have not fed them until not feed themselves.

The Lounger does not advise any guest to martyrize himself by refusing to give to the waiters. The landlord pays them—it is the custom of the landlords. Whenever they absolutely forbid the custom you will probably get your dinner and the landlord, so that they shall not serve the same guests every day, the evil will be gradually corrected. But while the present arrangement holds, the honest man must summon the head-waiter at once, give him the "fee," and then, when he appears, tell the waiter who is to serve him at table. Present the individual with two dollars, and the promise of more for faithful attendance. In this way you may prevent absolute starvation even at Newport, and then in a week you will probably have found it necessary to call in at least two waiters, who, by constant fooling may contrive to carry you through, comfortably, to dinner.

DOUGLAS JERROLD'S WIT.

IT is rarely a year since Douglas Jerrold died, and the famous authors of England walked to his grave on a day of bitter cold. They were all in all lettersmen and difference, and acknowledged that they had lost one of their best comrades. His own friend, Jerrold has collected into a volume some of his father's witty, pathetic, and humorous sayings—and it is to be hoped he has published in Boston. It will be a good summer book, and we are quite sure many a reader, as he lounges upon shady lawns, or sits under the awning of a singular reminiscence between the forms of thought and expression of the two eminent men—Douglas Jerrold and Henry Ward Beecher.

For instance:

"The sweetest bell-flow is convolvus, according to Hal. It's a charming thing indeed but at our breakfast table it's a nuisance. Hal's a botanist."

"Snap is a darling little fib that sometimes lies like truth."

"The soul is at best as a trained hawk; let it fly as high as it will, there is its master, for the time, with his feet upon the cable; it is dangling like a dog-fox at the tail of his foot."

"Shall we die? A battle-field, with thousands blaspheming is agony about you! Your last moments sweetened, if not by, at the least by the presence even on the field by a bleeding piece of your handiwork—a poor wretch by the dying grass-blade. Truly, that is a lot of greater glory which is surrounded by loving hearts—by hands spilled in deep yet cheerful prayer. Let the battle-field die—let the battle-field rot sooner for than thoughts of recent staying, to help the struggling soul from the dark valley."

In almost all Jerrold's bonmot there is a little touch of tenderness. He wrote the Candle Lectures, and here is his theory:

"Every woman, no matter how divinely composed, has in her whole character one thing—a love of light—a woman's eye, of Candle. You herself may now and then have been guilty of a lecture, murmuring 'I belong among the rose-leaves.'"

"Some people were talking with Jerrold about a gentleman as celebrated for his wit as for the extreme delicacy of his friendships.

"'Yes,' said Jerrold, 'his friendships are so warm that he no sooner takes them up than he puts them down again.'"

"Jerrold said to a very thin man, 'Sir, you are like a pin, but without the head or the point.'"

"Some friends were talking with Jerrold about an eminent litterateur, who was a devoted admirer, and consequent companion, of the Muse Clarice Elective.

"'In fact,' said one of the friends, 'he is to Dickens and Bulwer's sun as a satellite.'

"'With this difference,' Jerrold replied, 'that —— moves round the sun and shines.'"

"An eccentric party, of which Jerrold was one, agreed to have a supper of sheep's heads. One gentleman, who was particularly remarkable on the occasions of the kind, and, as his dress showed his knife and fork, exclaimed, 'Ah, I have a head to-night, say I!'

"Jerrold: 'There's egotism!'"

"Well, Tattersall, said Jerrold, on meeting the late eminent judge and author one day near Temple Bar, 'have you any news?'

"'There is no what to the epistle like early dew,' setting for the staunch like grass and wild flowers, taken with a canopy and dive in the morning. In his Master's own salad, and that is why he lived to nine hundred and thirty."

THE GREAT BARITONE.

THE greatest baritone upon the stage, Ronconi, is to sing a few times at Burton's. He is a capital operatic actor, and full of gentlemanly humor. The Lounger hopes that with Madame La Grange and Ronconi, Mr. Burton will re-hear Don Pasquale, if only Formes could be had for the Don. But would not Signor Ullman lend a piece from Norma to Monsieur Maretzek? Could May and December over agree? Could a rhinoceros be polite to an elephant?

Then we can not have Formes for the Don. And whoever goes to hear Ronconi must remember that his voice is not true. Baritones are apt to be flats, and Ronconi is the best of baritones!

A HUMBLE PETITION.

THE petition of omnibus horses, and of calves and sheep, humbly showeth to the readers of the Lounger that they very sad objections to the disputed the superiority of men, and have given their views and powers to sustain the human race now for many generations. That they are drunk animals, born to be beasts of burden and to furnish food, they will not undertake to deny, although fortunate by the philosopher Pythagoras, and recently the great Shelley, spoke most possible words for them, and obtained from listening three. They request, however, respectfully says that, if they must serve and support a race of repulsive animals, it would be a great comfort to them to be practically persuaded of their superiority to man in the matter of horses leaving across their throats and lashes upon their backs. And to this end, they would humbly ask whether, when your cattle and horses are loaded in wind and limb, and are dying daily, it is decent, or worthy of a superior race, to provide them a course to run upon so slippery that every day nearly one hundred and fifty of them fall upon the pavement, and meet the fortune of which they are not able to console, prolonging in agony a life of pain; or whether your sheep will not calves and sheep be better eaten by the thankful, when a blow will fit them for the service they are to render to mankind, it is not inhuman to let them be driven in flocks, panting, suffocating heaps, in a butcher's cart, and drive them over the cobble-stones, and to the shambles, where then a thousand-fold more suffering then mere death can cause to them. They submit that any reader to whom this petition is addressed, if he were about to suffer at Orient lately suffered, would prefer his own throat to be cut by any body than the butcher.

How imitating the spectacle of both kinds must be to the public mind, your petitioners will not argue. But being, each one of you, a horse and not any other, and side, with the co-operation of others, to make a stand against the present unsatisfactory slaves, and sufferers, commending themselves to your clemency, will ever pray.

"HARK! HARK! THE LARK."

IT is no longer a question whether Jenny Lind will ever sing again in public. She has done so. She has given a concert in Boston, and has gone to Russia to sing at St. Petersburg.

The next question naturally is, is she likely to sing regularly?

If she should come, and if she should sing as well as before, she would then be the greatest lion of residence here to another long and enthusiastic ovation? Cheerly not. She would be nearly ten years older than when she left us. Her audiences she could not bring with her that natural prestige of wonder that naturally which has filled her ears, and her voice, and experience, and all her friends, but clings, inadequate, to the scene haunted by the events of what was almost fabulous triumph, and, as was lately stated, was singing in Julian's concerts.

But Jenny Lind Goldschmidt is still in her prime. From her lullaby and buoyant spirit the years recoil. She is still as sure to us again, although the great popular excitement can never be renewed, that Jenny Lind, if she sings, will sing as a critic, not a lover, her welcome, in thousands of hearts, will be unchanged in love, her pure and profound spell of her presence and voice will be to them, in its return, like the return of this beautiful May morning, intensified with all the lovely because known before; and they will again declare, as they have declared and used to believe,

"Sound of vernal showers
On the twinkling grass,
Rain-birds' voices
All that ever was Joyous, and clear, and fresh, and made dells surpass."

THE CENTRAL PARK.

AH! could we only see our own great-grandchildren! Could we only know how we could, and what first and thanker in the great Central Park! What unborn dandies will carouse upon unfeuded greensward, and what unborn belles will stroll! What lovely ladies, clad in a fashion of which it exceeds the power of man to imagine the beauty, will smile and saunter and be happy along the velvet lawns and the shady groves!

The picture of all this possibility are to be seen in Broadway —the plans which were presented to the Commissioners and approved. There was very elaborate model, and several of the designs are beautifully drawn and colored, and illustrated with views of scenes in the Park, "as proposed."

Careful study of the plans will, undoubtedly, confirm the judgment of the Commission. The one selected for the first prize is admirable and masterly. It is impossible, however, not to regret that there are never to be an exhibition; and we hope sincerely that the impression of the model may be such that the unsuccessful designers will resume something for their labors.

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXXII.

The Route from Philadelphia to Laodicea.—A Hard Ride.—Camp at Hierapolis.—Petrifying Water.—A Gallop to Colosse.—Arrival at Laodicea.—The Ruins of the City.—A Rencontre and a Battle.—The Victory.

ENOUGH hours we plunged over the road. Riding it could not be called. We left Philadelphia at six in the morning, thinking to pitch our tents (metaphorically) in Laodicea the same evening. I say metaphorically, for we hoped for better shelter than canvas on our arrival at Eski Hissar, the modern village which represents Laodicea. I don't know how we came to be so deceived about the road and the place. The first was execrable, the last—but I will tell you of that after I have finished the route.

At two in the afternoon Selim broke down. Sir Charles had begun to grumble and mutter English expletives as early as twelve; John Stemmerger gave in at one; I stood it half an hour longer; and Selim still encouraged us to keep on, and we kept on. But at two his horse stumbled and threw him four yards into the brush at the way-side, and he arose in wrath unworthy a Bedouin, and I think I heard there cursed the paths of the faithful in these parts of the world.

Selim, you remember, is an Arab from the Deserts of Petra. He has been my constant companion, changing his costume sufficiently to avoid being recognized in places where there might be those who would injure him.

We paused around Selim. He did not mount again, but when he had finished his remarks in general he looked up for an opinion.

Far behind, winding across a plain that was visible below us, we saw the tents and baggage-camels. We had therefore but to sit down and wait their arrival, and our home was here.

There is something delicious in this idea of a traveling home. You get to looking at the tent-pole as one looks at his native rooftree, and once within the canvas, and the curtain drawn close, what matters it whether outside is Mount Taurus or Mount Taurus, Hermon or Sinai? What difference does it make whether your servant digs his water from Nile or Jordan, Oronteo or Meander?

"A little farther on and there are ruins," said the guide.

A little farther on we rode, and a little farther, and a little farther. Those fellows like mile-cab-drivers about distances. It was nearly evening when we descended into the valley of the Meander, and again crossed that classical stream whose name has become a word descriptive of its character.

The ruins that we were to find were now before us—the really splendid remains of Hierapolis. But the ruins possess no historical interest. The traveller is much more surprised at the strange and startling appearances of the rock which has almost overgrown them. The warm springs which abound here crystallize in white stone, and overflowing in all directions, cover ruin and road alike with snowy masses. The city is petrified. Every thing is turned to rock. In the night time, with the moonlight shining on it, the surrounding country looked like a vast grave-yard with white monuments, or like a quarry in which the Titans had worked.

We sat down among the ruins and waited the arrival of our luggage-train, which came in the twilight.

TURKISH PILGRIMS TO MECCA.

There were a dozen pilgrims of Brousa, on their way to Mecca, who had come down by way of Alaschar, and were thus far on their journey. They surrounded us, as we sat under a triumphal arch which records the glory of some forgotten victory. In the evening they found lodgings in a stone house that I was inclined to think an ancient relic, and sitting around a fire they read aloud from the Koran, and droned old songs and stories in mournfully cheerful tones.

The twilight came on, and still we sat by the arch of triumph. The moon rose full and glorious, and we walked around the theatre, and counted the columns of a superb colonnade, and endeavored to repeople the city.

In the morning I was awake and out early. Sir Charles and Miss Kate were still sleeping. John and myself had a plan in view which we had not communicated to them lest Miss Kate should insist on joining us in it, and we had both of us too much care for her to permit it. The horses were ready. Selim and a guide were waiting for us, and we were in the saddle and away before the dawn was visible over the eastern hills.

Two hours of sharp riding brought us to the spot we wished to see.

Far and wide, scattered over plain and hill, are the ruins of a city once magnificent, once the site of a noble Christian church, now utterly abandoned to wolf and owl, to jackal and wild beasts of the field.

Imagine, if you can, the emotion with which we sat down among the remains of temples and palaces once inhabited by the "saints and faithful brethren which were at Colosse." Imagine, if you can, the thoughts which crowded our brains and found poor utterance from our lips, as our horses sauntered along by fallen columns, and shattered walls, and all the common remains of a once gorgeous city, which had been honored by Paul for its faithful obedience to the ministry of Epaphras. I had had great desire to see the city of the Colossians, and having accomplished that desire I turned my horse's head to the westward and rode swiftly over to Laodicea.

When we came out on the plain we were astonished at finding no human habitations. The desolation of the scene was such that I was sensibly affected by it.

As we came among the ruins from the east, our friends, with the baggage train, arrived from the north, and Miss Grandison came down to meet us at a gallop, lifting her horse gallantly over the fallen stones of the old city.

"Peter, did you ever see a city so totally deserted as this seems? Upon my word I do not believe the wolves live here, and I have not seen so much as a stork's nest. Do you know that this was the church of which John wrote, 'Because thou art neither cold nor hot I will spue thee out of my mouth?'"

We sat in a little circle, on our horses, while I read aloud the passages from the third chapter of the Apocalypse. "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich [Alas, poor Laodicea!]: and white raiment that thou mayest be clothed [Alas, naked, desolate, and forsaken city!]. Behold, I stand at the door, and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him." How many of the Laodiceans have long ago sat down with Him, to rise up no more!

I can not attempt a description of the ruins. They are like all the other cities of old times in the East, but somewhat more extensive and magnificent than is common. There are two theatres and a grand amphitheatre, and many columns and stones of elegant workmanship; a vast building, which may have been once a City Hall, if they had such buildings; and numerous temples and perhaps Christian churches. The hill and valley are alike covered with remains, and inscriptions half mutilated or wholly illegible may be traced here and there.

We were riding slowly around the ruins of the walls, Steenburger and myself in the rear, Miss Grandison and her father in advance, when we were surprised by a party of natives who made their appearance over a slight eminence, and advanced rapidly toward us.

The leader, a powerful Turk, rode up with an air of authority, sprung from his horse and seized Miss Grandison's bridle, while one of his followers did the same for Sir Charles. The attack was sudden, and might have been alarming had we had the time to think of it in that light. But by a simultaneous impulse, John and myself touched our horses and sprang forward.

How I knocked my man down I can not well say; probably very much as John did, for we were armed alike, and each carried a heavy whip with loaded handle, with which we had practiced at hitting a mark. The two Turks went down like logs, and there were four more left to combat. At them we drew revolvers, and then paused. The two parties stood for a few moments facing each other, the dead lying between.

As yet no word had been spoken. All that I have described had passed in an instant of time.

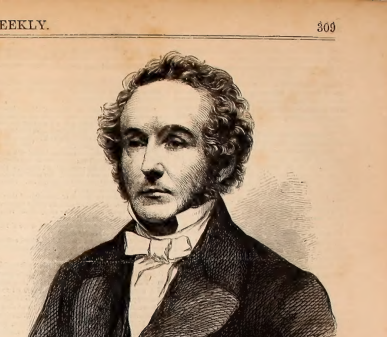
LAODICEA.

Now, however, the foremost of the Turks spoke, but he might as well have talked Russian for my benefit. I could not understand a syllable, and so the dialogue was left to such interpreters as all nations recognize—the muzzles of pistols and a few signs.

John led my horse while I dismounted, motioning them back till I had examined the two who lay as motionless as Mohammed. The survivors were disposed to forbid my touching them, but a display of the interpreter had a wholesome effect. They shrank back and looked on, while I recalled my surgical knowledge and examined the skulls. Fortunately they were not broken. So I tied their hands together for security's sake, and then, remounting, we motioned to the enemy to precede us toward our tents.

By this time they had gathered courage enough to laugh at us, and one of them commenced to unsling his long flint-lock gun, a movement to which John Stonehurger put a judicious termination by a well-aimed ball that knocked the flint into a thousand pieces before the scoundrel had the weapon fairly in his hands.

"Sharp shot," growled John. "I was afraid of touching his skin; but he isn't harmed if he can raise a copper to buy a new flint."



The scene was now growing serious, as may well be imagined. At the flash of the pistol the others drew their weapons—heavy-handled Mamluke pistols, inlaid with gold and silver.

Sir Charles had conveyed Miss Grundison to the rear as soon as we had released her horse's head from the grasp of the assailant. She protested against being left away, but the united entreaties of all of us, expressed as briefly and distinctly as the circumstances allowed, had overcome her opposition. Her father, therefore, placed her in charge of some of our people whom he met, and at this instant returned at a gallop to the scene, and we were now three to four.

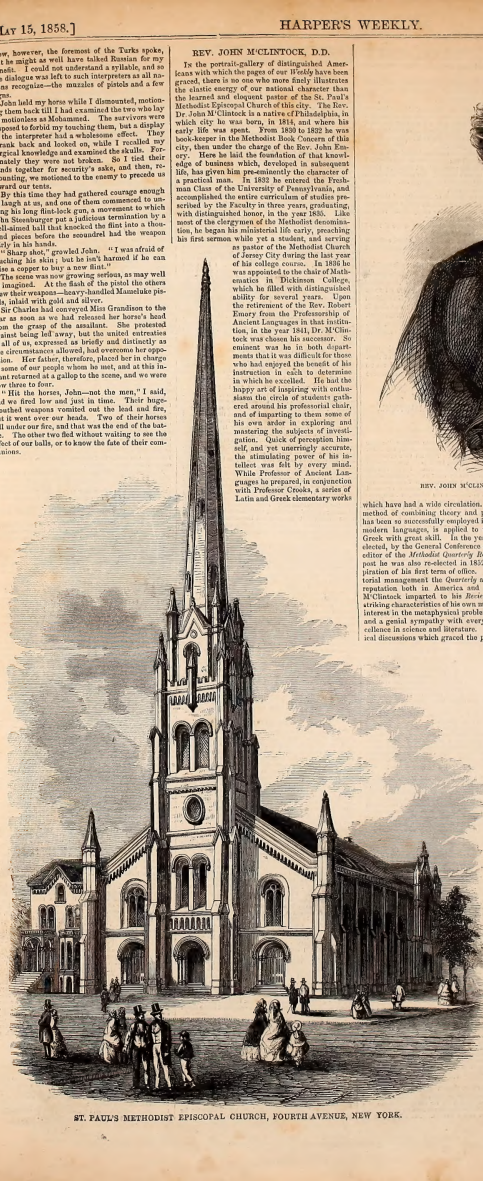
"Hit the horses, John—not the men," I said, and we fired low and just in time. Their huge, mouthed weapons vomited out the lead and fire, but it went over our heads. Two of their horses fell under our fire, and that was the end of the battle. The other two fled without waiting to see the effect of our balls, or to know the fate of their companions.

REV. JOHN M'CLINTOCK, D.D.

In the portrait-gallery of distinguished Americans with which the pages of our Weekly have been graced, there is no one who more finely illustrates the elastic energy of our national character than the learned and eloquent pastor of the St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church of this city. The Rev. Dr. John M'Clintock is a native of Philadelphia, in which city he was born, in 1814, and where his early life was spent. From 1830 to 1832 he was book-keeper in the Methodist Book Concern of this city, then under the charge of the Rev. John Emory. Here he laid the foundation of that knowledge of business which, developed in subsequent life, has given him pre-eminently the character of a practical man. In 1832 he entered the Freshman Class of the University of Pennsylvania, and accomplished the entire curriculum of studies prescribed by the Faculty in three years, graduating, with distinguished honor, in the year 1835. Like most of the clergymen of the Methodist denomination, he began his ministerial life early, preaching his first sermon while yet a student, and serving as pastor of the Methodist Church of Jersey City during the last year of his college course. In 1836 he was appointed to the chair of Mathematics in Dickinson College, which he filled with distinguished ability for several years. Upon the retirement of the Rev. Robert Emory from the Professorship of Ancient Languages in that institution, in the year 1841, Dr. M'Clintock was chosen his successor. So eminent was he in both departments that it was difficult for those who had enjoyed the benefit of his instruction in each to determine in which he excelled. He hit the happy art of inspiring with enthusiasm the circle of students gathered around his professorial chair, and of imparting to them some of his own ardor in exploring and mastering the subjects of investigation. Quick of perception himself, and yet unerringly accurate, the stimulating power of his intellect was felt by every mind. While Professor of Ancient Languages he prepared, in conjunction with Professor Crooks, a series of Latin and Greek elementary works which have had a wide circulation. In these the method of combining theory and practice, which has been so successfully employed in teaching the modern languages, is applied to the Latin and Greek with great skill. In the year 1848 he was elected, by the General Conference of the Church, editor of the Methodist Quarterly Review, to which post he was also re-elected in 1852, upon the expiration of his first term of office. Under his editorial management the Quarterly attained a high reputation both in America and Europe. Dr. M'Clintock imparted to his Review some of the striking characteristics of his own mind, a profound interest in the metaphysical problems of his time, and a genial sympathy with every species of excellence in science and literature. The philosophical discussions which graced the pages of the Review called forth the encomiums of the profound minds of the age, while its literary notices were accepted as faultless critical judgments of authors and books. In 1851 he was elected to the Presidency of the Wesleyan University, vacated by the lamented death of Dr. Olin. He declined the call in view of the state of his health at the time. In 1855 he was chosen President of the Troy University, an institution which is soon to go into operation with great promise of success. His final decision with regard to this invitation has not yet transpired. In 1857 he was deputed, with Bishop Simpson, to bear the fraternal greetings of American Methodism to the British Wesleyan Conference. The great interest excited in England and Ireland by the presence of the deputation, and the gathering of crowds to hear their eloquent words, are fresh in the recollection of thousands, both in the Old World and in the New. Upon returning from England, Dr. M'Clintock assumed the pastoral charge of the St. Paul's Methodist Church (formerly worshiping in Mulberry Street), to which he had been appointed the previous spring. Here his earnest and eloquent ministry has attracted a crowded auditory.

REV. JOHN M'CLINTOCK, D.D.—[FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY BRADY.]

The subject of our rapid and necessarily brief sketch is a man of rare powers, of large acquisitions, and of great facility in their use. Gifted also with a melodious voice, a pleasing address, and the hearty sympathy with humanity which genuine piety inspires, his pulpit addresses are characterized by the highest order of excellence. In them thorough discussion of the theme chosen is combined with persuasive appeal to the hearer's conscience. He is equally at home upon that more difficult stage, the platform. Always happy in his line of remark, he is always able. But his highest inspirations seem to be called forth in advocating the claims of Christian missions, some of his appeals for which have been efforts of overwhelming power. Few men have so many sincerely attached friends, and no one is more worthy of them.



Dr. M'Clintock, in association with Dr. Strong of Flushing, has been for some years engaged in preparing a complete Biblical and Theological Dictionary, which will be a valuable addition to that department of literature, bringing up facts to the latest period of scientific research, and going over the whole field with a thoroughness not before attempted in similar scientific works. He is still in the prime of life, and though troubled with fluctuating health, we trust he will be spared for long years of usefulness to the Church and the world.

Dr. M'Clintock's new church—St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church in Fourth Avenue, New York—was inaugurated last Sunday; and we here with present a fine illustration of it.

The site is an admirable one, fronting ninety-fifty feet on Fourth Avenue, and one hundred and fifty feet on Twenty-second Street.

The church is built of white marble, in what has been called the Romanesque style. The extreme length of the building, including both the church and the chapel, is one hundred and forty-six feet; the entire breadth is seventy-five feet. The top of the spire is two hundred and ten feet from the ground.

The auditorium of the church is sixty-six feet wide by eighty-eight long. It is finished with a clear-story and a groined ceiling. The height of the nave is forty-five feet. There are one hundred and forty-four pews on the ground-floor, and sixty in the side galleries. There are comfortable seats for thirteen hundred persons.

The stage is of two-and-twenty-second Street, and is thirty feet wide by sixty-nine deep in the clear. The audience-room is on the second floor, to which it has a fine high ceiling twenty-one feet from the floor. On the ground-floor are four class-rooms, and an infant-school room, capable of accommodating from one hundred and fifty totwo hundred children.

The general appearance of the building, within and without, is chaste and simple.

The dedicatory services on the occasion of the opening of the church—those prescribed by the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church—were witnessed by an immense congregation, every portion of the church being filled, and many standing in the aisles, while others were unable to obtain even this accommodation. Rev. Dr. Durbin preached an affecting sermon, in the morning, from the text, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Bishop Ames, of Indiana, and the venerable Rev. Dr. Bangs, also took part in the morning exercises. Rev. Dr. M'Clintock, the pastor of the church, preached a fine sermon in the afternoon, and Rev. Thomas Sewell, of Baltimore, in the evening. The church was crowded on each occasion.

LITERARY.

Few biographies possess the interest which we have found in that of Swedenborg, the railway projector; which is now reprinted by Lippincott & Brother. It has all the fascination of romance. The life of Swedenborg was, indeed, not a little like that of the old heroes, only that it was in modern England and in dingy workshops that he achieved his greatest triumphs. A poor boy, not knowing what to read or write, he rejoices at obtaining employment in a colliery which barely gives him bread. His first triumph is promotion to the post of assistant-assistant in the engine-room—a boy, that is to say, to a man; then he lashes the engine, and becomes engine-climber to the neighborhood; then he builds a locomotive engine; and, finally, he completes the Railway King, the friend of soldiers, the guest of the prime ministers. He fights a battle with all comforts in the fields near the mine where he is at work—a regular not-to-with another fireman; and a few years later is fighting with his hands for the parliament, the great battle of the new age against the heretics of old tyranny. We have no space for extracts from the book, which we commend to all classes of readers, and especially to working men.

Dr. Francis is one of the wonders of New York. Long may he remain among us! His historical discourses, original and extended, published in a 12mo volume, by Bar, and forms a most instructive and amusing sketch of this city. Few men are capable of giving us such reminiscences. Dr. Francis has been associated for years with all the great literary, and many of the great commercial projects which have made New York what it is. His memory is good; his style cheerful and animated; his wit constantly flowing. The volume abounds in anecdotes of men and things in the metropolis during the last fifty and some preceding years.

When Shelley and Byron went to Pisa, and thence, Shelley to the Bay of Spezzia and Byron to Leghorn, they were accompanied by their friend, E. J. Trelawney, a wealthy Englishman of a roving disposition. Mr. Trelawney's history, so far as we are interested in it, was begun and ended within a brief space of time. He met Shelley and Byron by chance, a few days later, in the same city. An intimacy ensued. He built them each a boat, he ramabled, rode, walked, talked, and drank with them. He hired a house for Shelley on the Bay shore, and he finally accompanied him in the boat, and watched his tiff out of sight, on that stormy afternoon when he and Williams were lost. Then he built the grate and pan to burn their bodies he kindled the funeral pile, poured the libations of oil and wine over the dead, gathered the ashes, and with his own hands Byron and Leigh Hunt stood. Up or strike a blow for the cause of liberty in Rome. Then he took Byron to Greece, fought there bravely for Greece, and for the last of the rebels; outlived Byron at Missolonghi, and fought on until till the war was over, and then went we know not where. This part of his life M. T. Trelawney reviews in PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS OF BYRON AND SHELLEY (published by Ticknor and Fields).

Let no one who would retain any exalted idea of either of the poets read these accounts of their daily lives. Shelley, indeed—for we cannot make the favorite of Trelawney—does not sink very much in the social scale from what he has ever been to us; but, if Mr. Trelawney is to be believed (and he doubtless is), then Byron was the shabbiest of fellows, and even much more mean as a man and a friend than we had supposed him. No one has been in the habit of considering this poet as a great man, or even an ordinarily agreeable man; but the volume before us certainly reduces him to a very contemptible position. He is said to be the nonvolitance of the death of Shelley that he had parted from Byron with disgust and contempt on the afternoon when he was lost. Poor Leigh Hunt, wrecked by Williams and Byron's ungentlemanly. Perhaps this explains why Leigh Hunt said in his carriage, and did not walk or talk with Byron at the burning of Shelley.

The book contains a store of personal anecdote that will be exceedingly attractive to all literary readers. The discovery of Trelawney after Byron's death that the poet had two club feet, has already been published extensively. The fact that Byron had concealed it all his life long, even from his most intimate friends, is very suggestive. The deformity was his horror. He had thrashed his servant, Fletcher, to haunt him if he allowed any one to see his foot after he was dead. But Trelawney lifted the sheet while Fletcher was away. It is remarkable that Trelawney had been swimming often to Byron's boat, and had never made this discovery before.

A characteristic anecdote of Shelley is this, with which we close our notice. Trelawney had been bathing one day in the Arno:

"Shelley said mournfully, 'Why can't I swim, it seems so very easy?' I answered, 'Because you think you can't, and, consequently, you will; take a header off this boat, and when you rise form to your back—you will find the Arno will support you as easily as the sea.' Shelley did so. He rose head this wrong way."

Mr. Trelawney had said nothing about wrecked oil-cloths and socks, and plugged in; and there he lay stretched out in the water, quite unsupported, and apparently either as struggle to save himself. He would have been drowned if I had not instantly dived for him, and by main force saved his breath he said,

"I always had a dread of the well, and they say that with locations. In another minute I should have found it, and you would have had an empty shell. It is an awful getting rid of the body.

"What would Mrs. Shelley have said to me if I had given her an empty coffin?

"'Don't tell Mary—not a word!' he rejoined, and then continued, 'Life is a terrible temptation—sometimes one might have been in another planet.'"

Carlton & Porter send us a little book entitled SCRIPTURE LESSONS, designed for Sunday-Schools and Families, by CAROLINE R. BUDDE. It consists of a succession of questions and answers on the text of those parts of the Bible History in which children are usually instructed. The book is a valuable assistant to mothers and to Sunday-school teachers. It is highly recommended by Bishop Janes, Rev. Dr. M'Clintock, Dr. Strickland and other eminent clergymen.

The same publishers issue a small but eloquent appeal to the unconverted, from the pen of Rev. Dr. Jesse T. Peck, entitled WHAT MUST I DO TO BE SAVED? It is a tract of handy book, whose cheapness in circulation will do great good.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 24 May, in the Senate, Senator Chandler introduced the subject of the improvement of the river St. Clair Flats. Referred. Mr. Bell, from the committee to which the subject was referred, reported a resolution directing the Committee of Commerce to inquire into the expediency of the present and future improvement of the river and to report. The Indian Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and after debate, in which Messrs. Bell and Crittenden participated, the bill was passed by 39 to 9.——In the House, Mr. Stephens reported a bill for the admission of Minnesota.——Also on the Senate Bill for the admission of Minnesota.

On Tuesday, 25 May, in the Senate, Mr. Bell, from the committee to introduce a resolution prohibiting sales of the public lands to settlers before they are surveyed. On 8th, both Houses were occupied with the customary eulogies on Senator Evans. In the Senate, they were delivered by Senators Hammond, Benjamin, Hale, and Wilson; in the House, by Messrs. M'Queen, Bocock, and Colfax.

ANOTHER NEW TERRITORY.

The House Committee on Territories have authorized their chairman to report a bill for the organization of a Territorial government out of territory west of Utah, Carson Valley, to be called Nevada. The bill will be reported next week, and strenuously urged. The other appointments by the Committee for Territorial governments will not be acted on this session.

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION SCHEME.

A bill introduced into the Senate by Senator Kennedy, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices proposed to establish a line of mail steamers between the ports of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Liverpool, touching at Norfolk and Savannah. The Postmaster-General is authorized to contract with Andrew W. Thompson to establish the line, which is to consist of six iron steamers of not less than two thousand tons each. The duties of the Treasury are to be paid to the Collector of the United States at the port of departure, payable semi-annually, and the contract is to run for ten years, to be annulled at thirds the cost.

The rate of the ships is to be paid for from time to time as the work progresses, and time amount is to be deducted from the last payment. An annual payment is to cent, commencing at the end of the second year, and continuing for eight years. The annual payment is to be $25,000 each for a complete voyage out and back. The vessels are to be built in the United States, and of such steamers. The contract is to be for ten years' regular service. The bill was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices.

THE PRESIDENT ON THE KANSAS QUESTION.

On the passage of Mr. English's Kansas Compromise Bill, the President left Washington for the country at Washington. He thanked them for the civility, and in reply to their congratulations on the passage of the bill, said that he considered it a triumph of justice and right. The last issues of the country were involved. I hope and believe the result will tend to promote the peace and harmony of the country. I congratulate you and myself upon the fate of the earth the people of Washington are entitled to the credit of the passage of the bill, upon which has rendered us glorious abroad and successful and prosperous at home. I do not think it will be long becoming in war to enter into any discussion of the great question which has been settled by Congress. I cannot conclude these brief remarks with again repeating my thanks for your kind reception of me, and my wish that you should ever remember it to the last period of my life.

MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

Municipal elections have taken place in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and Indianapolis. At both the democrats have been successful. The vote in the city of Philadelphia is as follows: the republican ticket at Indianapolis.

THE MILITARY EXPEDITION TO UTAH.

Major-General Smith has issued elaborate orders relative to the movements of the troops destined for Utah forces. The trainmen are to be divided into divisions of two hundred and twenty-five wagons each, and the trains will be organized into columns, each column constituting the first division. The first column will march on the 10th, the first regiment, and the second on the 20th. The remaining drivers are already organized, and ordered to march. The commissary-general, Quartermaster-General, and Surgeon-General are superintending the escort of the first drove of supplies, which will leave Fort Leavenworth on the 15th. The third column, under Colonel May, marches on the 20th. The fourth column, under Colonel Cooke, marches on the 30th. The fifth column, under Colonel Sumner, marches on the 10th of June. The sixth column, under Colonel Alexander, on the 4th of June. These columns for the present constitute the whole force of the army, under command of General Harney. Each column is to be supplied with a battery of artillery, and the whole force is to be accompanied by a large body of cavalry.

General Smith is now in St. Louis, and it is stated that he will proceed to the region that is known into a short period.

THE PARAGUAY EXPEDITION COMMISSIONERS.

Commissioners M'Culloch and Powell left Fort Leavenworth, on the 4th, well prepared for every emergency. A train across the Plains, and, nothing occurring out of the ordinary course, they will reach Salt Lake City by the 20th Bridger, or the camp of the expedition, between the 20th and 25th of June.

The Herald correspondent says: "The Commissioners will be well received and treated with kindness by the inhabitants of Utah, influencing them of the regards and friendship which the States entertain for their fellow-citizens, and his appointment of new Federal officers to administer the laws of the Territory. It is expected, however, in order that the guilty, if such be among them, may be brought to punishment, that the Commissioners will be empowered to receive the confessions of individuals implicated against the General Government that they be vindicated.

If Brigham consents to the preceding arrangement the Commissioners will proceed to Salt Lake unattended by a form from the mountains to their friendes to await the issue of events, and to be ready to act in any emergency that their various departments. An armistice is to be entered into by the Mormons and the United States, and this would be the only Governor they know; but whether it be expected by the leaders will be determined by circumstances.

PERSONAL.

The correspondent of the Herald gives the following gossip about the Secretary of the Treasury: "Cobb is in good society at Washington; "Fashionables society has a great attraction to an ex-cotton Speculator, and there is a very strong flirtation between an attache of the Spanish legation and the wife of one of the wealthiest and oldest of the richest bankers in the Union—a good-man of the name of Corcoran. Corcoran is a banker, and has been for many years. He is a millionaire, and, as a matter of course, will come into a matter of five millions, and is consequently, a desirable match for a young Spaniard, desirable young fellows about town. More particularly was this the case when the lady was a widow. Corcoran's wife, which youth, like snowstorm after blue bird holidays, is a thing of the past, and Corcoran is a widower, and is evidently called "Bill."

It seems Kimball favored the youth, and made an appointment to meet him one afternoon in the Post-Office. Corcoran got wind of the affair, and by a ruse from the banker's mansion, naturally supposed her to be there, and, in fact, she was there, and was waiting for Kimball. Corcoran, however, and being of a suspicious mind she informed Old Money Bags how this son of a Spaniard was to be found at the Post-Office. Corcoran, whereupon Old Flowers waxed wroth, and straightway called his daughter to account. She, in reply, gave him the unpleasant expression 'fun.'

Corcoran was not in a good temperament: and the result by the case, forcing a duel, wrote a note to Kimball, requesting him to meet him at Bladensburg, "with bad garden gate." Whereby he went, and it was locked, and he went to the tavern, and it was locked, and then he came back to the garden gate, by the lawyer, was admitted. Whether the duel came off, or whether the parties met, we have not heard, but the lawyer was pretty, guarded by two members, and found the gentleman in the garden gate. Corcoran was not there, and young Young Italy wanted to explain—papa wouldn't hear it; but papa would, and was more unanswerably agreed in his explanations, which might be compared to the shock of battle.

Young Italy was not to be put off, and was unanswerably declined the house. All the young men about town are laughing at the affair, and so is the public at it. He Howard to Bill, Junior, of the British staff, says "pon his soul he really never did, you know, and what can a fellow expect, for instance, you see, if this sort of thing was, you know, to going on, you see. All the fellows must stand by each other, you see, and call the old cock out, one by one, you know." Mr. de Bark's opinion is shared generally by the leading diplomats, and I am told that Kimball has been unanimously agreed in his course any more money from the banker, nor to eat his dinners unless he does the square thing about the girl and Young Spain."

The Turkish Pasha and suite have left Washington for New York. They took leave of the President and Secretary of the Navy, and joined shortly to return to the city. Previous to their departure the government bestowed any thing it done in reference to building the steamboat.

Mr. Buchanan, a brother of Hon. James Buchanan, a private secretary, have joined Washington for Arizona on the steamer of the 15th. Mr. Sayles is charged with important duties connected with the Postoffice, Interior and Treasury Departments. Mr. Buchanan, it is said that he has established many communications with reference to Sonora.

Recalling the Peruvian forget minister has been negotiated with his discharge from custody, for the Minister of Peru has instructed the Attorney-General, Attorney for the State of Kentucky to take legal steps to obtain the discharge of Mr. Crittenden, from Peruta. It some singular that a man who stands charged with criminal communication with the enemy of only a few thousand dollars, of which charges he seems to have been fully exculpated, should be so persecuted, and at such an enormous expense. The circumstances attending the arrest of Mr. Crittenden are familiar to the public, and we need not here recall them.

A correspondent of the Richmond Dispatch, writing from Washington, May 5th, says: "Mr. Corwin's trial has just sailed from this port for Greytown, with a large supply of ordnance, ammunition, and stores, and the proclamations she miserable, self-constituted English Government of Nicaragua. He has many friends here, and expect to support his pretensions, and he will soon be restored to his place. The former appointee, Mr. Lawrence, or San José del Norte. The Colonel has, doubtless, by his long experience in the presidential chair, one's voice has already confirmed his government."

The Washington Union says: "The President will Why gentlemen are rapidly arriving here on their way to the Democratic Convention at Cincinnati. Governor Hunter, the former General Harney, Colonel J. E. Johnston, Mr. Slidell, Senator Bright, Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, and Governor Walker, of Mississippi, all of whom arrived last evening. Colonel D. Morrison, Colonel Forney, and Mr. Bocock, arrived this day."

Rev. Dr. T. S. King, of Boston, was unexpectedly introduced to a jury at Bradford, Illinois, the other day. He was called upon to testify to the character of a witness, who was making an argument, furnished him a chair, and began: "Gentlemen of the jury, I suppose you know that, like God-fearing men, we all went to the camp-meeting, and there we got acquainted, and I can state certain propositions. Let us now look at the evidence, and see what it proves."

Governor Wise, of Virginia, had a fine negro, to whom he gave the privilege of hiring himself out and paying his master a certain sum. The negro has now got easier home to his master to tell him that the man who hired him has run away, owing him a large sum of money.

"Well," said his master, "what of that? I don't wish to be paid."

"But, you see, massa," said Sam, "I've had a rough time myself. I've been sick, and I've been unlucky, and don't 'spect I shall. Last more's two or three years, and I'd rather you'd wait."

General Scott has been telegraphed to by the President to proceed to Washington, and will arrive there to-day. He was connected with Utah. The General accordingly left Washington on Saturday last and proceeded to St. Louis, for that city.

The Rochester Union publishes the following letter from Mr. M. J. Stout, convicted recently of the Libbie Myers murder:

"I take pleasure in this public contradiction to a brief article, which appeared a short time since, in the columns of the Rochester Democrat, to the effect that, as religious reformers, Mr. Beardman, Professor Cutting, and myself, were engaged in the publication of some pamphlet, and that no definite selections have yet been made. If it is to be considered a matter of any importance to the religious gentlemen will be selected, I am pleased to say I will not be one of the number, as I have not the slightest intention to my own mind. The information or report of Mr. Beardman, Professor Cutting, and myself, was simply a conversation with a friend in Cattaraugus County, Mississippi, recently fallen heir to a fortune of some $50,000, and who desired to do some good with his money. Mr. Beardman, and it is added, as a piece of correct information to the public, that Mr. Beardman has his only two children, charming daughters.

Mr. Jas. Beardman has published a letter to Senator Stidell, in which he says that justice to the cause I represent requires me to say that I never was in favor of, nor believe in say acts, in a fiance of misstatements, and that I never contemplated the publication of a pamphlet.

Mr. Lee, the brother of Mr. Cameron, when charged by the Buchanan journals with having bought up the Pennsylvania voters for his election. He said, "The only difference between me and the Democratic party is that I paid in cash to the President is, that he bribed with trust funds, while I bribed with my own money. I am glad to say that both of them were promised, on the faith of Mr. Buchanan's letter, that they would be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

It is said by the stage, who love mischief, that Judge Douglas and Mr. Yancey, who met at dinner at the banquet, informed him that it was a medical cause that they were not on speaking terms. "Douglas may be a good one," said Mr. Lemay; "but, Judge, I don't like your principles, and I'll be d——d if I do."

Apropos of Mr. Van Zandt, who has just died at Albany, the Albany Argus publishes the following anecdote of the following reminiscences:

"Mr. Van Zandt was a witness of the most memorable scene in the history of the Senate—the burst of Calhoun. He was a boy, engaged at play on the floor of the Senate, when he was startled by the sudden appearance of the then present State Street. The boy were told that a company of Indians were coming down Market Street, and that one of them was General Schuyler. He ran up to the window in time to see the Indians pass by, and to witness an event was made out of less material than is now required. The Indians, in fact, were a party of gentlemen on horseback, in an easy, familiar, and unpretending way, and the boy was told that Schuyler was another John Burgoyne. The battle over, Saratoga was remembered, and the boy was told that he was a boy of the Revolution. Schuyler was just such a person as might be expected from General Schuyler's reputation as a man whose life had been passed in the associations of high courtesy.

"Mr. Van Zandt saw Washington when in all the array of official dignity, a phase of life which our First President adorned, and which, it must be confessed, he rather enjoyed. It was at New York. Washington was seated in a coach, drawn by six horses. He was dressed in a dark suit, and looked very erect and rather stern, and the boy was told that he was a monarch. He was told that people on each side as the carriage advanced. Being this latter incident would seem not quite in consistency with the President's professing of courtesy.

"Mr. Van Zandt was walking on the ramparts of Fort Frederick (which reared its defenses in State Street, just south of St. Peter's Church) at the very time of the battle of Saratoga, and heard the noise of the cannonade. He asked a soldier, who was with him, if this could be so? and the soldier confirmed it, as they were at a height where the strong northeast wind, then blowing, could bear the sound uninterrupted. History has many verified records of the noise of battle borne to distances greater than was this. He saw the Indians gathered in State Street, above the Old Dutch Church, to receive their annuity, and exhibiting their dances, and meeting in a desultory council, to the edification of the Albanians, who had suffered enough of the reality of Indian association to induce in them a willingness that the visits of their red brethren should be as short as possible. They were seated for the purpose of enumeration on the sidewalk, and the line extended from the Church to the present locality of Pearl Street, and it was a policy greatly wondered at by the multitude that the distribution was made per capita, the little strapped-up papoose receiving as much as the old war-chief who, probably, could have entertained the Albanians with curious statistics concerning the scalps of many of their ancestors."

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

THERE has been but little done of importance in Parliament. On the 22d, the Oaths Bill was read a second time in the House of Lords, but Lord Derby announced that he should continue to oppose that portion of the measure which removes the Jewish disabilities. In the House of Commons, the Attorney-General had announced, in response to an inquiry from Mr. Roebuck, that the Government would not take further proceedings against Dr. Bernard in regard to the French conspiracy. Lord Stanley had stated that, until the Government received the opinion of the Government and Legislature of Canada, he would abstain from stating their intentions with reference to the privilege of the Hudson Bay Company. A bill was introduced, and read the first time, abolishing the property qualifications of Members of Parliament. Sir E. Perry asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether instructions had been sent to India that terms of amnesty, including protection in matters of religion, should be held out to the inhabitants of Oude, except in cases of heinous crime; and, if no such instructions had been sent, whether, in the opinion of the Government, it was not expedient to do so. Mr. Disraeli replied that instructions had been sent to India that there should be full toleration and protection to property, so far as was consistent with justice. On motion of Mr. Disraeli, a resolution imposing a stamp of one penny on all bankers' checks was carried amidst loud cheers.

On the 26th April the Chancellor of the Exchequer moved that the House will, upon Friday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider the act of the 16th and 17th Victoria, c. 95, to provide for the Government of India. After referring to the overwhelming majority against Mr. Baring's motion, that it is not expedient at present to legislate upon the Government of India, he said that the majority had only given to the noble Lord then at the head of the Government permission to bring in his bill, but by no means pledged the House to any of its details. This led to a long debate, in which Lord Palmerston, Mr. Gladstone, and others took part; but no vote was taken.

THE ACQUITTAL OF DR. BERNARD.—HIS SPEECH TO THE JURY.

We had last week, by telegraph, the fact that Bernard was acquitted. We have now the details in the London Times: "Immediately at the conclusion of the summing up by the Judge, and before the jury had retired, the prisoner, with much warmth of tone, vehemence of gesture, and rapidity of utterance, exclaimed:

"'I declare that the words which have been spoken, or quoted, by the Judge, with reference to the balls, are not correct, and that the balls which were taken by Giorgi to Brussels were not those which were used in Paris. I have brought no evidence here, because I am not accustomed to compromise any person. I declare that I am not a hirer of assassins, and that Rudio, as he stated on his trial in Paris, himself asked to be sent to Orsini. I declare that I have not hired assassins, and that of the blood of the victims of the 14th of January there was nothing on my heart more than in that of any one here. My only wish is to crush despotism and tyranny every where. To effect that I have conspired, and I will conspire ever, because it is my duty, my sacred duty, and the duty of every lover of liberty, to do so. But never, never, will I be a murderer.'

"At the close of this address the jury retired to consider their verdict.

THE VERDICT.

"The spectacle which the court then presented was of the most animated and exciting description. The small gallery immediately over the dock, and accessible to the general public, was densely packed. In front of it sat several well-dressed ladies, who had been unable to obtain more agreeable accommodation in other parts of the building. All the more-favored seats on the bench, and in its immediate vicinity, had been occupied from an early hour in the morning by persons of rank and station, many of them ladies. Others, as the crisis approached, made incessant applications for even standing-room within the precincts of the court, and the complaisance of the ever-obliging under-sheriffs was taxed to the utmost to comply with their wishes. The members of the bar stood in groups discussing the incidents of the trial, and speculating on its probable result, as did also the greater part of the audience. On the floor of the court was seen, in conversation with another, a gentleman of prepossessing appearance and manners, an avocat of the French bar, who had defended Pierri on his trial in Paris. Precisely as the clock struck four an intimation was given that the jury were returning, and in an instant the loud hum of conversation which had prevailed for upward of an hour subsided into profound silence. The prisoner reappeared in the dock. The judges entered and resumed their accustomed places on the bench, and the jury, who had been absent for an hour and twenty minutes, answered to their names as they were called over in the usual way, the prisoner, whose face was flushed with emotion, looking wistfully in the direction of the jury-box, as if to discover by anticipation some faint omen of his fate.

"Mr. Clark, the Clerk of Arraigns, addressing the jury, said, 'Gentlemen, are you agreed upon your verdict?'

"The Foreman. 'We are.'

"Mr. Clark. 'How say you? Is Simon Bernard guilty or not guilty?'

"The Foreman. 'Not guilty.'

THE EFFECT.

"On the announcement of this decision a scene occurred unexampled, perhaps, in an English tribunal. From the gallery first, and then in an instant afterward from the floor of the court, proceeded a loud shout of exultation. The cheering was again and again repeated—the excitement was contagious—and many ladies of quality present waved their handkerchiefs in token of their delight. Vainly did the Lord Chief Justice endeavor by voice and gesture to still the tumult, and as powerless were the stentorian lungs of Mr. Harker, though exerted to the utmost, to restore silence. The prisoner, who was extremely excited, flourished his white pocket handkerchief over his head, and several times attempted to speak. By this time the verdict had reached the ears of the crowd assembled outside the Old Bailey, and the rapturous cheer which they raised, and after repeated, could be distinctly heard within the court. The Judges, unable, and perhaps unwilling to check this spontaneous ebullition of popular feeling, but yet not liking to sanction it by their presence, rose to depart.

"Bernard at length made a successful attempt to be heard, and, addressing the jury, said, with much vehemence of manner:

"'Gentlemen, that verdict is an expression of the truth. I am not guilty; and it proves that in England there is and always will be liberty, which will crush tyranny, whatever and wherever it may be. All honor to an English jury. [Renewed cheers.]

"The prisoner was then removed from the bar, the Judges left the bench, and the audience gradually dispersed. The jury, as they left the court escorted by the under-sheriffs and proceeded to their hotel on Ludgate-hill, received an enthusiastic ovation from the crowd assembled in the Old Bailey."

PROGRESS OF THE "LEVIATHAN."

The report of the Great Eastern Steam Navigation Company states that the total cost of the ship would be £804,522, or at the rate of £34 per ton, taking the ship at builders' measurement, 24,000 tons. The directors regret that they will be unable to complete her equipments before the ensuing autumn, when it is intended to made several preliminary voyages to America, for the purpose of testing the ship's capabilities, and in the spring to commence her voyages to India or Australia.

LADY INGLIS AT COURT.

The Hon. Lady Inglis has had the honor of personally relating to her Majesty the details of the siege of Lucknow. Her ladyship attended by command at Buckingham Palace, and the Queen listened with the most intense interest to the story of the sufferings and heroism of that gallant band who so nobly sustained their country's honor and renown during a period of almost unexampled danger and distress.

PROGRESS OF BRITISH FILIBUSTERISM.

Sir James Brooke, the Rajah of Sarawak, has been receiving, in Manchester, the compliment of a public dinner, and for this courtesy he made a long speech, which certainly possesses more than usual interest at the present moment, when we are at war with China, and, what is still worse, when we are almost dying of a cotton famine. The Rajah is a clever man, and of intense energy. He made out a strong case for the country with which his name and his fortunes for so many years have been mixed up; and he maintained, with a simple eloquence which told upon his hearers, that England should stand for the future to Sarawak in the character of a protector, which, as he described it, would give to this country "all the advantages of protection without any of its liabilities." The Times has devoted an article to the advocacy of Sir James Brooke's policy.

FRANCE.

RESULT OF THE CITY ELECTIONS.

The Globe contains the result of the elections. In the Third District, General Perrot, the Government candidate, has obtained the majority; in the Fifth District M. Esk, Government candidate, has also been returned by a majority; and in the Sixth District M. Jules Favre, the Opposition candidate, has been successful.

THE GARDEN OF THE TUILERIES TO BE RESERVED.

The intention to confiscate the best part of the garden of the Tuileries for the private use of the Emperor and Empress is now confessed by the Moniteur in the following artfully-worded paragraph: "The garden of the Tuileries is about to undergo a double modification. A new entrance will be made for the public on the terrace which runs parallel with the river, opposite the Rue Castiglione gate, which new entrance will face a bridge about to be made to connect the quay of the Tuileries with the Quai d'Orsay at the terminus of the Rue Bellechasse. At the same time that part of the garden which is reserved for their Majesties' promenades will be prolonged as far as the great basin of the parterres, and the public entrance by the quay will be removed to a point corresponding with that line. The existing gate opposite the Rue des Pyramides will remain open, as also will the public promenade on the Terrace des Feuillants and the adjoining avenue. These changes will facilitate communication between the quarter of the Rue de la Paix and the Faubourg St. Germain, while giving the necessary extension to the reserved gardens."

THE NEXT ROYAL VISIT.

A Paris correspondence in the Independance Belge asserts very positively that the Queen of England is going to visit the Emperor at Cherbourg this summer on the occasion of the opening of the railway there. The Duke of Malakhoff, it is said, is charged to present the invitation, and Lord Cowley's congé has been taken in order that he may be in England to make the necessary suggestions and arrangements. The same correspondence says that the project of assembling the Toulon and Brest fleets at Cherbourg has been abandoned by the Emperor, in order to avoid giving any shadow of offense to England by a display of force so near her coasts. The two fleets will meet for their customary evolutions off the Isle of Hyeres.

A QUEER REPLY TO AN INVITATION TO DINE.

The letter of M. Hénon, one of the members for Paris, declining an invitation to dine at the Tuileries, was as follows: "Monsieur le Grand Chambellan,—I have received the letter by which you invite me, in the name of the Emperor, to dine at the Tuileries. I should be greatly surprised, M. le Chambellan, to find myself at such a meeting, and my constituents would not be less so, at the moment when my friends are on the road to exile and transportation."

IMPERIAL NERVOUSNESS ABOUT ENGLAND.

The Paris Correspondent of the London Times, writing on the 22d of April, says: "When noticing the very offensive article in the Constitutionnel of Tuesday on the acquittal of Simon Bernard—an article which, by-the-way, was regarded as a sort of pendant to the famous military addresses of the Moniteur—I declared my belief that M. Renee, whose name was signed to it, had not the authority either of the Emperor or of the Cabinet collectively for what he did. That I was correct in this seems proved from the fact that M. Renee has been dismissed from the post of political director of the Constitutionnel and Pays, both of which belong to the same proprietor; and I am assured that the cause of dismissal is the article in question. The fall of M. Renee is broken by an indemnity of 50,000 francs, which it appears every political director of the paper has a right to in case of a removal so sudden as the present."

We learn, however, by later intelligence, that M. Renee had been restored to his post.

THE HUMORS OF LONGCHAMPS.

A Paris letter says: "Longchamps this year has not been worth a paragraph. It has long fallen off from its ancient splendor. In the course of a long walk, we only observed among the very few fancy equipages that were to be seen, one possessing a claim to originality. In a well-appointed barouche and pair were to be seen a gentleman, having on either side of him a lady in a ball dress, and without a bonnet. One of these ladies had a profusion of gold locks, exquisitely arranged; the other was a brunette, with hair equally fine. Both turned their heads toward the apparently favored gentleman sitting between them, whom they seemed to be addressing with great animation. The first impression on the spectator, after admiring the beautiful hair of these ladies, was one of wonderment that they should venture abroad in a cold wind so lightly clad. On closer inspection it appeared that they were wax figures, and that the carriage was the ambulatory advertisement of a hair-dresser."

CAPILLARY ATTRACTION.

A Paris letter tells the following story: "In a respectable street in Paris lives a bronze manufacturer, a certain Monsieur X., who has a daughter. This girl is truly a 'fair one of the golden locks.' Her hair is the finest ever seen on a woman's head, silky, flowing, and abundant. Lord S. saw Mademoiselle X., and was magnetized by the beauty of her capillary attraction. He then rented an apartment directly opposite the house of Monsieur X., and passed every day in admiring the head of hair referred to. Soon this delight of his eyes was not great enough for his heart, and he called upon X., and asked for a private interview, which was granted. 'Sir,' said he, 'I come to make you a proposition which concerns your daughter. I hope that you will accept it, for it has nothing in it not perfectly honorable.' 'Speak, Sir.' 'Sir, my name is Lord S. You have, without doubt, heard of my name, of my rank, of my fortune. I come to beg you to accept me as the hair-dresser of your daughter.' X. showed signs of anger. 'Permit me, Sir,' added Lord S., 'to repeat to you that my proposition is completely pure and honorable. I will not address a word to Mademoiselle X. I will dress her hair every day, and every day I will give her a guinea. You shall be there, you, or any other person you may wish.' 'But, my lord—' 'Do not answer me. Consult your daughter if you wish. Here is my address. I give you two days to reflect. This is Monday; if by Wednesday evening I do not receive an answer I will blow out my brains.' And Lord S. went out. He had spoken in so decided a tone, that X. believed him capable of executing his menace. He spoke of the matter to his daughter, who was in favor of accepting this singular proposition. On Tuesday Lord S. was informed that it was not desired that he should blow out his brains. From that time he has been every noon at the lady's house. He was introduced to her, and since then he has every day dressed her magnificent hair, into which he plunges his aristocratic hands with ecstasy. As to Mademoiselle X., she appears fascinated with her lordly hair-dresser. He performs his duty with dexterity, taste, and skill. He never addresses to her a word nor a compliment. As soon as the task is over, he places a guinea upon the marble table, makes a respectful bow to the lady, and takes his leave. His guinea is every day given to a poor family, and thus his eccentricity is made the cause of a good action. Of course it is believed that this vaudeville of real life will finish with a marriage."

SWEDEN.

PALPITATIONS OF THE HEART SET TO MUSIC.]

Dr. Rhuders, physician, has set to music the palpitations and irregular beatings of the heart of a female who is a patient in the hospital at Upsal, in Sweden. "This disease, written in musical notes, with quavers and semiquavers, forms a kind of waltz, and is one of the greatest curiosities of pathological anatomy."

GERMANY.

A TALE OF TERROR.

The following rather marvelous story is told by one of the Vienna journals: "As a farmer of Orsinovi, near that city, was a few nights ago returning from market, he stopped at a roadside public house and imprudently showed the innkeeper a large sum which he had received. In the night the innkeeper, armed with a poniard, stole into the farmer's chamber, and prepared to stab him; but the farmer, who, from the man's manner at supper, conceived suspicions of foul play, had thrown himself, fully dressed, on the bed, without going to sleep, and being a powerful man he wrested the poniard from the other, and using it against him laid him dead at his feet. A few moments after he heard stones thrown at the window, and a voice which he recognized as that of the innkeeper's son, said, "The grave is ready!" This proved to him that the father and son had planned his murder, and to avoid detection had intended burying the dead body at once. He thereupon wrapped the body in a sheet and let it down from the window; he then ran to the gendarmerie and stated what had occurred. Three gendarmes immediately accompanied him to the house, and found the young man busily engaged in shoveling earth into a grave. 'What are you burying?' said they. 'Only a horse, which has just died.' 'You are mistaken,' answered one of them, jumping into the grave and raising the corpse. 'Look!' and he held up a lantern to the face of the deceased. 'Good God!' cried the young man, thunderstruck, 'it is my father.' He was then arrested, and at once confessed all."

ITALY.

THE PRISONS AT NAPLES.

Mr. Parke, the engineer of the steamer Cagliari, has communicated to an English paper an account of his sufferings while in prison at Naples, in which he says: "The first proceeding upon arrival at the prison was to unclothe us entirely, and search our clothes and persons, even to the hair in our heads. We were then conducted by a dark passage through a number of massive doors, each of which was unlocked and locked again as we passed, until we arrived at a cell into which eight of us were put. This cell was so small that our mattresses placed round the walls were touching each other; we had no chairs, but sat on the beds; and the only light was furnished by a window strongly grated, and which we were prevented looking out of, as a sentry who paced the court-yard had orders to shoot any prisoner who might stand at the window. Besides, our cell was horribly damp, so that we nearly all suffered from its effects in pains in the legs; and it was so infested by rats that in one night, shortly after our arrival, I caught seven large ones, having made a trap of one of my boots. But the worst evils were the bad air and bad water. There was no ventilation, and a large wooden tub, which served us for the most necessary wants, emitted such effluvia that we lived in a constant state of nausea. This was heightened by the turnkeys neglecting sometimes to empty it, in order to force a bribe from us, and in which they were generally successful. The water, too, was served to us in a wooden pail, which was so dirty that it gave a taste to the water, which made it unfit to drink. This was also made a source of emolument to the jailers, for they served us with drinkable water for one half-penny a glass. Upon our entrance into the jail the first question we were asked by the attendants was if we wanted beds, as we could have them by paying 4d. per night. Of course, we asked for beds, and received each a low bedstead and mattress, which latter, however, was extremely uncomfortable, owing to its being made of unpicked oakum. Still, the greatest evil of the 'beds' was one which discovered itself afterward—namely, their being full of vermin, with which we found ourselves soon covered. I must not forget to mention another sort of companions which were sufficiently numerous—namely, flat lizards, which ran up and down the walls, and added not a little to the repulsiveness of the place."

ANOTHER MADONNA STOLEN.

A letter from Rome in the Univers contains the following extraordinary tale: "In the cathedral of Velletri, near Rome, was an image of the Virgin, nearly covered with gold, and decked out with necklaces, rings, and jewelry, and it was held in great veneration by the people. In the Holy Week it was, according to custom, screened from view by a curtain, and on Holy Thursday some person contrived to steal it. On Good Friday the archpriest of the cathedral received a note thus conceived: 'I the undersigned know the thief, and the spot in which is deposited the image of the Madonna, and I will make revelations on three conditions—impunity for myself, the release of my brother who is condemned to death, and a pension of ten crowns a month. Vendetta.' The archpriest having ascertained that the image really had been abstracted, communicated the strange epistle to the delegate, Monseigneur Giordani. Instead of seeking at once for the writer of the letter, this dignitary applied to Rome for orders, and the Pope, fearing the total loss of the image, and the effect that would be produced among the people, directed that the first condition of the bandit should be accepted, but that the other two should be rejected. Vendetta having learned this resolution, spread among the people of Velletri the news of the robbery of the image, which the clergy of the cathedral had kept secret, and he wrote to the clergy that he would be content with impunity for himself and with five hundred crowns paid down. On Sunday the people went to the church, but as the image was not displayed, they became excited, and murmured; and at length some of them got on the altar, and tore down the curtain. The rumor was then spread by friends of Vendetta, that it was the Jesuits who had stolen the Madonna: and the excited people believing the falsehood, broke into the convent occupied by the Jesuits, which is adjacent to the cathedral, and with cries of 'La Madonna nostra!' completely sacked it, and ill-treated the reverend fathers. When the bishop descended from the pulpit a scarcely credible scene occurred; the brigand Vendetta, armed with a poniard, ascended it, and thus addressed the people: 'Be patient! The good fathers are innocent! It is I who stole the Madonna! But I will only restore it when the Government, to whom I grant a delay till Monday evening, shall have consented to the compact I have proposed to it. Be calm, therefore, and shout no more! I warn you, in conclusion, that my companions are armed as well as I!' What followed that harangue we have not yet heard."

INDIA.

THE LATEST NEWS.

There is intelligence from Lucknow to the 22d of March. On the 20th, Brigadier Campbell's force returned from the pursuit of the enemy. On the 21st the Mobries, the retreat of Nena Sahib, was stormed; he escaped, and a reward of 50,000 rupees was offered for his head. General Outram's force had discovered and destroyed a retreat of the rebels in Lucknow, and the Prime Minister is among those reported as killed. The fanatics continued to fire on the British. The Governor-General's proclamation calling on the Zemindars to submit had produced no effect. Peace prevailed at Oude, and the enemy were flying toward Secandra. Jung Bahadoor was to go to Allahabad. No civil officer had yet been sent to Lucknow by the government. Some of the inhabitants were returning to the city. The heat was increasing daily.

INCIDENTS OF THE CAPTURE OF LUCKNOW.

We gave in our last an account of the capture of Lucknow. We now extract a few passages from Mr. Russell's letter describing that event. The first recounts a skirmish on the way to the Martinière.

THE BAYS' FIRST BLOOD.

"But look! See, on the line of road there suddenly rushes from behind the trees a confused crowd of horse and foot in headlong flight. They are clad in white, and through the dust we see they are the enemy. As the infantry run they turn and fire back, and break across the rough and broken ground which lies between the river and the road; their horsemen still press on across the bridge over the nullah straight to the city. And now with sabres flashing in the sun, and arms raised high, the Bays, drawing their first blood, come sweeping after the crowd, through which riderless horses are rushing wild with fright. But the enemy's foot are already safe in the ravines, and are running like monkeys across the nullahs; and, as our horse dash on after the enemy's horse, spirt after spirt of white smoke dots the green groves, and the enemy open their heavy guns on our scattered horse. The pursuit is over—our men gather up and form into troops, and the horse artillery, rattling along after them, and unlimbering, quickly open with grape and canister on the Sepoys and matchlockmen in the ravines, and clear the woods with their fire.

CAPTAIN PEEL WOUNDED.

"On returning to the Dilkoosha, about twelve o'clock, I saw an anxious group of sailors at the entrance to one of the rooms. 'Captain Peel's wounded, Sir; there's a sad business,' said one of the men, in reply to my question. It was indeed so. He had walked out of the battery to look out for a good spot for another gun, and a matchlockman shot him through the thigh. The ball had passed by the bone, and could just be felt under the skin at the other side. Soon the surgeon came with chloroform, and the ball was cut out; but nothing could keep the gallant sailor quiet, and his anxiety to take part in the operations was so lively as to render the consequences of the wound more severe than they legitimately ought to be. Every one heard of the accident with grief—'What! Peel wounded? what a loss to us to-day!' Such was the universal exclamation.

HOW THE MARTINIERE WAS TAKEN.

"Our guns were now thundering away—mortars, howitzers, and 24-pounders—at the pits, huts, and Martinière, from which the enemy kept up an incessant fusillade of the weakest sort—the only thing remarkable about it being its pertinacity. The time wore on, and at last the Highlanders and Sikhs came marching from their camp, and drew up behind the Dilkoosha. The Chief, General Mansfield, and staff were on the roof, but, as the moment approached, Sir Colin went down and on foot among the men gave his last orders to the officers. And now just observe this fact: the enemy had remained steady in their trenches under the fire of six mortars and ten heavy guns and howitzers. But the instant they caught sight of our bayonets, and that the lines of the Sikhs and Highlanders came in view, we observed them, by twos and threes, and groups, and at last in masses, running and marching at the double as fast as they could clear out of the works, and moving to the rear or stealing off under cover of their parapets. The Commander-in-Chief came up to the roof again just in time to see the complete success of his plan. The orders were obeyed beautifully. We saw the Highlanders, with skirmishers thrown out in front, advancing rapidly, without a sound in their ranks, toward the Martinière, while the Sikhs on their flank, agile as panthers, ran at full speed toward the trenches, from which the enemy, firing a few hurried shots from their muskets, were flying so fast that not a man was left inside by the time our troops were within two hundred yards of the Martinière. But their gunners on the right of the Martinière, along the canal works, had seen the attack, and they began to pitch round shot up to us, and to plump them among the dhooly-bearers and light baggage advancing in rear of our column. In less than ten minutes we saw Highland bonnets among the trees in the park, and the Sikhs rushing through the ruins in the rear, looking in vain for an enemy.

PULWAN SINGH AND SIR COLIN CAMPBELL.

"While we were watching and waiting to get a glimpse of Outram, whose guns, mingled with incessant musketry, had kept up their thunder since daybreak, a diversion was effected on the roof of the Dilkoosha in the advent of Pulwan Singh, Brigadier of the Ghoorkas of Franks's division—a very gallant gentleman indeed. In white kid gloves, a bright olive tunic trimmed with gold lace, and fastened across the breast with a clasp of diamonds; tight olive pantaloons, with gold stripe; a gay little olive skull-cap, with a gold lace rim, in front of which—mines of Golconda!—there glittered, broad and large as one's hand, an aigretto of great diamonds, into which was fixed jantily, a light, graceful plume of bird of paradise feathers, the ends of which were curved in a gentle waving bend by the weight of pearls and emeralds attached to them—a cimeter with jeweled hilt and sheath, and jeweled pistols by his side—what a contrast did our friend present to plain Sir Colin in his pith helmet, a plain blue frock coat with buttons, and corduroy trowsers, whose only mark of command was his air and his trusty old sabre tucked under his arm! Pulwan Singh, however, soon retired, and after a time, when we had watched shot and rocket for some time, not without some admiration for the Sepoys, who kept steadily inside their works in spite of our shells and the balls, which covered them with pillars of dust, most of us followed his example.

THE TELEGRAPH WIRE.

"In this war, for the first time, a telegraphic wire has been carried along under fire and through the midst of a hostile country. Pari passu, from post to post it has moved on with our artillery, and scarcely has the Commander-in-Chief established his head-quarters at any spot where he intended to stay for a few days, when the post and the wire were established also. At one time the men are chased for miles by the enemy's cavalry—at another time they are attacked by the Sowars, and they and the wires are cut into pieces—again, their electric batteries are badly smashed by the fire of a gun, or their cart knocked to pieces by a round shot, but still they work on—creep over arid plains, across water-courses, span rivers, and pierce jungles, till, one after another, the rude poles raise aloft their slender burden, and the quick needle vibrates with its silent tongue amidst the thunder of the artillery. As Sir Colin advanced toward Lucknow the line was carried with or soon after him; a tent was pitched near his, a hole was dug in the ground and filled with water, and down dropped the wire from the pole stuck up in haste, dived into the water otter-like, the simple magnet was arranged, the battery set in play, and at once the steel moved responsive to every touch. The wire is thick, and is not protected by non-conducting coatings of any kind; it is twisted round the top of a rude pole fifteen or sixteen feet high, and, under ordinary states of the atmosphere, it is found to answer perfectly. We had not been very long in the Dilkoosha ere we saw, in dim perspective, the line of posts advancing toward us, and soon the wire was slipped into one of the drawing-room windows, and now it is at full work, surrounded by all the shattered splendor of the palace, inquiring after the Ghoorkas, asking for more of something or other, exchanging ideas between Sir Colin and Lord Canning, or flurrying along a newspaper message to yourself, amidst the whistle of the bullet, the roar of the round shot, and all the feverish scenes of war."

HOT SPRINGS NEAR SALT LAKE CITY.

SALT LAKE CITY AND ITS ENVIRONS.

THE illustration given below of Salt Lake City is probably the most accurate and effective that has ever appeared. The scene is of peculiar interest at the present time, as we may expect at any moment to hear of the occupation of the city by the United States troops.

This may not be an inappropriate time to place on record, for future reference, a few memoranda of the various people whose final extinction the Mormon expedition is likely to achieve. In the year 1830, one Joseph Smith, an idle person who had lived upon the credulity of his acquaintance, associated himself with other knaves, and pretended to have discovered, through the aid of divine revelation, the "Book of Mormon," which was a sort of supplement to the Bible. Joseph Smith, like other impostors, found dupes, and planted his new sect at Kirtland, Ohio. From thence they removed to Jackson County, Missouri, where they proposed to remain. Meanwhile, however, their religious tenets had gained wind, and aroused fanatic opposition on the part of the religious people residing in that part of the country. The most offensive of the Mormon principles was that which tolerated, if it did not enjoin, polygamy. It would appear from very fair evidence that this doctrine was ingrafted upon the Mormon theology in subservience to the licentiousness of its founder. Mistress Joseph Smith was guardian of a family of girls, orphans, who lived in her house. Two of these fell victims to the unprincipled passions of Smith, who, smarting under the just indignation of his wife, adopted the polygamic doctrine in order to gratify his propensities without risk of domestic broils. The bulk of his followers accepted the novelty without demur.

Not so the people of Missouri who were neighbors of the Mormons. They rebelled against Joe Smith's profanity and licentiousness, and after a brief struggle he resolved to remove further West. Nauvoo, in Illinois, was their chosen home. Here the Mormon community lived in prosperity for many years. They built themselves a magnificent temple, and laid out a fair city. Joe Smith was Mayor, and, in fact, irresponsible despot. He exercised a power which was inconsistent with the State authority, and carried out doctrines which were abhorrent to the Christians of his neighborhood. A feud sprung up between the Mormons and the people of the adjacent counties. It culminated in 1844, when both parties came to open warfare, and the chief of the Mormons, Joe Smith, was shot dead by an enraged mob, while in the jail of Carthage.

PARLEY'S CANON.

The sect continued for a brief period to inhabit their home at Nauvoo. But the animosity of the Mormon community left no means quenched, but rather gaining ground each successive month, the Mormons at last resolved, under the guidance of Brigham Young, Smith's successor, to seek a new home beyond the authority of the States. In the early part of 1846 the bulk of Nauvoo. Their first stopping-place was just without the western boundary of the United States, on the borders of the Missouri. Here they inclosed land, planted crops, and spent twelve months in no enviable condition.

In the spring of 1847 Brigham Young dispatched a party to discover a new home far from the Gentiles, and on the other side of the Rocky Mountains. In July of that year President Young, with the remainder of the sect, set foot in the Valley of Salt Lake. The site was singularly favorable. It was landlocked on all sides. In winter it was perfectly inaccessible, the cañons, or passes in the mountain ranges, being completely blocked with snow. Though the land was not very fertile, nor the climate as genial as might have been wished, the site was not unfavorable for agricultural operations or permanent settlement. It possessed the singular advantage of being one thousand miles distant—by a hard and dangerous route—from any civilized establishments.

DEVIL'S GATE (SOUTH PASS).

At a glance Brigham Young detected the advantages of the locality. He had a vision straightway, directing him to build a temple of the Latter-Day Saints to the Lord, in a favorable position on the border of the Wahsatch range; his people, with admirable faith, accepted the revelation, and fell to work at once.

That fall the ground adjacent to the temple was laid out and surveyed. Streets and squares were traced for a large city. Six thousand acres were fenced in, plowed, and sown. Still, during the winter of that year, the Mormons so narrowly escaped starvation that they were obliged to tear from the roofs of their huts the skins of wild beasts with which they had been covered, and to eat them. In the spring, Brigham Young brought reinforcements and supplies of cattle and provisions; and by dint of great exertions the little colony found itself, at the end of a few months, in a self-supporting condition. Grist and saw-mills had been erected; and considerable quantities of grain, melons, potatoes, and corn had been raised. Other settlements had been made at some little distance from the main city, with every prospect of prosperity. A Council House had been erected, and the temple was in a fair way of completion.

Finding himself at length undisputed sovereign of a fine territory, Brigham Young now resolved to inaugurate his political régime. He erected the settlement over which he presided, together with the adjacent territory, into an independent commonwealth, by the name of the State of Deseret. He applied to the Congress of the United States for admission to the Union on an equal footing with the other States. And at the same time he dispatched trusty emissaries to almost every populous country in the world, to enlist recruits for the cause of Mormonism. He was more successful in the latter than in the former design. He obtained immense accessions of numerical strength for his sect. Hundreds and thousands of dissatisfied persons of both sexes, in the United States and in almost every country of Europe, professed Mormonism, and sent delegations to Salt Lake City. The stream of emigration was incessant. Men, women, cattle, machinery, stores of every kind, flowed freely into Salt Lake City, and the settlement threve accordingly. To do Brigham Young justice, the government of the settlement was administered in such a manner as to develop its resources and increase its wealth.

But the State of Deseret was not admitted into the Union. Instead, the Mormon settlement was duly erected into a Territory, and a territorial government established. Collisions had already taken place between United States officers and the local authorities; to avoid the recurrence of such accidents, the President appointed the Mormon magistrates United States officers. Brigham Young was commissioned as United States Territorial Governor and Indian Agent. It was a timid avoidance of an ultimately unavoidable collision.

That collision has now come. The Mormons are resolutely determined not to submit to any authorities save those elected by themselves. They have rebelled against the magistrates set over them by the United States. They have expelled our judges, and destroyed the records of their courts. It is said that they have been accessory to the murder of United States citizens. Certain it is that neither life nor property are secure in the Territory which they inhabit, and that no redress for injuries perpetrated upon United States citizens can be obtained from the Mormon courts. It is equally certain that, at the present time, the followers of Brigham Young are in open rebellion against the United States, and that by this time they have either surrendered as prisoners of war, or a terrible conflict has ensued between them and the force of United States troops under the orders of General Johnston.

The Salt Lake City, represented in the picture given below, covers twelve square miles of ground, being four miles in length by three in breadth. The streets are all at right angles to each other; they are 122 feet wide, with sidewalks of 20 feet on each side. Each block is forty rods square, and is divided into eight lots of an acre and a quarter each. A city ordinance requires each house to be planted at a distance of twenty feet from the street, and the intervening space to be shaded with trees. These explanations will clear up a doubt which the picture below will at first suggest. At first sight it will seem to represent a city at least as large as New York, with a million or so of inhabitants; the size of the lots and the diffusion of the buildings will at once account for the extent of ground covered by the city.

Travelers who have crossed the plains describe the site and distribution of the city as singularly prepossessing. The traveler comes upon it after a long and weary march over arid plains almost destitute of vegetation, and wholly devoid of every pleasing object. On descending the slope of the Wahsatch range his eye suddenly embraces the valley in which the city rests. On the west flows the Jordan, which unites Great Salt and Utah lakes. On the south, for a distance of twenty-five miles, stretches an unbroken plain, intersected by several little streams. On the east and north the mountain-range slopes downward in a series of steps. One of these gives birth to a miniature torrent, which comes gushing out of the rock. Another is the source of a hot spring, which the Mormons have ingeniously turned to excellent account for the construction of warm baths.

The houses are mostly constructed of adobé, or burned bricks; and, with few exceptions, are, like the dwellings in Central America and Mexico, long, low, straggling edifices. They are well thatched, and generally comfortable. A few of the public buildings possess higher claims to architectural eminence, but lumber is so dear that they must remain few and far between. The most striking feature in Salt Lake City is the admirable system of internal water-works. It is a miniature Venice. A stream, which originally flowed through the site covered by the city, has been diverted into a number of channels running through each street. Every resident thus has a never-failing supply of good water at his own door, and is enabled to raise trees and flowers, which, in that climate, never could be grown without this artificial irrigation.

Such is the city which may by this time be in the possession of the United States troops. It is understood that, if there be any fighting, it will take place in the cañons and mountain-passes behind which the city nestles. The city itself is indefensible against an enemy who has crossed the mountains. A few days more will enable us to judge with more accuracy of the intentions of the Mormons.

GRACE BEFORE MEALS.

I.

SAY Grace: it is not time misspent:
Worst fool this betters, and the best,
Wanting this natural condiment,
Breeds crudeness, and will not digest.

II.

God loves no heart to others iced,
Nor sering flatteries, which bedim
Our glorious membership of Christ,
Wherein all loving His love Him.

III.

All blessings ask a blessed mood:
The sauce is here much more than meat:
Happy who chooses gratitude!
That wanting, God will try regret.

CITY, UTAH TERRITORY.

LOST ALICE.

CHAPTER THE FIRST.

How did I marry her? I often asked myself the question, in the days that succeeded our honeymoon. By rights, I should have married no one. Yet I loved her, as I love her still.

She was, perhaps, the strangest character of her age. In her girlhood, I could not comprehend her; and I often think, when I raise my eyes to her grave, quiet face, as she sits opposite me at dinner, that I do not comprehend her yet. There are many thoughts working in her brain of which I know nothing, and dishes of living death at her eyes now and then, and go back again, as cautious spies, to my glimpses of the outer world through their prison bars, and turn to their bricklwalled solitude once more. She is my wife. I have her and hold her as no other can. She bears my name, and sits at the head of my table; she rides beside me in my carriage, or on my arm as we walk; and yet I know and feel, all the time, that the darling of my past has fled from me for ever, and that it is only the ghost of the gay Alice, whom I won in all the bloom of her bright youth, that lingers now.

She was not a child when I married her, though she was very young. I mean, that all her faculties were developed, and she generally given only to the grey-haired, and had had burdens upon her which belong of right to the old. She had lost her own beloved child, and at the age of sixteen she was left to herself, and entirely dependent on my own resolutions. Friends and family she had none, so she was accustomed laughingly to say; but I have since found that her sisters were dearer, and as happy homes, even at this time when she accepted the world in lieu of herself and myself, as any of the great world to fulfill it. Of this part of her life she never spoke; but one who knew her then has told me much. It was a time of struggle and pain, as well it might have been. Fresh from the life of a large establishment, she was thrown headlong into the bustle of a great selfish city; and the trust came to my eyes as I think, with a kind of wonder, on the child who had met her many bitter difficulties at which strong men have quailed, and made herself a mark, a problem, and a puzzle. She was a writer—at first a dradge, for the weekly press, poorly paid, and unappreciated. By-and-by, brighter days dawned, and the world moved from the door. She was admired, read, sought after, and courted as well. Even then she could not use the wisdom she had purchased at so dear a rate. She held her heart in her hand, and it was wrung and broken every day.

"I may as well stop breathing as stop loving," she would say, with a hasty smile. "I can't help it, so me about my folly. Let me go on with my love; and, if they break in my hand, you can not help it, and I shall not come to you for sympathy."

She was not beautiful; but something—whether it was her bright, happy face, or the restless gayety of her manner—bewildered people, and spoke for her like her. She did the maddest things imaginable for her sake: and not only young men in whom folly was pardonable, but those who should have been too wise to be caught by the sparkle of her smile, or the ringing of her laugh, fell at her feet and irons them; her early life had taught her better; but I think she liked them for a while, till some nearer object came, and then she dismissed them, and was gone.

It was in this country that I met her first; and here she was more herself than in the city. We were distant relatives, though we had never seen each other, and the Fates sent me to spend the summer vacation with by mother's aunt, in a country village, where she was almost idolized. Had I known this, I should have kept my distance; for it was only a fourteenth or fifteenth cousinship that lay between us, and I am afraid of horror of her. I hardly knew why. I was a steady-going, quiet sort of lawyer, and used to have my short holiday of rest and quiet broken in upon by a fun lady. I said as much to my aunt, in return for her announcement of "Alice Kent is here:" with which she greeted me. She looked over her spectacles with quite wonder at me, and a slight stretch of the lady's city life, as I had had it from the lips of "Mrs. Grundy" herself.

"Wicked, and heathen, they may, or whoever would think it was one Alice you are talking of, Frank! However, I'm no more surprised at it. You'll have plenty of time to get acquainted with her, in the month you mean to pass here. And we are glad to see you, and your visit quite ready, tho one you need to like."

I took my cue, and strolled away to have a look at the fun. I walked slowly through the woods, with the intention of killing through the green leaves of the young beeches in pencilled sketches on my path. Something stirred as I pierced my way through the branches, and I looked for the gravel.

A girl was half-sitting, half-lying, in the sunshine beside the little lake, throwing pebbles into the water, and watching the ripples that spread and widened to the other shore. A great black Newfoundland dog was standing between me and her, showing a formidable row of strong white teeth, and looking me threateningly in the face.

She started, and looked sharply round, and saw me standing in the little grove with the dog between us. She burst out laughing.

I felt that I was getting rather a ridiculous figure, but I put a bold face upon the matter, and asked, coolly,

"Are you Alice Kent?"

"People call me so."

"Then I suppose I may call you cousin, for I am Frank Atherton ?"

"Cousin Frank!" We have been expecting you this week. When did you come?"

"Just now.

She made room for me beside her. We talked long, about our family, our mutual friends, and the old homestead of the Athertons. She was dressed plainly, very plainly, in a kind of gray material, that fell around her in light, soft folds. Her brown hair was soft and wavy, but she wore it carelessly pushed away from her forehead: not arranged with that nicety I should have expected in a city belle. Her features were irregular, full of life and spirit, but decidedly plain; her complexion fair, her mouth rather large, frank, and sensitive, her eyes more arched as if they were asking questions; and her eyes large, and of a soft dark gray, fringed with long lashes. Her figure, sitting too, as I found afterward to my cost. Those eyes were the most changeful, the most expressive I ever saw.

I thought I had known her only five minutes, if so long, when she took up the dog's head in a serious glance she had fixed on me. She had ceased to talk, and was sitting, with her head aloft, and a lovely color mantling on her cheek, studying my face intently, when our eyes met. There was an earnest look in hers that I did not like. The color deepen and go up to her forehead, and a sharper ear to me than heard it might have congrons for me to watch that blush, but I did; and I longed to know its cause, and wondered what thought had set it there.

"Fred, bring me my hat," she said to her dog, affecting to speak to me. "It is time for me to go home to supper, I suppose. Are you hungry, Cousin Frank?"

"Yes—no," I answered, with my thoughts still running on that blush.

She laughed constantly, and took me from the Newfoundland, who had brought it in his mouth.

"I love food you are of that great dog!" I said, as we rose from our seat beside him.

"Fond of him! I should think so," she cried, with a sudden impetuous movement, took his head between her two hands, and kissed the benevolent face. "Fond of him, Cousin Frank! Why, the dog is my idol! He is the only thing on earth who is not afraid to be natural for fear of being laughed at. She stopped short, and colored.

"That you have been true to," I said, finishing the sentence for her.

"So people say," she answered, with a laugh. "But look at the sun, and the evening red, and tell me if my one could help loving him. My poor old Fred! So honest in this weary world!"

She sighed, and patted his head again, and he stood wagging his tail, and looking first at her, with eyes that were, as she had said, beautiful, and what was better far, leinsful of love and honesty.

"I should if you had a master to love," she said, after we had walked a few steps; "and Fred is keeping me in mind of it. I have him on through the woods. Would you mind?"

"Oh dear, no!"

The next moment she was off like the wind, and the dog tearing after her, barking till the woods rang again. I knew her that night no more.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

I WAS, as I have already said, a grave, steady-going lawyer, verging toward a respectable middle age, and with a decided taste for wearing many dry black books. I had had my dreams and fancies, and my share of disappointments, like most other men; and they had passed away. But one thing I had not known, one thing I had missed in my life, and that was the love of a woman's love.

So, as a matter of course, I fell into danger now. When Alice Kent went singing and dancing through the house, leaving every dust and window open as she went, I used often to look down my pen and look after her, and feel as if the sun shone brighter for her light step.

We grew to be great friends—like brother and sister, I used to say to myself. How that liking grew into something softer and I could not have told. I met her one day in the village street. I had been absent a week, and she had been ill. She was walking slowly along, with her dog beside her, and her eyes fixed upon the ground, looking so pale and sad that a thankful thrill of fear seen her before. At sight of me her whole face brightened suddenly; she gave me her hand with a slight nod and a smile, and took her way toward home. Seeing that fact of my being there, I turned back, and feeling the sudden bound with which my heart sprang up to meet it, I knew that I loved her better than all.

It was late when I reached home, after a musing walk. The farmer and his wife had gone to bed, the children were at a merry-making at the next house, and a solitary light burned from the parlor window, which stood open. The full moon shone fairly in a sky without a cloud. I sauntered the gate and went in; and there, in the open door sat Alice, with a light shawl thrown over her shoulders, her head resting on the shaggy coat of the Newfoundland dog. She gazed from me as I approached me as I came up the path, but he did not stir.

I sat down near her; but on the lower step, so that I could look up in her face.

"Alice, you do not speak. The full moon shone on you."

"But I am. Quite well. I am going away directly."

"Going away! Where?"

"Home. To London. Well! What ails you, Cousin Frank? Did you never hear of my uncle who went to London before?"

"Yes, but—but—you will not go?"

"Why?" She opened her eyes and looked at me. "For many reasons. Firstly, I only came for a fortnight, and I have stayed nearly three months; secondly, because I have business which can be put off no longer; and, thirdly, because my friends are wondering what on earth keeps me here so long (they will say soon it is you, Frank). They vow they can not do without me any longer, and it is pleasant to be missed, you know."

"And so you are going back to the old life, Alice? And, by-and-by, I suppose you will marry?"

I would not advise any man, be he old or young, in case he does not think it wise or prudent to marry the woman he loves, to linger with her in the door-way of a silent farm-house, and hold her hand, and look out upon a moonlight night. The touch of the small slight fingers was playing the mischief with my good resolutions, and my wisdom (if I had any).

"Alice," I said, softly; and I almost started, as she did, at the sound of my own voice, it was so changed. "Alice, we have been very happy here."

"Very."

I took both her hands, and held them close in mine. But she would not look at me, though her face was turned that way.

"There is a great difference between us, dear Alice. I am much older than you, and much graver. I have never loved any woman but you in my life. I may have even charmed a woman's heart, and had a thousand fancies. If you have what the world thinks you, and what you try to make yourself think you, I should say we pretty well thin—I love you. But I know you have a heart. I love you, Alice, if you will not cast me from you if you will. And so I beseech you to talk to me honestly, and tell me if you can love me, or if you do. I am not used to asking such questions of ladies, Alice, and I may seem rough and rude; but believe me what I say. You have won my whole heart, and I can not be happy without you."

"Yes, I believe you," she said.

"But do you love me, and do you love me?"

She might trifle with a trifler, but she was earnest enough with me.

"I trust you, and I love you," she answered, frankly. "Are you wondering why I can state my feelings so calmly? Because I can. I do not think I shall ever marry you. You do not know me as I know myself and myself as I could love me. I am wayward and exacting, and I should weary your life out by my constant craving for fresh love. I was made to be petted, Frank; and you, though a loving, are not an affectionate man. You would look on me as the bottom of the Red Sea before we had been married a month; and because you could not get me there, you would get tired and break my heart, in very of amusement. I know it as well as if I had seen it all—I never will."

She looked at me, and all her woman's heart and nature were in her eyes. They spoke love and passion, and the long tenderness and all for me. Something leaped into life in my heart at that moment, and I felt that I could sacrifice something that made my affection of the last few hours seem cold and dead inside its fervent glow. I had her now within the instance—close—close to my heart.

"Alice!" A new man loved woman with heart and soul—nudly and unreasonably, if you will but still truly and honestly—I love you, my dar ling."

"But will it last? Oh, Frank! will it last?" I bent down, and my lips met in a long, fond kiss.

"I'm will be my wife, Alice?"

She leaned her pretty head against my arm, and her hand stole into mine again.

"Do you love me?" was her answer. Am I to keep the hand, dear Alice, and call it mine?"

"If you will, Francis."

It was the first time she had ever given me that name. But she never called me by any other afterward. I was to love me; and it sounded sweetly in my memory now, and it will sound sweetly to my dying day.

CHAPTER THE THIRD.

We were married not long after, and for six months we dwelt in a "Fool's Paradise." When I think that but for me it might have lasted for a week, and not years, I fall that he was near me. And I am glad to wear my master's chains, though I have broken them.

And I am sure she was in earnest. I pleased her best when I loved her most; and when I could see no angles in a passionate, high-bred creature. She rebelled a thousand times a day, although she had promised to obey. But it was pretty to see her, when she turned to leave the room, with fire in her eyes, and her head erect, and her step free, pretty to see her with her hand upon the lock even, drop her proud head submissively, and wait when I said, "Alice, my love, my dear, and she turned. Yet it was dangerous. I, who had never been jealous in my life, could I do but tremble and grow pale when a creature so noble as this least down before me!

She loved me. Every cord of her most sensitive heart thrilled and trembled to my touch, and gave forth sweet music; and I was not satisfied. I tried the minor key. Through her deep affection for me I wounded her cruelly. I can see it now. Some vein of my own nature, that I had not known, whispered that I was making a child of my wife by my indulgence, and that by-and-by she would never develop its strength in so much sunshine. I acted upon that thought, forgetting how she had already been tried in the fiery furnace of affliction; and quite unconscious that while she was getting back all the innocent gayety of her childish years, the deep lessons of her womanhood were still lying beneath the sparkling surface of her playful ways.

If for a time she had charmed me out of my gravity, I resolved to be charmed no more. I devoted myself again to my business, heart and soul, and not poring for hours over law-papers without speaking to her. Yet she did not complain. So long as she was certain that I loved her, she was content, and took up her pen again, and went on with the work our marriage had interrupted. Her writing-desk was in my study, by a window just opposite mine; and sometimes I would cease to hear the rapid movement of her pen, and, looking up, I would find her eyes fixed upon my face, with a happy smile was playing around her lips. One day I found she had found me in a most unreasonable mood. The sense of her love half pained me, and I said, curtly,

"I do not taste, Alice, to look at any one in that way."

She dropped her pen, only too glad of an excuse to talk to me, and came and leaned over my chair.

"And why? when I love none me."

"Because it had forgotten the lesson. I wanted to teach her, and I turned over my papers in silence.

"Do I annoy you, Francis?"

"Not much."

If that light head was playing with my hair, and her breath was warm on my cheek. I felt my self-possession going, and tried to make up for its loss by an increased coldness of manner.

"One kiss," she said. "Just one, and I'll go away."

"What nonsense, Alice! What time have I to think of kisses now?"

She stood up, and looked me in the face.

"Do I tease you, Francis?"

"Very much."

She gave a little sigh—so faint that I could scarcely hear it—and left the room. I had erased her gayety away for that morning.

This was the first cloud in our sky.

The next morning now rose I look back upon it after the lapse of years, how perseveringly I labored to destroy the happiness of my own happiness on which I might have built my life.

In the midst of our estrangement the dog sickened. Alice watched and nursed him night and day. I was sitting at my writing-desk, looking over some papers, when I heard a low moan, and looked up. She was kneeling on the floor, with her head upon the dog's breast, and her face hidden in his shaggy coat. I rose and went to her side.

"Alice, Alice, what is the matter?"

She did not look up, but she answered me.

"Fred is dying. He is dying, and he has been my friend in the world."

I knelt down beside her, and took her hand in mine. But she would not look at me, though her face was turned toward me.

"Alice, Alice, look up to me. Alice, I am your friend, your husband, your lover, your all. Alice, look up to me."

She did not look up, but she answered me.

"Fred is dying, and he has been my friend in the world."

I thought I had known her only five minutes, if so long, when she took up the dog's head in a serious glance she had fixed on me. She had ceased to talk, and was sitting, with her head aloft, and a lovely color mantling on her cheek, studying my face intently, when our eyes met. There was an earnest look in hers that I did not like. The color deepen and go up to her forehead, and a sharper ear to me than heard it might have congrons for me to watch that blush, but I did; and I longed to know its cause, and wondered what thought had set it there.

"Fred, bring me my hat," she said to her dog, affecting to speak to me. "It is time for me to home to supper, I suppose. Are you hungry, Cousin Frank?"

"Yes—no," I answered, with my thoughts still running on that blush.

She laughed constantly, and took me from the Newfoundland, who had brought it in his mouth.

"I love food you are of that great dog!" I said, as we rose from our seat beside him.

"Fond of him! I should think so," she cried, with a sudden impetuous movement, took his head between her two hands, and kissed the benevolent face. "Fond of him, Cousin Frank! Why, the dog is my idol! He is the only thing on earth who is not afraid to be natural for fear of being laughed at. She stopped short, and colored.

"That you have been true to," I said, finishing the sentence for her.

"So people say," she answered, with a laugh. "But look at the sun, and the evening red, and tell me if my one could help loving him. My poor old Fred! So honest in this weary world!"

She sighed, and patted his head again, and he stood wagging his tail, and looking first at her, with eyes that were, as she had said, beautiful, and what was better far, leinsful of love and honesty.

"I should if you had a master to love," she said, after we had walked a few steps; "and Fred is keeping me in mind of it. I have him on through the woods. Would you mind?"

"Oh dear, no!"

The next moment she was off like the wind, and the dog tearing after her, barking till the woods rang again. I saw her that night no more.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

I WAS, as I have already said, a grave, steady-going lawyer, verging toward a respectable middle age, and with a decided taste for wearing many dry black books. I had had my dreams and fancies, and my share of disappointments, like most other men; and they had passed away. But one thing I had not known, one thing I had missed in my life, and that was the love of a woman's love.

So, as a matter of course, I fell into danger now. When Alice Kent went singing and dancing through the house, leaving every door and window open as she went, I used often to look down my pen and look after her, and feel as if the sun shone brighter for her light step.

We grew to be great friends—like brother and sister, I used to say to myself. How that liking grew into something softer and I could not have told. I met her one day in the village street. I had been absent a week, and she had been ill. She was walking slowly along, with her dog beside her, and her eyes fixed upon the ground, looking so pale and sad that a thankful thrill of fear seen her before. At sight of me her whole face brightened suddenly; she gave me her hand with a slight nod and a smile, and took her way toward home. Seeing that fact of my being there, I turned back, and feeling the sudden bound with which my heart sprang up to meet it, I knew that I loved her better than all.

It was late when I reached home, after a musing walk. The farmer and his wife had gone to bed, the children were at a merry-making at the next house, and a solitary light burned from the parlor window, which stood open. The full moon shone fairly in a sky without a cloud. I sauntered the gate and went in; and there, in the open door sat Alice, with a light shawl thrown over her shoulders, her head resting on the shaggy coat of the Newfoundland dog. She gazed from me as I approached me as I came up the path, but he did not stir.

I sat down near her; but on the lower step, so that I could look up in her face.

"Alice, you do not speak. The full moon shone on you."

"But I am. Quite well. I am going away directly."

"Going away! Where?"

"Home. To London. Well! What ails you, Cousin Frank? Did you never hear of my uncle who went to London before?"

"Yes, but—but—you will not go?"

"Why?" She opened her eyes and looked at me. "For many reasons. Firstly, I only came for a fortnight, and I have stayed nearly three months; secondly, because I have business which can be put off no longer; and, thirdly, because my friends are wondering what on earth keeps me here so long (they will say soon it is you, Frank). They vow they can not do without me any longer, and it is pleasant to be missed, you know."

"And so you are going back to the old life, Alice? And, by-and-by, I suppose you will marry?"

"And so you are going back to the old life, Alice? And, by-and-by, I suppose you will marry?"

"Yes."

I took both her hands, and held them close in mine. But she would not look at me, though her face was turned that way.

"There is a great difference between us, dear Alice. I am much older than you, and much graver. I have never loved any woman but you in my life. I may have even charmed a woman's heart, and had a thousand fancies. If you have what the world thinks you, and what you try to make yourself think you, I should say we pretty well thin—I love you. She did not look up, but she answered me.

"Fred is dying, and he has been my friend in the world."

"Then ask me for it."

"I said nothing, but took up my pen again. Her countenance fell a little.

"Would you like it?" she said, timidly.

"There was a saint in old times," I said, quietly, going on with my papers, "a namesake of mine, by-the-way—St. Francis of Sales—who was accustomed to say that one should never ask or refuse any thing."

"Well! But I'm not talking to Saint Francis! I am talking to you. Will you have my little gift? Say yes—just to please me—just to make my happy day still happier."

"Don't be a child, Alice."

"It is childish, I know; but indulge me this once. It is such a little thing, and it will make me very happy."

"I shall not refuse whatever you choose to give me. Only don't delay me long, for I want to go on with these papers."

The next moment she threw the toy (a pretty little bronze statuette, much like a Cupid, with his quiver full of pins) at my feet, and walked away, grieved and angry. I stooped to pick up the figure: it was broken in two.

"Oh, you can condescend to lift it from the ground!" she said, sarcastically.

"Upon my word, Alice, you are the most unreasonable of beings. However, the little god of love can be easily mended."

"Yes."

She placed the fragment one upon the other, and looked at me.

"It can be mended, but the accident must leave its trace, like all others. Oh! Francis," continued she, throwing herself down by my chair, and lifting my hand to her lips, "why do you try me so? Do you really love me?"

"Alice," I said, impatiently, "do get up. You tire me."

She rose and turned very pale.

"I will, sir," she said. But first answer my question. Do you love me, Francis?"

I felt anger and obstinacy in my heart—nothing else. Was she threatening me?

"Did you love me when you married me, Francis?"

"I did. But—"

"But you do not love me now?"

"Since you will have it," I said.

"Go on!"

"I do not love you—not as you mean."

There was a dead silence in the room as the lying words left my lips, and she grew so white, and gave me such a look through the window I can never meet it with her sorrow, that to this day I can never see the golden autumn roses and the green myrtle without the same sharp, knife-like pang that I felt then, as the door closed behind her.

CHAPTER THE FOURTH.

ALICE became weaker and grew really ill. A tour on the Continent was strongly recommended by the doctors as the likeliest means of restoration. It was impossible for me to go; but some friends of ours—the Mr. and Mrs. Wrenmore, with a young daughter, were going to Italy for six months, and it was arranged that Alice should accompany them.

They remained abroad nine months, instead of six.

At last she returned. I came home tired enough, one evening, to find a letter lying on my table, informing me that she would cross to Dover on the morrow. I went down to Dover to meet her. Our estrangement had worn deep into my heart. She had loved me once; she should love me still.

I was worn, haggard. I took a bath and made a careful toilet before my hurried journey, and in taking my last look in the glass, the hotel-waiter came to tell me the boat arrived.

I followed him, more nervous than I had ever been before in my life. Warmer grasped my hands as I opened the door, and Mrs. Warrener—blesss her kind heart!—burst out crying.

"Oh! my dear Frank, I was so glad to see you. And how well you look! Alice looks very, very well!"

Next moment she entered, a little King Charles's spaniel frisking about her feet. I had her in my arms at once, but it was not until she kissed me that I knew how cold and pale she was.

"Alice, are you ill?" I asked, holding her away from me, and looking into her face.

Her eyes met mine, but their old light was quite gone.

"Not in the least ill, Frank," she said, quietly. "But you must remember I have not seen you for nine months, and you startled me a little."

My household fairy had fled, and I could only mourn that I should never look upon her sweet, young face again. It was another Alice this. I had slain my own Alice, and nothing could resuscitate her.

I was like one in a dream all through the day. One morning, as I sat at my solitary breakfast—for Alice took that meal in her room now—the bitter sense of wrong and unhappiness and desertion came over me so strongly that I went up to her room.

"Are you busy?" I asked, as she laid down her pen and looked around.

"Not too busy to talk to you," she said.

"Alice, how long are we to live this life?"

She changed color.

"What life, Frank?"

"The one we are living now. It is not the happy, loving life we used to live. You are not mine as entirely and lovingly as you once were."

"I know it." And she sighed and looked drearily at me.

"Why can not the old days come back again? If I made a terrible mistake, can you never forgive it? I shall think I was foolish for us to love each other as we did—at least, to show it as we did—but I have found now that love is earth's only true wisdom."

She smiled, sadly.

"Give me back that love, Alice, which I would not have. Oh! give me back the love that satisfied!"

I rose from my seat and stood beside her; but I drew back and dropped my head.

"Frank, don't ask me for that."

"I shall force you to value it more, Alice."

"That may be; but I have it not to give you, my poor Frank."

I clasped her to my heart. The passion in that heart might almost have brought back life to the dead; but, with this all not move. She was like a statue in my arms, and I looked at me and gasped.

"Too late! Too late, Frank!"

"Will you never forgive me?"

"Why do you say that? I have one unkind thought or feeling toward you, Frank? Ah, no! But I can chilled through and through. My love is dead and buried. Stand over that dear grave, and let us meet the world as we best may."

I loosened my hold upon my hands, and my tears fell, and I was not ashamed of them. But they seemed to rouse her into a kind of frenzy.

"You do love me, Frank!" she cried. "Yes, who a year ago moved the seed which has borne this fruit, can no more say that unkindness now? Don't, Frank! Take what I can give you—love, my earnest friendship—and God grant we may never part, here or in heaven."

"Ah! in heaven—if we ever get there—you will love me again."

She quoted those sad words which poor St. Pierre uttered on his dying bed:

"Que Seul un sans loute Seul un sans loute dans le ciel même?"

(What could I want in heaven if even in heaven itself and laid her hand gently on mine.

"Heaven knows, dear Alice, that as I loved you when we married, I loved you on that unhappy day, and love you still!"

I am glad to hear it," she said, hurriedly. "Heaven only knows what we may see and sigh to have mine at first. For my life had been wrapped up in yours, Frank, and it was terrible to contemplate them. I thought at first that I could not live; I suppose every one thinks so when a heavy blow falls. But strength was given me, and I learned to pause. We soon like two gray shadows, Frank, in the world, and we must not nearly say Lucily time; and hope that, on the other side of the grave, at least, this great mistake may be set right. Believe me, Frank, I am happier now than I was then—happy in thinking that the same roof shelters us, though we are still part and parcel of the world."

I opened my arms, and, of her own accord, she came to my heart once more; her arms were around my neck, and I knew that she was weeping. It was a bitter meeting mine. Not as they used to be, yet tenderer than before.

"We are older and wiser than we were, and sadder, too, dear Frank," she said, with a smile. "Yet who knows? It may be that all this grief has but left us yet."

I felt that that chapter of our life ended.

We have never touched upon the subject since; but I have watched closely for years, and the same quiet light shines always in the gray eyes, the same deep, sad tones thrill my heart when I hear her voice, the same great work; and she grows nothing be gentler or kinder than she who was once so impetuous and full of fire. She was surrounded and exciting and ardent and impassioned in those days, I know, and my slower nature was always on the defensive; but gentleness is not, what a bright, joyous, happy creature she was!

Our lives have been different but for me. Oh you, who read this little history, believe me, that a kind word and a loving look cost little, although they do great work; and that there can be no wrong so deep as wrong done to a loving heart.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER IX.

SAID a very homely proverb (pardon its vulgarity): "You can not make a silk purse out of a sow's ear." But a sow's ear is a small figure to work of ten than a silk purse. And grand, indeed, the fairy who could make a sow's ear out of a silk purse, or conjure into creatures of flesh and blood the ancestral relic of a London sheep-dog.

"MAMMA," asked Honoria Carr Vipont, "what sort of a person was Mrs. Darrell?"

She was not in our set, my dear," answered Lady Selina. "The Vipont Crookes are just one of those connections in which, though, of course, one is civil to all connections, one is more or less intimate, according as they take after the Vipont or after the Crookes. Mrs. Darrell was a Miss Crookes, and, I believe, a very pretty woman; she died just before Mr. Darrell entered Parliament, and appeared in society. But I should say she was not an agreeable person. Not nice," added Lady Selina, after a pause, and conveying a shrewd meaning in that conventional monosyllable.

"I suppose she was very accomplished—very clever?"

"Quite the reverse, my dear. Mr. Darrell was exceedingly young when he married—scarcely of age. She was not the sort of woman to suit him."

"But at least she must have been very much attached to him—very proud of him?"

Lady Selina glanced aside from her work, and observed her daughter's face, which evinced an animation not usual to a young lady of a breeding so lofty, and a mind so well disciplined.

"I don't think," said Lady Selina, "that she was proud of him. She would have been proud of his station, or rather of that to which his fame and fortune would have raised her, had she lived to enjoy it. But for a few years after her marriage they were very poor; and though his rise at the bar was sudden and brilliant, he was long wholly absorbed in his profession, and lived in Bloomsbury. Mrs. Darrell was not proud of Mr. Darrell. She and her husband live—give themselves airs—marry into great houses if they can—but you may be familiar like those you always remain Crookes—useful connections, very! Can you see how not a more useful—but third-rate, my dear, the Vipont Crookes are like the Jews, because they are never satisfied with any thing, and are always trying to get into other people's houses. Not very long before she died, Mrs. Darrell took her friend and relation, Mrs. Lyndsay, to stay with her. Lyndsay's post was from affection, or my great consideration for Mrs. Lyndsay's remonstrances (which were indeed those of actual destitution, till—thanks to Mr. Darrell—she won her lawsuit), but simply because she was her lawsuit, but simply because she was her own property, and could be given or taken into our set. Mrs. Lyndsay was a great favorite with all of us—very pretty, very unaffectedly correct, too—thorough Vipont—thorough gentlewoman—but still! Oh, so artful! She borrowed poor Mrs. Darrell's husband's purse! but she took care not to injure herself. Of course, Darrell's wife was a Vipont—through and by Vipont Crooke—had free passport into the outskirts of good society, the great parties, and so forth. But these things crept; even Darrell had been compromised if I had admitted into our set a woman who was thought objectionable by myself. Handsome—in a bad style—not the Vipont features—but not only silly and flirting, but—(we are alone, keep the secret)—decidedly not by virtue, my dear!"

"You amaze me! How such a man—" Honoria stopped, coloring up to the temples.

"Never mind, my child," Lady Selina, "as a general rule, do choose the oddest sort of husbands ever a man is, the more easily. I do believe, a woman can take her self-reverence, to do Mr. Darrell justice, he has been taken in only once. Mrs. Lyndsay was obliged to retire to a cottage at Fulham. But as she professed to be a second mother to poor Darrell, she contrived to remain on to very much at Curzon Gardens; her daughter Caroline was a great deal at Eldon Lodge, calling on Matilda's masters; and I did think that Mrs. Lyndsay would have caught Darrell—but your papa was not to be had, I can see that very plainly. Nevertheless, Mrs. Lyndsay would have been a very useful friend to my public nuisance—always knew the world so well—never made enemies—and she made an enemy of poor dear Montfort; but that was not her fault. By-the-by I must write to Caroline. Sweet creature! but how absurd, putting herself up for the county against Lord Montfort! That's no life for mother—fearful—fearful! Out of propriety."

Here Carr Vipont colonel Morley entered the room. "We have just left Darrell," said Lady Selina, as she drew her cheek to her accustomed Allun. I have asked his cousin, young Hoxton, and * * * and * * * and * * * your cousins, Morley—a small party of consin—very lucky to find Darrell disengaged."

"I suppose so," said the Colonel, addressing Honoria in an undue voice, "that Darrell has been quite plain Beethoven."

HONORIA. "Is Mr. Darrell so fond of music, then?"

COLONEL MORLEY. "One would not have thought it. He keeps a secretary at Fawley who plays the flute. There's something very interesting about Darrell. I wish you could hear his ideas on marriage and domestic life—more Spartan-like at least than in the days when he was more wondrous. It may be prejudice; but it seems to me that the young fellows of the present race, if more sober and staid than we were, are sadly wanting in character and spirit—no fault of theirs, their very own. But I don't like to talk thus to a democratic who has all those young fellows on his side."

"Oh," said Lady Selina, overhearing, and with a half-laugh, "Honoria thinks much as you do, Morley, and the men are always finding out one another—the same set phrases."

"Not the stereotyped ideas," added Honoria, moving away with a gesture of calm disdain.

"A very superior mind here," whispered the Colonel to Lady Selina. "She'll never make such a fool."

Guy Darrell was very pleasant at "the small family dinner-party." Carr was always popular in his manners—the true old House of Commoners manner—and very few like that of a gentlemanlike public school. Lady Selina, as has been said before, in her own family circle was natural and genial. Young Carr, there, without his wife, more pretentious than his father—hanging out of the Admiralty—with a certain awe of Darrell, and spoke little, which was much to his own credit, and to the general conviviality. The other members of the symposium, besides Lady Selina, Honoria, and a younger sister, were but Darrell, Lionel, and Lady Selina's two cousins; elderly peers—one with the garter, the other in the colonet—a jovial men, who had been well fellows once in the same mess-room, and still joked at each other whenever they met as they met now. Lionel, who remembered Vance's description of Lady Selina, and who had since heard her spoken of in society as a female dragon to be courted in preference the arts by which despots flourish, with Asmargnolle to impose, and caresses to deceive—as Asmargnolle in petticoats—was sadly at a loss to reconcile such portraiture with the good-humored, motherly woman who talked to him of her home, her husband, her children, with open confidence and becoming pride, and who, far from being so formidably clever as the world generally gave out, seemed to Lionel rather below par in the understanding; rather, from her very kindliness, and the wonder was very like tenderness. After dinner, various members of the Vipont family and others trickle in—Honoria to Carr or to Lady Selina, in hasty three-cornered notes, to take them to music-meetings—making acquaintance with their distinguished connection. Lionel, left alone, among those invited there were but few young men, was joined by Honoria herself, who, as the only child and the eldest daughter, was unquestionably the belle of the room. It could not but be observed that Darrell seemed more at his ease with Lionel than more than with any other lady—and when she went to the piano, and played that great air of Beethoven's in which music seems to have got into a knot that only fingers the most artful can unravel, Darrell remained at the sofa, seated alone, listening, no doubt, with ravished attention, but not as the sole one, and Honoria turned round to look if he had left it.

Lionel did not linger long after him. The next young man who left the room was the one next crowds which soon convened for a presentation of Mr. Bentham's famous proposition—carrying the national happiness to the greatest number.

It was a very great home, belonging to a very great person. Colonel Morley had proffered at Bentham the hand, and said, "Go; you should be seen there." Colonel Morley had passed the age of growing into society—as such cares for the mature—and had a right to be present as statues. One among a group of other young men by the door-way, Lionel beheld Darrell, who had arrived before him, surrounded by a very handsome young lady, with an attention quite the earnest—as that which the gentleman's superior mind of the well-educated Honoria. A very handsome young lady, indeed, and one with a superior mind, nor supposed hitherto to have found young gentlemen "insipid." Doubtless she would have been glad to see Lionel there, after, Darrell was listening again—this time to a very handsome lady, young and full of fun. If his attentions to her were not marked, hers to him were. She rattled on to him volubly, laughed, looked archly, put her head on one side, and seemed at last so to fascinate him by her gay spirits that she was forced to lay her hand on playful smile on his lips—lips that had learned but to say gravely few—showed that he could enter still more into the spirit of the joke.

Lionel, left by the time-worn man the few young lady must have seemed but a giddy girl, looked and was amused. Could that be the austere recluse whom he had left in the shades of Fawley? Guy Darrell, at his ease, with the dignified repute, the object of so many nods, and looks, and whispered salutations—Guy Darrell, in all that most frivolous of characters, a male coquette! Guy Darrell, in earnest—was his vanity duped? Looking again, Lionel saw that the young man's face a sudden return of the sad despondency of expression which had warned him of sympathy in the solitudes of Fawley. But in a moment that expression passed away, and expression was gone. Had the girl's merry, mocking genius cleared it away? But Lionel's attention was withdrawn from Darrell to the door as fresh arrivations announced round him, of which Dr. Nicholas was one.

"Yes, he is bent on marrying again! I have it from Alton Morley—immense fortune—and so young, so pretty, my girl should be the first with such eyes and freckled; besides what a connection—the Duke of Ayr's niece. Poor little girl, Flora Vyvyan, trying to make a fool of him. She can't appreciate that kind of man, and no wonder. Ah! you here, Lord Hoxton—does not want it. * * * I wonder she is not here to-night. He is certainly making her * * * The men think her pretty—I don't. * * * They say he is to return to Parliament, and have a place. Ah! Darrell, how are * * * No! he has no children living—very natural he should marry again. * * * Alice! poor Alice! you are quite mistaken. Young Haughton is no nephew to any distant connection—could not expect to be the first with * * * Ah! Haughton, indeed, at Paris. The Duchess thought so, and so did Lady Jane. They'll be glad to get a young Haughton now. * * * Hush!—"

Lionel, looking to her eyes, glided by, and penetrated farther into the throng. And then, as he proceeded, with those last words on his ear, the consciousness stole upon him that his position had undergone a change. Difficult to define it; to an ordinary by-stander, people would have seemed to welcome him cordially as ever. The gradations of respect in polite society are not always easily detected. He seems only by a sort of magnetism that one knows from one day to another how far backs or smiles are gracious, their hands as flutteringly extended. But that man would be dull as a chiroscores if he did not feel as every one who attests him feels—that he has descended in the ladder. So with all else. Love even your fortune, it is not the next day in a London drawing-room that your friends look as if you were going to ask them for five pounds. Wait a year or so for that. But if they have just heard you are ruined, you will feel that they have heard it, let them bow ever so courteously, smile ever so kindly. Lionel at Paris, in the last year or so, had been more than fashionable; he had been the fashion—courted, run after, petted, spoiled, imitated. That evening he felt as an author may feel who has been the rage, and, suddenly, is left much alone to sit and muse. The men that had gilt him had gone back to the ore that lined. And they who were most genial with the Lionel Darrell who were those who still most respected thirty-five thousand pounds a year—to Guy Darrell's heir.

Lionel was angry with himself that he felt galled. But in his wounded pride he could not help remembering—only that sort of sickness which comes to youth when the hollowness of worldly life is first made clear to it. From the forces found him there fell that glamour by which the ennui proper is held captive in large assemblies, where the ennui proper is flattered, "Magnificent, intelligent audience," thinks the applauded orator. "Delightful!" sighs the woman the worshiped beauty. Glamour! glamour! Let the audience yawn while the orator prates, and the party neglect the beauty to adore another, and straightway the "magnificent audience" is an "ignorant crowd," and "the delightful party" a "heartless world."

CHAPTER X.

Escaped from a London Drawing-Room, fresh over Channel, Lionel found—Guy Darrell in his favorite chair. Daughters shy or he holds it a duty to be—an old friend.

LIONEL Darrell glided down the stairs of the enchanted rooms, and breathed a long breath of relief when he found himself in the friendless streets.

As he walked slow and thoughtful on, he suddenly felt a hand upon his shoulder, and, saw Darrell.

"Give me your arm, my dear Lionel; I am tired out. What a lovely night! What sweet scorn in the eyes of those stars that we have neglected for our flaring lights!"

Lionel. "Is it scorn—is it pity? Is it but serene indifference?"

Darrell. "As we ourselves interpret; it seems to present in our own hearts, it will be seen in the star of Jupiter. Our thoughts should be, exacts sympathy from all the universe. Joyous, he says to the sun, 'Let us rejoice together.' Envious, he says to the moon, 'Perish with me.' Unsocial, he says to the star, 'Preserve one, thou shrunk my sorrow.' Hope for Rome; a star is its promise. Mourn for the dead; a star is the land of reunion! Say to Darrell, 'I have done with love!' and the star hath naught to bestow; and all Space cries aloud, 'The earth is a speck, thine inheritance infinite.' Time seems while thou sighest, Eternity becomes of a moment is the instinct that proves thee immortal." Darrell paused, and, changing his companion, our consoler. Benign as the playmate, she lends herself to our shifting humors. Serious as the teacher, she responds to the slumber inquiries of evasion. Mystic and hallowed as the priestess, she interprets to us the oracles that spiritual yearning within us, in which, from savage to sage—through all dreams, through all creeds—like the verse of a book with Divinity. Never, therefore, while conversing with Darrell, is Man without a friend, or the single companion with uniform shape. Ever new, ever various, she can point every guy to scorn—from the sneer so serious—quick as thought—tosses from the dance of a leaf, from the tic of a rainbow, to the theory of motion and the laws of light. But lose Nature—forget or dismiss her—make companions, by hundreds, of men who ignore her, and I will not say with the poet, "This is solitude. But is the commune, what stale nonsense, what weary commonplace!"

Thus Darrell continued to weave together sentence with sentence, the interconnected attention of minutes into hours, unable, that when put down on paper it requires effort to discern it. But it was his peculiar gift to make what he said spoken, what in writing would seem obscure. Look, manner, each delicate accent of voice wonderfully distinct in its unrivaled melody, all to aided the sense of mere words, that it is scarcely an exaggeration to say that he could read an unknown language, and a listener would have understood. But, understood or not, there was the intonation it was deadly delight to hear, that any one with nerves alive to music would have murmured, "Talk on forever." And, in fact, to any one main secret of the man's strange influence over all who came familiarly into his presence was to shut if Darrell had ever bestowed confidential intimacy on any one not by some antagonistic idiosyncrasy placed against the claim, that that intimacy had been withdrawn, a void never to be refilled must have been left in the life thus robbed.

Stopping at his door, as Lionel, rapt in the music, had forgotten the pain of the reverse so bewitchingly broken, Darrell detained the hand held out to him, and said, "No, not yet; I have something to say to you; come in; let me say it now."

Lionel bowed his head, and in surprised conjecture followed his kinsman up the lofty stairs into the same comfortless study-room to which he soon already described. When the servant closed the door, Darrell motioned to a chair. Fixing his eyes upon Lionel with more than customary keenness, and motioning his young cousin to sit by his side, elum, he thus began:

"Lionel, before I was your age I was married —I was a father. I am so both now and childless now. My life has been moulded by a solemn obligation which so few could comprehend, that I scarce know a man living beside yourself to whom I would frankly confide it. Pride of family is a common infirmity—often getsalum with the poor, often insolent with the rich; but rarely, perhaps, out of that pride do men construct a positive binding duty, which at all self-sacrifice should influence the practical choice of life. As a child, before my judgment could discern how much of vain superstition may lurk in our reverence for the dead, my whole heart was engaged in a passionate dream, which my waking existence became vowed to realize. My father! —my lip quivers, my eyes moisten as I recall him, even now—my father!—I loved him so intensely!—he love of childhood has fresh subjects strong it is! All in that name so gentle, yet so sensitive—chivalry without its armor. He was his constant companion; he spoke to me unreservedly, as a poet to his muse. I wept at his sorrows—I chafed at his humiliations. He talked of ancestors, as he thought of them; to him they were beings like the old Lares—not dead in graves, but living in memories, as household hearths. Doubtless he exaggerated their worth—as their old manors, their broad lands, their halls of empire, their deeds and their pow; their decline and fall. Not so much for the sake of the past, as for the more track in the ocean of history—light on the waves over which they had glided proudly, and whose sorrow they had shared.

With him thought I; as my father spoke, his child believed. But to the eye of the world, what was this inherited devoutest name?—a threadbare, slighted, rustic pedant—no station in the county but a village parsonage—and away the last lowly dwelling-place of his line. By lineage high above most nobles, by connection most powerful in the land he sprang, he had genius; but the studies to which they were devoted made it a genius of use to no purpose but to scanty means, and led rather to ridicule than to honor. Not a day but what I saw on his sad features the mark of the sting, the gnawing of a new care. Thus, as a boy, feeling in my heart a strength which I knew not, I came to him, one day as he sate grieving, and kneeling to him, said, 'Father, courage! all will be well.' I shall soon be man, and I swear to devote myself as man to revive the old family! I have no sire to be proud of, save He whose name, by you so loved, is loftier in my eyes than all the heraldry of kings.' And my father's face brightened, and he blessed and kissed me; and I rose no ambitious!" Darrell paused, heaved a short, quick sigh, and then rapidly continued:

"I was fortunate at the university. That was a day when the College looked for recruits among young men who had given the proofs, and won the fruits of, high intellectual capability. For statesmanship then was deemed an art which, like that of war, needed early devotion. I had carried off prizes when I was offered a seat in Parliament by the head of the College, who was a Minister. I hesitated but for one moment—I declined the next. The fellow House of Darrell needed wealth, and the ambitious sought not higher honors, often requires wealth—never gives it. I was destined by my father to a profession with a young man named Vipont Crooke. His grandfather, one of the numberless Viponts, had married a sister of my father's mother. Crooke had to his own ow succeeding to the property of some rich uncle, who was not of the connection. Crookes. I went with this college acquaintance to visit the old Lord Mountjoy, at his villa on the Thames, and there met the country-house of the Vipont Crookes. I said at the bot two or three days, that I loved Mary Crooke. She was then the elder Fairthorne, my father's bailiff, entreating me to come immediately to Darrell Court, and to say nothing of my love. In taking leave of my friend and his family, something in the manner of his sister struck me, and I fancied I detected confusion, a burst of tears—I know not what. I had never sought to win her affections, but in the ideal of her image I could love. It did not resemble her. On reaching Fawley, conceive the joy that I found that my father had not met with a heart-stricken. The principal mortgagee was about to foreclose—I was to be ruined—I could not pay the rent of the Darrells. I saw that the day my father was driven from the old house would be his last on earth. I flew to London to save him?—how raise the pitiful sum—but a few thousands—I knew not how. I went to my college friend's; he was of age—I knew it. My father's pride those barren acres which all the hands of the Seymour or the Gower could never wrench from the grasp of a Darrell. To me the name was a college fellowship, adequate to all my wants, but sterile as a rock to him. I went at the height in vain consultation with Fairthorn. There seemed not a hope. Next morning came a letter from Vipont Crooke. He was a manly and frank, though somewhat coarse. With the warmest terms he proffered his love to his sister's hand, and a dowry of £10,000. He hinted, in excuse for his bluntness, that, perhaps, my affections were already fixed; but if a preference for his sister, I might not deem myself rich enough to propose, but if matters not, to state what he said. You foresee the rest. My father's life could be saved from despair—his beloved home, the old trees, the old halls. That dowry would more than cover the paltry debt upon the land. I gave myself no time to bow to it. I hastened back to the house to which fate had led me. But," said Darrell, proudly, "do not think I was betrayed into a perfidy such excuses, to deceive the young lady. I told to her my love, my hopes, my ambitions, and her the love painted by romance-writers and poets; but that I loved no other—that I was free to be delighted to give her hand, I should studiously consult her happiness, and gratefully consider it to be mine. I said all this—was true, that, if she married me, ours must be for some years a life of privation and struggle; that even the interest of her fortune must be devoted to my father while he lived, though very shilling of its capital would be settled on herself and her children. How I blessed her when she accepted me, despite my candor!—how earnestly I prayed that I might love, cherish, and requite her!" Darrell paused, in evident suffering. "And, thank Heaven! I have nothing on that score wherewith to reproach myself. And the strength of that memory enabled me to bear and forbear more than otherwise would have been possible to my quick spirit, and my man's heart. My dear father! his death was happy—his home was saved—he never knew at what sacrifice to his son! He was gladdened by the first honors my youth achieved. He was reassigned to my choice of a profession, which, though contrary to his antique prejudices, thus allowed to the representative of the Darrells no profession but the legislature. I married the wealth which would secure his name from perishing. He was conscious of my future, as if it had entered, not a vow, but a prediction. He had blessed my union, without foreseeing its sorrows. He had embraced my first-born—true, it was a girl, but it was one link onward from ancestor to ancestor. He had died with his last words were these: 'You will restore the race—you will revive the name! and my son's children will visit the old manor-house, and learn gratitude to him for all that his idle lessons taught of the responsibilities of life.' And I answered: 'I father, your line shall not perish from the land; and when I am rich and great, and holdings spread far round the lonely hall that your life ennobled, I will say to your grandchildren, 'Honor your grandfather!' and then a Darrell yet treads the earth—honor him to whom I owe every thought which nerved me to toil for what I have won, and which may enjoy.'"

And so the old man, whose life had been so sinless, died.

By this time Lionel had stolen Darrell's hand into his own—his heart swelling with silent sympathy, and the tears rolling down his cheeks.

Darrell gently kissed his young kinsman's forehead, and, extricating himself from Lionel's clasp, paced the room, and spoke on while pacing.

"I made, then, a promise; it is not kept. No child of mine was ever to be taught reverence to my father's grave. My wedded life was not happy; its record needs no words. The two beings for whom I lived, both are gone. My son went first. I had thrown my life's-life into him —he was of my blood, my name, my hope. For him I began to build that baffled fabric—Sic pueblos inmemor! For him I bought, year by year, the lands in the reach of Fawley—lands twelve miles distant. I had meant to fill up the intervening space, and to buy out a miserable, whose woods and corn-fields lie between. I was scheming the purchase—surveying the ground, when a letter was brought me news that the boy I had just taken back to school was dead—'a low fever'—the fever of summer ev!' No, Lionel. I must go on. That grief I have resisted with—conquered. I was widowed then, but I had a child—the first-born, whom my father had blessed on his death-bed. I transferred to him all my hopes, to her, I had no vain preference for male heirs. In a race torn that runs on through the female line, the best heir was the most cherished. Was it cruel to—? Again Darrell stopped—again hurried on: "Would you believe it, Lionel, that I was then still in the noon of man's life, free to form new ties. Another grief that I can not resist—that I have not experienced yet. And by that grief the last overdue existence was so blighted, so blasted—that, in short, I had no heart for social altars—for the social world. Years went by. Each year I said, 'Next year I will return to the world.' Each year I said, 'Next year I will marry.' Now age is near, the grave not far; now, if ever, I must fulfill the promise that I made to my father. Lionel, Nor does that duty comprise all my motives. If I would regain health and thought, manly activity of my breaking years, I must feel that one haunting memory is exercised, and forever laid to rest. To be so only—whatever my future—whatever the folly of the hazard of my age—be so only for my father's sake. Lionel, I have resolved his eyes steadily on Lionel, and, opening his arms, cried out, "Forgive me, my noble Lionel! I am not contented with an heir like you; and do not you mock at the old man who dreams that woman may love him for his, and links your own children may inherit his father's home."

Lionel sprang to the breast that opened to him; and if Darrell had planned how best to remove from the young man's mind forever the possibility of any selfish pang, no craft could have attained his object like that touching confidence before which all disparities between youth and age literally vanished. And, both made equal, both elevated alike, vanity I know not which at the moment felt the elder or the younger! Two noble hearts, intermingled in one emotion, were set free from all time save the present; par each with each, they meet as brothers twin-born.

THE "SUSQUEHANNA" AND HER LAST CRUISE.

THE United States steam frigate Susquehanna, of which we present a fine engraving on the opposite page, has just arrived at New York, after an eventful cruise of some two years.

She went into commission, Captain Joshua R. Sands commanding, on 5th May, 1856, and on 17th of the same month stood to sea for Havana. A Spanish fleet was then on the Cuban station, lookfor between the island of Cuba and the port of Aspinwall; after which the Susquehanna was ordered to the Mediterranean squadron. She made Fayal on 12th and Gibraltar on 23d July. The cruising fortnights were spent pleasantly enough in the Mediterranean.

The Susquehanna visited most of the Mediterranean ports. She lay some time at Naples, and was also familiar at Gibraltar, Port Mahon, Malaga, Teulon, Genoa, Spezzia, Civita Vecchia, and Palermo. The chief business of the officers and men was to keep themselves well supplied with provisions. A little practice at target-shooting and reefing rapidly prevented the men from running to the conclusion—which otherwise would have been obvious—that they were on a pleasure trip; but the duties of the officers were not so arduous but that they had ample time to enjoy the delights of the Mediterranean and the many enjoyments which are offered to travelers on its shores. We read recently, in a lady's book, that been submitted to us, of "the ship' being "again enlivened by sweet music and the delighting" of her officers and guests; these seamen, who gallantly invited some of the opera-singers to a ball, and discovered, to their dismay, that the steward was unclasts expected to be paid for their attendance, nevertheless, to our best knowledge, the Susquehanna was not pretend to much commiseration for people who spent nearly a year in the Mediterranean on board a fine ship, with a steward who ungratified, and nothing to do.

This time last year the Susquehanna was ordered to England to assist the Niagara in laying the Telegraphic cable. She arrived at the Isle of Wight toward the close of May, and her officers participated in the civilities which the English lavished on all who were concerned in the Telegraph enterprise. She took part in the expedition, as is known, and her officers were among the number of those who felt the failure of the first attempt to lay the cable was a personal disappointment and severe trial.

She her return to England the Susquehanna was again ordered to the Mediterranean. Captain Sands received information that the American vessel had been seized by the Barbary pirates; he made all preparations to rescue the supposed captives; but nothing seems to have come of it. After a brief visit to Algiers and Genoa, he received orders to return to the home station. She accordingly weighed anchor and made said westward in October last.

His first destination in America was Nicaragua, where his business was to assist in intercepting the vessels of the adventurers in Nicaragua. The heat and burden of this business devolved, as it happened, upon the Susquehanna. Her first port happened, for the Susquehanna was that of a mere spectator. The visit to Central America was, however to be followed by a memorable event in her history.

The Susquehanna was lying in the harbor of Greytown, which at that time was singularly unhealthy. Apprehensions of the consequences had at the same time been entertained by Captain Sands, but nothing appeared to justify them till about the middle of May, when the crew of the ship's company were seized with fits of vomiting. On 23d March a sailor died of a disease which was pronounced to be Congestive fever. Other cases followed. The ship was ordered to sea. At first the change of air appeared to have been attended with excellent results. The disease almost disappeared from the ship, and she came to anchor afresh in the harbor of Greytown. But the sick list slight increased on board.

But on 30th March the epidemic reappeared with increased virulence. On the night of the 1st April and four officers and some forty men were attacked, and the number became imminent. A council of officers was at once held by Captain Sands, and all present concurred in the opinion that the ship should be run to the nearest United States port, which was Pensacola. Steam was immediately got up, and she was headed for that place. But twenty-eight hours had elapsed it was discovered that the vessel was short of fuel, coals and medicines. Of the former she had not enough to reach Pensacola under steam. It was, therefore, decided to run for the island of Cuba, a United States port, but to run for the nearest place, which was Jamaica, when some four hundred miles distant. All possible steam was made, and the vessel was put to the test to reach Port Royal as soon as possible.

She made Port Royal on the night of the 5th, and a communication was instantly sent to the British Admiral, Sir Fleming Norman, offering her unhappy condition. The English officer behaved in the most handsome and generous manner. He at once ordered, to borrow the language of one of our countrymen on board the Susquehanna, "at once that the vessel should be supplied with all she got in order for the reception of our sick. These orders were most faithfully carried out by the surgeons, who worked day and night, so that by eight o'clock in the morning six officers and fifty-seven men were transported to the hospital on shore, making room for all the rest." It is only one act of humanity, has won for himself a reputation that will contribute much to the love in which he is held, and has been engaged in, converse a long and brilliant career.

Commodore Kellett also comes in for the share of our thanks and gratitude. All had to these noble-hearted Englishmen, who generously risked their lives in saving the crew of a vessel, for they did not hesitate to place themselves in contact with the sick when occasion demanded it.

The Susquehanna left as soon as possible for New York, having on board Dr. Rhodes, a medical officer of the British Navy, who generously volunteered to assist her surgeons at the risk of his life. We are glad to notice that the Senate of the United States has testified its appreciation of his noble behavior by admitting him to a seat on the floor.

The Susquehanna was placed in quarantine on arrival here. She still lies in the lower bay. She is a noble ship; as will find to perform her part in war—as her heavy guns will warrant—as she is calculated to do credit to our navy by her admirable model, and the perfect discipline established by Captain Sands.

THE UNITED STATES STEAM FRIGATE "SUSQUEHANNA."

Miscellany.

Wags and Wits,
where they make a business of that which was intended to be merely a relaxation, may be likened to lamps that exhaust themselves in giving light to others.

The fêtes to which a professional wit is invited only afford an excuse to the Fates for shortening his thread. He finds it no joke to be always joking; his stomach and his convivial reputation are apt to fail him at the same time; his jests die because he can not digest; so many good things have gone into his mouth that none can come out of it; and at last, like poor Yorick, also

"A fellow of infinite jest," he is forced to try solitary conclusions with grim Death, who has but a dull ear for a joke.

Wit is a phenomenon the explanation of which has puzzled many wits, and dullards too. To answering the question,

What is Wit?

Leigh Hunt devotes forty pages of one of his books—and fails to elucidate the mystery at last. Johnson defines wit as "the faculty of associating dissimilar images in an unusual manner." Sydney Smith, in his "Lectures on Moral Philosophy," shows the fallacy of this definition, gives a better, and broaches the startling doctrine that wit, so far from being necessarily a natural gift, might be studied as successfully as mathematics. It is a question if Sheridan was witty when, staggering along, half tipsy, he was eyed by a policeman, and exclaimed, confidentially, "My name is Wilberforce—I am a religious man—don't expose me." But he was certainly funny.

Talleyrand, when asked by a lady famous for her beauty and stupidity how she should rid herself of some of her troublesome admirers, replied,

"You have only to open your mouth, Madame."

This, if witty, was also ill-natured.

Wit and Sarcasm

were united when Lord Chatham rebuked a dishonest Chancellor of the Exchequer by finishing a quotation the latter had commenced. The debate turned upon some grant of money for the encouragement of art, which was opposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who finished his speech against Lord Chatham's motion by saying, "'Why was not this ointment sold and the money given to the poor?'" Chatham rose, and said, "Why did not the noble Lord complete the quotation, the application being so striking? As he has shrunk from it, I will finish the verse for him—'This Judas said, not that he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and carried the bag.'"

It was coarse wit when Lord Byron, who was groaning with agony from a severe attack of colic, and exclaiming, "Lord help me! I am dying," was told by Trelawney, "not to make such an infernal fuss about dying."

Luttrell tells a story of Sir F. Gould, who had a habit of adding the phrase "on the contrary" to every thing he said; a gentleman saying to him, "So I hear, Gould, you eat three eggs every morning for breakfast?" "No," replied Sir Francis, "you are mistaken; on the contrary—" "What the devil," said Luttrell, "does the contrary of eating three eggs mean?" "Laying them, of course!" said Sheridan. This was ready wit.

The Philanthropist, says a recent reviewer of the life of John Howard, is necessarily an abnormal personage. If there were no loose screws in the order of things we should not want him, and he would not exist. But screws are loose—he is wanted—he does exist. The proof of the reality of his vocation is made when he does his work well. Let him have credit for that, and let his shortcomings in what is simply affectional be tenderly dealt with. But let them be recognized. For the sake of all that is dearest to human nature—for the sake of that Eternal Love which is the eldest-born of things, to which Chance and Change are subject, and to which Philanthropy herself must bow—let it be understood, and never smothered up out of respect for any man, that the pumping of human tenderness into artificially-cut reservoirs and channels—the systematization of its goings, the tabulation of its doings—is full of peril. The love that is divine is like the wind; you "hear the sound thereof, but can not tell whence it cometh nor whither it goeth." There have been "philanthropists," doubtless, whose private selfishness has not been flagrant. I can conceive some reader saying to me, "My dear Sir, I know a philanthropist, and I am sure he has a happy home. Go and cross-examine his wife! Ask, 'Is your husband attentive, kind, punctual, chaste, good-tempered, pious, watchful over your welfare, and the children's?' and she will answer, 'Yes.' Well, what more do you want?" My very gentle reader, what I want more is precisely what can not be formularized, and yet is the very staff, and stay, and human bread of life of these stupid, obstinate women's hearts. I will dispense with that clever catechism of yours. I will ask the little wife one single question: "Dear madam, is your heart utterly satisfied with your husband's love, so that it rings through every chamber of it like the vibrations of a bell, without your being able to give any account of the matter?" If the little woman will kiss the book, and say "Yes," I will let her philanthropic husband off, and say he's—a phœnix.

—Let your wife be your Help-mate.

There is much good sense and truth in the remark of a modern author that no man ever prospered in the world without the co-operation of his wife. If she unites in mutual endeavors, or rewards his labor with an endearing smile, with what confidence will he resort to his merchandise or his farm, fly over lands, sail upon the seas, meet difficulty or encounter danger, if he knows he is not spending his strength in vain, but that his labor will be rewarded by the sweets of home!

—There are two kinds of Envy.

In the base mind it degenerates into downright hatred of a superior, with a desire to deprive him of what the envious one can not possess; while in a noble soul it goes no farther than emulation, or a desire to equal or surpass the person in question. Oh, how subtle and almost imperceptible the difference between the seed of one's virtues and vices!

—Is not this, from Sir Thomas Overbury, a fresh and fair description of "A Fair and Happy Milkmaid?"

She is a country wench that is so far from making herself beautiful by art that one look of hers is able to put all face-physics out of countenance. She knows a fair look is but a dumb orator to commend virtue, therefore minds it not. All her excellences stand in her so silently, as if they had stolen upon her without her knowledge. Though she be not arrayed in the spoil of the silk-worm, she is decked in innocence—a far better wearing. She doth not, by long-lying in bed, spoil both her complexion and condition; she rises with chanticleer, and at night makes the lamb her curfew. She makes her hand hard with labor, and her heart soft with pity; and when winter evenings fall early, sitting at her merry spinning-wheel, she sings defiance to the giddy wheel of Fortune. The garden and bee-hive are all her physic and surgery, and she lives the longer for it. She dares go alone and unfold sheep in the night, fearing no manner of ill, because she means none; yet, to say truth, she is never alone, but is still accompanied with old songs, honest thoughts, and prayers, but short ones; yet they have their efficacy, in that they are not palled with ensuing idle cogitations. Thus lives she—and all her care is that she may die in the spring-time and have store of flowers stuck upon her winding-sheet.

—Lord Monboddo asserted that man was but a tailless monkey—that is to say, an animal. Some men may be animals; but mankind are of a different sort. There is—as Sydney Smith shows—a wide difference between Instinct and Talent.

All the wonderful instincts of animals, which, in my humble opinion, are proved beyond a doubt, and the belief in which has not decreased with the increase of science and investigation—all these instincts are given them only for the combination or preservation of their species. If they had not these instincts they would be swept off the earth in an instant. The bee, that understands architecture so well, is as stupid as a pebble-stone out of his own particular business of making honey; and with all his talents, he only exists that boys may eat his labors and poets sing about them—"ut pueris placeas et declamatio fias." A peasant girl of ten years old puts the whole republic to death with a little smoke, their palaces are turned into candles, and every clergyman's wife makes mead wine of the honey; and there is an end of the glory and wisdom of the bees! Whereas, man has talents that have no sort of reference to his existence, and without which his species might remain upon earth in the same safety as if they had them not. The bee works at that particular angle which saves most time and labor, and the boasted edifice he is constructing is only for his egg; but Somerset House, and Blenheim, and the Louvre, have nothing to do with breeding. Epic poems, and Apollo Belvideres, and Venus de Medicis, have nothing to do with living and eating. We might have discovered pignuts without the Royal Society, and gathered acorns without reasoning about curves of the ninth order. The immense superfluity of talent given to man, which has no bearing upon animal life, which has nothing to do with the mere preservation of existence, is one very distinguishing circumstance in this comparison. There is no other animal but man to whom mind appears to be given for any other purpose than the preservation of the body.

—Your good conversationalist is doubtless a most agreeable man; and beyond peradventure, a man who can't talk at all has no business in society. But whether it is best to study is a questionable matter. Henry Taylor says, in his Notes from Life:

Conversation, as an Art,

Conversation is, in truth, an exercise very dangerous to the understanding when practiced in any large measure as an art or an amusement. To be ready to speak before he has time to think, to say something apt and specious—something which he may very well be supposed to think, when he has nothing to say that he really does think—to say what is consistent with what he has said before, to touch topics lightly and let them go—these are the arts of a conversationalist; of which, perhaps, the last is the worst, because it panders to all the others. Nothing is searched out by conversation of this kind; nothing is heartily believed, whether by those who say it or by those who hear it. It may be easy, graceful, clever, and sparkling, and bits of knowledge may be plentifully tossed to and fro in it; but it will be vain and unprofitable; it may cultivate a certain micacious, sandy surface of the mind, but all that lies below will be unmoved and unsunned. To say that it is vain and unprofitable is, indeed, to say too little; for the habit of thinking with a view to conversational effects, will inevitably corrupt the understanding, which will never again be sound or sincere.

—There have been some heavy settling days lately—and some which were no settling days at all. Few debtors, we will wager, have put off their load so easily and gracefully as did when on the eve of his departure for the new world of the antipodes, the land of vast sheep farms and unreclaimed convicts—in short, for Australia.

"One thing more I have to do before this separation is complete, and that is to perform an act of justice. My friend Mr. Thomas Traddles has, on two several occasions, 'put his name,' if I may use a common expression, to bills of exchange for my accommodation. On the first occasion Mr. Thomas Traddles was left—let me say, in short, in the lurch. The fulfillment of the second has not yet arrived. The amount of the first obligation"—here Mr. Micawber carefully referred to papers—"was, I believe, twenty-three, four, nine and a half: of the second, according to my entry of that transaction, eighteen, six, two. These sums, united, make a total, if my calculation is correct, amounting to forty-one, ten, eleven and a half. My friend Copperfield will perhaps do me the favor to check that total?" I did so, and found it correct. "To leave this metropolis," said Mr. Micawber, "and my friend Mr. Thomas Traddles, without acquitting myself of the pecuniary part of this obligation, would weigh upon my mind to an insupportable extent. I have, therefore, prepared for my friend Mr. Thomas Traddles, and I now hold in my hand, a document, which accomplishes the desired object. I beg to hand to my friend Mr. Thomas Traddles my I O U for forty-one, ten, eleven and a half; and I am happy to recover my moral dignity, and to know that I once more walk erect before my fellow-man!" With this introduction (which greatly affected him) Mr. Micawber placed his I O U in the hands of Traddles, and said he wished him well in every relation of life. I am persuaded, not only that this was quite the same to Mr. Micawber as paying the money, but that Traddles himself hardly knew the difference until he had time to think about it.

Congregation:

A public assemblage where all the performers are professors, but where very few of the professors are performers.

Coquette:

A female general who builds her fame on her advances. She may be compared to tinder, which lays itself out to catch sparks, but does not always succeed in lighting up a match.

A Fagot of Dry Sticks, of which there are some individual sticks which we think it not amiss to stick up here:

THE SHORTEST DAY.

The day of brightest dawn (day soonest flown!)
Is that when we have met and you have gone.

FEAR.

I fear a little girl I know;
Were I but younger I were bolder
Diana! I would break thy bow
In twain across her ivory shoulder.

HEARTS-EASE.

There is a flower I wish to wear,
But not until first worn by you .
Hearts-ease . . of all Earth's flowers most rare;
Bring it; and bring enough for two.

OLIM.

Do and permit whate'er you will
With others, I shall love you still.
Heaven grant we may not love the most
When to each other we are lost!

WITH FLOWERS.

The Goddess of Beauty, who loves early hours,
Awakened the Graces to gather yon flowers:
The Goddess of Wisdom comes later, and says,
"Those wither; take mine; they shall last all your days."

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

No truth is more obvious than that mere intellectual culture does not secure a noble character; and does not prevent the commission of crime.

"I see," said a young lady, "that some printers advertise blank declarations for sale; I wish I could get one." "Why?" asked the mother. "Because, ma, Mr. G—— is too modest to ask me to marry him; and, perhaps, if I could fill a blank declaration, he would sign it."

A CHANSON FOR CANTON.

John Chinaman a rogue is born,
The laws of truth he holds in scorn;
About as great a brute as can
Encumber the earth is John Chinaman.
Sing Yeh, my cruel John Chinaman,
Sing Yeo, my stubborn John Chinaman;
Not Cobden himself can take off the ban
By humanity laid on John Chinaman.

With their little pig-eyes and their large pig-tails,
And their diet of rats, dogs, slugs, and snails,
All seems to be game in the frying-pan
Of that nasty feeder, John Chinaman.
Sing lie-tea, my sly John Chinaman,
No fightee, my coward John Chinaman;
John Bull has a chance—let him, if he can,
Somewhat open the eyes of John Chinaman.

BY THOMAS MOORE.

"My birth-day!"—what a different sound
That word had in my youthful ear!
And how, each time the day comes round,
Less and less white its mark appears!
When first our scanty years are told,
It seems like pastime to grow old!
And as youth counts the shining links
That Time around him binds so fast,
Pleased with the task, he little thinks
How hard that chain will press at last.

A year of pleasure passes like a floating breeze; but a moment of misfortune seems an age of pain.

MY DAUGHTER'S WEDDING EXPENSES.

Hard was I driven, through many a stony way,
To bring my daughter to a wedding day;
But thought not, till I gave away my idol,
I ever should be saddled with the bridal.

The following illustration is given of the wit of Mirza Mohammed Ibrahim, the Oriental scholar who filled for fifteen years the chair of Persian at Haileybury: "Dining, one day, with a gentleman well known for his conviviality, the decanters halted so long before the Mirza, that the host exclaimed, with a little impatience, 'Pass the bottle, Mirza; what do you call, in Persian, the man who stops the wine?' 'We call him Mohammed,' said the Mirza, with a quiet smile."

It is said that Napoleon, when he was asked by Dr. O'Meara if he really thought he could have invaded England at the time he threatened to do so, answered in the following anagram—"Able was I ere I saw Elba." Whether this is true or not, we should like to see a more ingenious and extended anagram.

A new name has been invented for those people who used to be briefly denominated sots, or, with greater verbosity, habitual drunkards. They are now called, by medical writers, "dipsomaniacs;" that is to say, maniacs who are thirsty-mad. Now the fact is, that such persons are so far from being thirsty-mad, that, as the nigger phrase is, they "drinkee for drunkee," and do not, at all, in any measure, "drinkee for dry." With real accuracy in view, and etymological propriety out of the question, they might more scientifically be styled tipsymaniacs.

"This tenement to let. Inquire next door." The place was in a dilapidated, wretched condition. Bannister, however, inquired the rent, etc. These particulars gained, he asked,

"Do you let any thing with it?"

"No," was the reply: "why do you ask?"

"Because," said the wit, "if you let it alone, it will tumble down!"

Found dead—dead and alone:
There was nobody near, nobody near,
When the outcast died on his pillow of stone—
No mother, no brother, no sister dear,
Not a friendly voice to soothe or cheer,
Not a watching eye or a pitying tear.
Found dead—dead and alone—
In the roofless street, on a pillow of stone!

A bachelor advertised for a "helpmate, one who would prove a companion for his heart, his hand, and his lot." A fair one, replying, asked, very earnestly, "How big is your lot?"

One of the neatest replies ever heard in a legislative body, or any where else, was lately made by Mr. Tilson, of Rockland, Maine. A member had replied to something Mr. Tilson had said, and pausing a moment, he inquired if he saw the line of argument. "Mr. Speaker," said he, "in answer to the gentleman I would say, I hear the humming of the wheel, but I do not see any thread!"

"I say, Jim," said a plowman, the other day, to his companion, "I know of a new-fashioned Mackintosh to keep out the wet." "What is that?" "Why, if you eat a red herring in the morning, for breakfast, you'll be dry all the day."

If John Smith should, while crossing Brown's vacant lot, happen to fall and tear his pantaloons, who is responsible for the ground rent thus created—he or Brown? and could Brown compel Smith to settle the rent with a potato patch?

A few days since, an Irishman brought some trivial charge against a fellow-emigrant from the Green Isle, and obtained a warrant from Justice Osborne for his arrest. Next morning he called upon the Judge and said, "Yer honor, has the warrant against Mr. Flanaghan been served yit?" The Judge replied that he believed not. "Then, yer honor," replied Pat, "mind yer eye, I niver want it served." "Why not?" asked the magistrate. "Because, ye see, the man is dead and buried, sure, for he died last Tuesday, yer honor."

The reply of a prominent temperance prohibition law advocate to a question put to him the other day as to "how the controversy stood between the rum-sellers and temperance men," was quite to the point. He said that "temperance never had more law nor the rum-sellers more liquor than at present."

Bob Sawyer was asked the other day, while preparing a dose of "wolatilly" for a "wictim" in the neighborhood, whether he danced the Lancers. "No," replied that gentleman, pausing for an instant in his pleasing occupation, "I lance the dancers."

"Why can one not eat half a cake?"—"Because you can't eat your cake and have (halve) it."

"One word more, and I have done." How we dread to hear this sentence from the lips of a speaker at public meetings! It is always a sure indication that he is bracing up for a fresh start.

"There is a malady common to savages in certain parts of the world, which is termed 'earth-hunger.' It provokes an incessant craving for clay—a species of food which fails to satisfy the appetite, and impairs the digestion." So says a London periodical, relative to the constant craving for more food of the East India Company. We would suggest that the same malady is not altogether unknown in this country.

A theological professor, speaking of Balaam's ass, says it is wrong to doubt that the ass spoke like a man, when we daily hear so many men speak like asses.

How many young men are carried away by a fine, musical, charming voice—a pretty, light-footed, reeling ball-room dancer—a lazy, lounging, street-yarning flirt—an oily-tongued, hollow-hearted, deceptive piano-pounder, and regret their folly when, alas, too late!

A late traveler, in speaking of Austria, says that one-half of the people are under arms to keep the other half in jail.

"A dandy is a thing that would Be a young lady if he could;
But since he can't, does all he can,
To let you know he's not a man."

A very charming daughter of one of the "solid men of Boston," being at a ball a few evenings since, was solicited by a combination of mustache, starch, and broadcloth for the honor of her hand in a dance, to which solicitation she returned an affirmative answer. In a subsequent conversation the aforesaid combination inquired her father's business. "He is a wood-sawyer," she replied. The fellow sloped, feeling that he had let himself down a foot or two by the association. The lady's father was a wealthy dealer in mahogany, which occasionally has to be sawed.

Roger Gale, in a letter dated August, 1739, says that he saw the following satire on Scotland in a window at Belford, England:

Cain, in disgrace with heaven, retired to Nod,
A place, undoubtedly, as far from God
As Cain could wish; which makes some think he went
As far as Scotland ere he pitched his tent;
And there a city built, of ancient fame,
Which he from Eden, Edinburgh did name.

Foote once asked a man without a sense of tune in him, "Why are you forever humming that tune?"

"Because it haunts me," was the reply.

"No wonder," answered Foote, "you are forever murdering it."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, May 10, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets were quite busy during the week for Flour and Wheat, which were more freely offered than they were required to be purchased. Prices closed decidedly lower, with a downward tendency. Corn was in moderate demand and steady. There was not much inquiry for Pork, the advanced rates of which checked shipments. Corn was in moderate supply and fair request, without any remarkable change in prices. Rye, Barley, and Oats favor buyers, yet they are not pressed for sale. Coffee opened with considerable vigor, but closed tamely and languidly. In a live, lire business has been transacted in Groceries, and prices were obtained for Coffee, Teas, and Sugars. Provisions were in moderate request, and prices were without material change. Petroleum and Linseed Oil, Hay and Hops were moderately dealt in, as were also Tobacco and Wool, at steadily maintained prices. The movements in Dry Goods were moderate. Duties for fabrics continued rather active, with steady prices in prices. Old goods and unattractive styles were very dull and irregular in value. . . . The receipts of Dry Goods amounted to $757,843 against $200,915 the corresponding week in 1857. The imports since the 1st of January have been $17,137,669 against $26,351,997 same time in 1857. The shipments to all countries this week moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable transactions. The following are the latest wholesale quotations for the leading articles of trade:

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were quite heavy for Beeves, which weighed rather large, and closed at, yet purchased reservedly. . . . Milch Cows were in very limited demand, and without improvement in prices. . . . Veal Calves were abundant and in limited request at irregular prices. . . . Sheep and Lambs were in large supply and offering, yet they were not more plentiful, and prices loaded downward. . . . Swine were less inquired for, and they declined a shade. . . . The receipts and sales of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending

FINANCIAL AND COMMERCIAL.

FRANKLIN SQUARE, Monday, May 10, 1858.

The Specie trade of the port for the past week compares as follows with that of the corresponding week last year:

	Imports.	Exports.
Week ending May 8, 1858	$1,150,472	$1,611,079
Corresponding week, 1857	3,305,577	1,610,961
Decrease	$2,155,105	$30,181

The export of specie was only $146,098 greater than the port last year for the week's business, which check opened over thirty-five millions last Monday, and which is now at two by the evening's sitting. Another and another California arrival will be due. It is possible that there may be as few millions may be remitted from the banks to the Sub-Treasury when the new loan (for which the bonds are to be opened on July) is ready. Money grows easier each successive week; many persons are now asking of their per cent. as a likely rate for money in June and July. Exchange on England, though it has declined, is not yet a shipping rate.

It is stated that the New York tolls for the new Treasury bills ($5,000,000 in all) amount to the large sum of $100,000.

Stocks have been very quiet during the week, but closed on Saturday with rather a firmer tendency.

HOOP SKIRTS IN CHURCHES.—THE Hoop Skirt, which has become the unconscious expression of the ladies wearing the same, is now so universally worn among and about the congregations of our churches, as the continual breaking of the Spring, large openings, and the difficulty of the ladies passing through the pews in their attire is entirely removed by the use of WOOD-WARD'S PATENT SPRING HOOP SKIRT, which is WOVEN AND EXTENDED, which are allowed by all who have seen them to be the most graceful, elegant, durable, and French Skeleton, or any other Steel or Brass Spring Skirt now in use. Every Spring worn bears the name of the inventor, and is stamped, very conspicuous, EX-PANSITE AND DURABLE. Ladies will find these Skirts the most desirable possessions. Sold at Retail at the Factory, 343 Broadway, New York. Ladies, please call and examine them.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of Valuable and Interesting Books, Rare Prints and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for distribution, and will be sent to any address on receipt of Ten Cents, either in stamps personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in Postage Stamps.

Persons residing in the country, or desiring to send their orders by mail, can have their books packed and forwarded by express, or otherwise, as they may direct. Being connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., we may not have access to a reliable guide in forming a judicious selection of books suitable for the country. This catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

CAUTION.

LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

THE attention of MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS has been called to several spurious works put forth as the "NARRATIVE OF DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA." One of these is a gross forgery throughout. It does not contain a single line written or furnished by DR. LIVINGSTONE, bears no resemblance whatever to his genuine Narrative, but is altogether the invention of the fabricator. Another book professes to give, "in the language of Dr. Livingstone," a "complete account of his various journeys, omitting only incidental details and scientific matter." These "incidental details" which are omitted, and form more than one half of the matter in the genuine edition, embracing the most valuable part of the book, nearly all of the characteristic illustrations, and the elaborate Maps, which are essential to a full understanding of the explorations and travels of the Author. Another spurious piece of the genuine Livingstone has been supplied by coarse secondhand cuts, bearing no relation whatever to Dr. Livingstone's Book. The unfinished edition is designed mainly for circulation through the "Gift-Book" scheme of the publisher, although it is understood that reputable members of the Trade have purchased it, supposing it to be a genuine, unmutilated edition of the work.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS respectfully caution the Trade and the Public against being imposed upon by these forged and mutilated Works.

The only genuine and unmutilated American edition of Livingstone's Work is that published by MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS, printed from an early copy purchased for a large sum from the Author. It contains 754 pages, large octavo, with a Portrait of the Author engraved on Steel; two elaborate Steel Maps, and numerous Steel Plates colored, and Forty-five large Wood-cuts, engraved in the highest style of the Art. The volume is beautifully printed and substantially bound. Price Three Dollars.

TO PERSONS IN THE COUNTRY.

MESSRS. HARPER & BROTHERS will send a copy of LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS by Mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, upon the receipt of Three Dollars.

The present Number is the first of the Seventeenth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The Publishers refer to the character of the work during the past seventeen years as a guarantee that it will be commenced. They believe that the Magazine embraces in its general scope a wider range of subjects, and more literary excellence, adapted to the wants of the American public, than any other periodical. Its articles have been culled even during the unexampled financial revulsion, which has proved so disastrous to so many literary and commercial enterprises; and they are assured from every quarter that the Magazine is recognized as a necessity rather than a luxury. They therefore announce no change in its character, but will endeavor to maintain it. The Magazine with articles increasing sound views on Literature, Politics, and Society, and abounding in the choicest Light Literature, will continue to present pictures in public, in their own appropriate organs. Wits, Humor and Pleasantry agree upon the same measurement that these upon which they differ. The object of the Magazine will be to unite rather than to separate the views and feelings of the people of different sections of the country.

The Publishers do not find it necessary or expedient to append to their periodicals a long "prospectus-bore" containing an unusual amount of matter or illustration. They will only say that the Magazine will continue to present the best and cheapest periodical publication. It will contain original articles from the most eminent and better illustrations, printed in a better manner, than any other Monthly Magazine; and the Publishers are confident it will deserve and receive the same cordial appreciation and liberal patronage which have been awarded to it during the Eight Years of its publication.

THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous illustrations by the Author, commenced in the DECEMBER NUMBER of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from advance sheets, received in advance of publication in England.—Early with the Publishers' pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

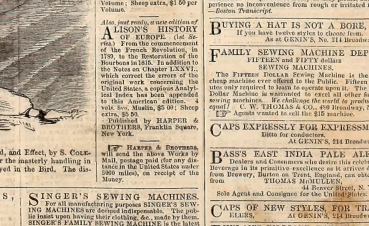
Our Art Critic, who happens to be short in stature, visits the Academy of Design, and experiences great difficulty in seeing the Pictures, in consequence of the volume of Animated Crinoline in front of him.

Under the circumstances, he has only been able to examine the following Pictures carefully:

No. 192. An American Flag and Light-house, by HEINE. Very good indeed. The Painting displayed in the Flag can not be excelled.

No. 608. ELLIOTT and his Friends, by SPRAGUE. This Picture is wonderful in the libellous display of drawing and expression. We think if the Artist had introduced the Fish that is evidently hooked into the scene, it would have given more animation to the lower portion of the Picture.



No. 64. A splendid study of the Fork-tree in Mexico. The warm tone of this Picture is enchanting.

No. 182. An Old "Boy" narrating his Adventures to an interested Hunter.—[LAIT.

No. 539. Portrait, by ELLIOTT, of an eminent Pork and Provision Dealer, in the peculiarly characteristic attitude of handing a friend a book from a Library Shelf.

No. 557. Portrait of a well-known Beggar. Good in Color.

No. 581. Study of a Rock, Large Bird, and Effect, by S. COLEMAN, Jr. This Picture is remarkable for the masterly handling in the Rock and beautiful drawing displayed in the Bird. The distance is finely worked up.

A NEW VOLUME OF ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE.

ALISON'S HISTORY OF EUROPE. (1st Series.) From the commencement of the French Revolution, in 1789, to the Restoration of the Bourbons in 1815. In Eight Volumes with the Notes on Chapter LXXVI., which correct the errors of the original work concerning the United States, a copious Analytical Index has been appended to this American edition. 100 Wood-cuts. 12mo. Muslin. $1 00.

A SCHOOL HISTORY OF GREECE, from the Earliest Times to the Roman Conquest; with Supplementary Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D., Editor of the "Dictionaries of Greek and Roman Antiquities," &c. Edited by Professor CREEK. Uniform with "Liddell's Rome" and "Dr. Student's Gibbon."

We are too much concerned for the improvement of school-books to suppress the publication of a new History of Greece for Schools by such a scholar and teacher as Dr. WM. SMITH. We have much confidence in hearing testimony to the excellence of the plan on which he has proceeded, and the careful, scholastic manner in which he has carried it out. The great distinctive feature, however, is the chapters on Literature and Art. This alone is a decided advantage over all previous works of the kind.—Athenæum.

100 Wood-cuts. 12mo. Muslin. $1 00.

A HISTORY OF ROME, from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Empire, with Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By H. G. LIDDELL, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, late Head Master of Westminster School, and Editor of the Greek and Latin Lexicon. Uniform with "Smith's Greece" and "The Student's Gibbon."

The excellent History of Rome, from the pen of one of the most celebrated scholars of the day, will supersede every other work on the subject. The volume is admirably suited, as a "History of Greece," by Dr. William Smith, to engraphy, literary methods, and interest.—John Bull.

It is enriched by the modern discoveries—for discoveries they must be called —of Niebuhr and Arnold, and is really a most entertaining as well as a very handsome book. This is an element of worfulness which has not been sufficiently attended to. Books intended for the young especially ought to be amusing. No youthful student can relish a dry compendium of facts, which are not meant for his imagination. This volume calls in the aid of the eye as well as that of the imagination, to assist the memory. Excellent engravings from ancient coins, medals, gems, busts, and wood-cuts of places "famous in story," as they now appear to the traveler, are interspersed with the letterpress.—Literary Gazette.

100 Wood-cuts. 12mo. Muslin. $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S GIBBON. Being the History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Abridged, Incorporating the Researches of Recent Historians. By WM. SMITH, LL.D., Author of "The School History of Greece," "The School History of Rome," "Smith's Greece" and "Liddell's Rome."

The best popular edition of Gibbon extant. It is pervaded by all the warmth, life, and power of the celebrated original; and is just some such volume as Gibbon himself would have issued had he deemed it proper to send forth a digest of his own immortal performance. Dr. Smith, with characteristic skill, has treated briefly subjects of minor importance, and omitted many passages which, however grateful at morning, made no essential part of the whole. The Student will find ample room for quoting at length, and sometimes on fully as in the original, those grand events which have influenced the cities of the world. By adopting this plan the volume is free from the meagreness which necessarily attaches to mere abridgements. The chief omissions are those which refer to the Church and Christianity, where Gibbon only manifested his impiety at the expense of history.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of One Dollar.

HON. WILLIAM H. ENGLISH, OF INDIANA.

THE subject of this sketch, the Hon. William H. English, was born in Scott County, in the State of Indiana, on the 27th day of August, 1822. The Great Valley of the Mississippi, which is now an empire within itself in wealth and population, was at that time, comparatively speaking, a wilderness, the home of wild and savage beasts, and roving bands of scarcely less savage men. Indiana, one of the galaxy of States, near the centre of this great valley, which has sprung into existence almost as if by enchantment—now the home of more than a million and a quarter of inhabitants, teeming with every luxury and blessing—then had just been born into the sisterhood of States, and the stealthy tread of the Red man had scarcely ceased to be heard, as he prowled around the cabin of the adventurous and hardy pioneer on his errand of savage cruelty and death. Surrounded by such scenes of hardy adventure and of reckless daring, so familiar to the pioneers of the West, Mr. English received his early training and education. His native State being but a few years his senior, "he has grown with her growth, and strengthened with her strength," until he has become thoroughly identified with her interests and prosperity.

He is the only son of the Hon. Elisha G. English, one of the early pioneers of the State, who served many years in both branches of the Legislature, and is widely known as a devoted friend, a sound practical statesman, of the Democratic school, consistent and reliable under all circumstances. But few men have been more active in the support of Democratic men and measures, and his name is intimately associated with the early legislative and political history of his State. Under such parental influence it is not surprising that the son should early have imbibed the father's principles and zeal. He identified himself with the Democratic party, and took a prominent part in the political contests of his county long before he arrived at his majority.

His education was such as could be acquired at the common schools of his neighborhood, and a course of three years' study at the South Hanover University. He studied law with Jesse D. and Michael G. Bright, of Madison, Indiana, and was admitted to practice in the Circuit Court at the early age of eighteen years. He was subsequently admitted to the Supreme Court of his State; and in 1845, in the twenty-third year of his age, to the highest judicial tribunal in the country, the Supreme Court of the United States. He studied law more as a matter of general information than with a view of practicing it as a profession, and now resides upon his farm adjoining the village of Lexington, the county seat of his native county, devoting the time not occupied by the discharge of his official duties in agricultural pursuits, attending to no legal business, except gratuitously for his friends and neighbors, who occasionally solicit his kindly offices in their behalf.

In 1843 he was chosen principal clerk of the House of Representatives of his State over several distinguished and worthy competitors. It was at this session that the Hon. Jesse D. Bright, the then Lieutenant-Governor and President of the Senate, by his casting vote, postponed the regular election of a United States Senator until the next session, which resulted in his own election.

After the election of Mr. Polk to the Presidency, to which Mr. English largely contributed, as an active and efficient politician in his section of the country, he was tendered an appointment in the Treasury Department at Washington, which he accepted, and continued to discharge its duties during that administration. Mr. English confined himself strictly to business, kept himself aloof from the fashionable dissipations of the city, invested his means judiciously, and surrendered his office cheerfully at the close of Mr. Polk's administration.

He was a clerk of the Claims Committee, in the United States Senate, during the memorable session of the Compromise of 1850, but at the close of the session he resigned his position and returned to his native home.

He was elected principal secretary to the State Constitutional Convention which assembled at Indianapolis in October, 1850, to revise the Constitution of his State, and at the adjournment the Convention assigned to him the important trust of supervising the publication of the Constitution, the journal, address, etc. In 1851 he was elected to represent his native county in the State Legislature against an opposition majority, and over a competitor considered the strongest and most popular Whig in the county. This was the first meeting of the Legislature under the provisions of the new Constitution, and judgment and discretion were required of the Legislature to put the new State machinery into harmonious and successful operation. It was, therefore, no small compliment for so young a man as Mr. English to have been chosen over so many older and more experienced of its citizens. When the Legislature met, his name was presented by many friends as a suitable person to fill the important position of Speaker. Hon. John W. Davis was at first elected to the post. On his resignation, Mr. English was elected in his place without serious opposition, and presided with dignity and ability over that body.

In October, 1852, Mr. English was elected to the United States House of Representatives. He entered Congress at the commencement of Mr. Pierce's administration, and gave its political measures a warm and hearty support. It was at the opening of this Congress that Mr. Douglas introduced his famous Kansas-Nebraska bill. Mr. English was a member of the House Committee on Territories, which was charged with the consideration and report of the bill; and, although not concurring with the majority of the Committee in the propriety and expediency of bringing forward the measure at that time, yet, when the issue was made before the country, he—believing the principle it contained to be right—gave it his most hearty and cordial support, not only by his votes and his voice upon the floor of the House, but by his judicious and skilful action upon an Advisory Committee, whose immediate duty it was to look after the interests of the measure to insure its success.

In 1854 the National Democracy of his district nominated him for re-election to Congress, and, after passing through one of the fiercest and most bitter partisan canvasses ever before known in his State, he was elected; and was again chosen at the close of this second term.

On his first entrance into Congress he was appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives a Regent of the Smithsonian Institution—a rare compliment to a new member and to so young a man as Mr. English—to which place he has been continued by each subsequent Speaker of the House, and has filled the responsible position in a manner highly honorable to himself and practically beneficial to the institution. He is now chairman of one of the most important committees of the House—that of Post-offices and Post-roads.

At the opening of the present session of Congress the Kansas question, under a new phase, again arose. Hitherto he had acted and voted upon this question in harmony with his political colleagues and the Democratic administration; but he now found it impossible to persevere in that course. In the closing paragraph of a speech delivered by him in the House of Representatives, on the 9th March last, in exposition of his views upon that question he clearly defined his position and his ultimatum. He said:

"In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I repeat that I think, before Kansas is admitted, her people ought to ratify, or at least have a fair opportunity to vote upon, the Constitution under which it is proposed to admit her; at the same time, I am not so wedded to any particular plan that I may not, for the sake of harmony and as a choice of evils, make reasonable concessions, provided the substance could be secured; which is the making of the Constitution, at an early day, conform to the public will, or at least that the privileges and opportunity of so making it shall be secured to the people beyond all question. Less than this would not satisfy the expectations of my constituents, and I would not betray their wishes for any earthly considerations. If, on the other hand, all reasonable compromises are voted down, and I am brought to vote upon the naked and unqualified admission of Kansas under the Lecompton Constitution, I distinctly declare that I can not, in conscience, vote for it."

He said he was willing to accede to the request of the Senate, made under unusual circumstances, for a Committee of Conference upon the disagreeing votes between the two Houses, under a strong sense of duty, as a necessary step before we can break off the legislative department to the other, and with some hope that some intermediate or middle ground might be found upon which the two Houses could stand, and their disagreements be healed. As he expressed it at the time that he made the motion, he grant the conference, no harm could possibly grow out of it, and good might result. The conference was granted, and he was appointed chairman of the Committee on the part of the House. As the Senate had acted for the conferees, the managers on behalf of that branch of Congress were informed by Mr. E. that propositions for a compromise had first come from them. He could not hope to offer the managers on the part of the House hard terms, and the conference would immediately terminate. The managers on the part of the Senate made several propositions, none of which, however, were acceptable to the members on behalf of the House. The Senate Committee then asked the managers from the House if they had any compromise to offer, to which Mr. E. replied that he had none prepared, but he had a plan in his mind, however, upon the basis principle of a submission of the question of admission under the Lecompton Constitution to the people contended on distance to a fair vote of the people of Kansas, and if the Committee thought it worth while he would prepare it, and submit it to them at their next meeting. They told him to do so. This is the hasty history of the origin of the English Kansas Compromise Measure which has just been communicated in the Congress of the United States. The honour of it is not enough in a great measure belongs to Mr. English.

Mr. English is a man of action rather than of words. His efforts as a debater are more remarkable for practical common sense than for the graces of oratory or the flowers of rhetoric; his mind is strictly practical in all its scope and bearings, is eminently utilitarian. Energy of character, firmness of purpose, and an unswerving integrity are his chief characteristics. In personal intercourse he is inclined to be retiring and reserved, which might be attributed to haughtiness or pride by a stranger, but to an acquaintance and friend he is open, candid, and affable. In the private and social relations of life he stands "without blemish and above reproach."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, MAY 22, 1858.

THE ANNIVERSARIES.

WHATEVER preference our modern Diogenes, Thomas Carlyle, may cherish for heroic souls working out, in solitary grandeur, schemes of their achievement, we are not less heartedly the value of associated action. These cheerful, open, daylight activities extend best with the spirit of our Christian faith, and as the anniversary Week comes in with spring-time and May as a festive occasion. The reunions of the past week have excited more than their ordinary interest; partly from the fact that all the great Societies have had to weather an unprecedented financial storm, and partly because one and the most important of them have been agitated with internal controversy.

The Anniversary of the Ladies' Home Mission, on Monday evening, was made also the occasion of opening the spacious new hall of the Cooper Institute—thus uniting, at the outset of its career, the interests of science with the charities of religion. Mr. Cooper, who occupied the chair, was cordially greeted by the audience, and read an address, setting forth the objects of this his munificent benefaction for the people of New York. The Five Points Mission, under the care of this Society, has had a prosperous year; a new school building has been completed and paid for; eight hundred children have been taught, and thousands fed and supplied with clothing. Two hundred and fifty of the children under the care of the Mission were present, and added to the interest of the occasion by their singing and substituting the Bible recitations.

On the same evening was held the thirtieth Anniversary of the American Seamen's Friend Society. Jack Tar is proverbially incapable of taking care of himself, and this truly Christian association has gone before him into foreign lands, setting up for him, in distant sea-ports, home and church, ministering to him in sickness, and watching over him with quiet but helpful care. There are fifteen foreign stations under its care in North and South America, Europe, and Asia, and it is gratifying to learn that the receipts of the Society have not fallen off during the past disastrous year.

At the meeting of the American Anti-Slavery Society, on Tuesday and Wednesday, resolutions were passed condemning the revival, and counseling the Northern States to combine in resisting the General Government.

But the interest of the Anniversary Week culminated in the annual meeting of the American Tract Society, held Wednesday morning, May 12th, in the Mercer Street Church, Lafayette Place. Preliminary exercises were held on Monday and Tuesday, and on Wednesday the church was crowded to repletion, with a dense throng of members and spectators. The question at issue was the refusal of the Executive Committee to publish any work that denies the existence of Slavery, as well as those moral evils and vices which it is known have grown out, and which are condemned in Scripture, and so much deplored by Evangelical Christians, undoubtedly do fall within the province of this Society, and can and ought to be discussed in a fraternal and Christian spirit."

The Executive Committee proceeded to justify their action, at great length, on the following grounds: 1. A new state of feeling, not apparent when the Constitution was framed, had been developed, and which rendered the publication of such tracts highly inexpedient. 2. At the time of the organization of the Society a discretion had been lodged with the Committee to shape their action in such a manner as would best secure the general and best satisfaction of the Society throughout the country. 3. In the passing the resolutions the Society did not intend to alter the constitution, which the Committee were assured would follow upon their execution. 4. By the terms of the incorporation of the Society the Committee felt themselves bound by the rule that the "action of subordinate agencies be left as possible, undirected interference," and they, therefore, determined to leave the question unembarrassed, for the future consideration of the Society. 5. That they decided if the constitution of the Society did not forbid the publications required.

Bishop M'Ilvaine, who was one of the original members of the Society, and its oldest Vice-President—earnestly advocated the adoption of the Report. He "deeply deplored" the views of the Report in an elaborate speech. Dr. Tyng moved, as a substitute, that the resolutions be reaffirmed, and that the Executive Committee be directed to carry them into effect, which was lost. Drs. Krebs, Bacon, Thompson, Mr. Sanford, and others, participated actively in the debate, which was exceedingly spirited, though moderate, on the whole, in point of temper. The Report of the Executive Committee was finally adopted by a decided majority.

The American Bible Society held its forty-second Anniversary on Thursday morning, Hon. Theodore Frelinghuysen presiding. In the course of the Society during the past year has been $200,739 49. 250,000 Bibles and 381,000 Testaments have been printed, making, first and 500 volumes in raised letters for the blind; the total number of volumes issued since the formation of the Society is 12,808,417. The Society is to be a general acquiescence in the recent action of the Board of Managers upon the questions pending in relation to the translation of the Bible; there was no controversy at the annual meeting upon this subject.

The Annual Report of Commissioners for Foreign Missions celebrated their Anniversary on Friday, the 14th instant, at Dr. Cleeves's Church, in Orange, New Jersey. Able addresses were delivered by several missionaries from foreign fields.

Besides these, the American and Foreign Christian Union, the Female Guardian Society, the New York City Mission Society, the American Temperance Union, the Five Points House of Industry, and others not specially noticed in the publication of the Anniversary Week, it is gratifying to learn that the receipts of the past year are about equal to those of the year preceding.

GOVERNOR KING'S APOLOGY FOR HIS SYMPATHY.

GOVERNOR KING'S private Secretary, in a card published by the Albany Atlas and Argus, denies the communication of Maurice O'Connell's sentence, letters from the twelve jurymen, from Judge Ingraham, who presided at the trial, and from the actual as well as acting Sheriff, in which the writers declare that at great length to show that the action of the Governor was requested by the writers. In our judgment this application was an act of supererogacy. The convict was adjudged guilty of the double felony of rape and murder. It is true he was young in years, but youth has long ceased to be an arbitrary measure of life. The boys of this country are not by any means like the boys of 1758; and it was among the youth of the country that the example of rigid law was required.

The Governor has the prerogative of clemency reposed in him to be used at his discretion. He is to resist persuasion, on the one hand, and to withstand mistaken sympathy upon the other. If the apology of the private Secretary is to be regarded, then it was not Governor King who acted, but the jurors, the judge, and the prosecutor; for the card admits, that upon all the other circumstances of the case the Governor felt that it was the law to have its course—to the interposition of the functionaries he yielded. Would the District Attorney enter nolle prosequi on an indictment which the Governor regarded is? Would Judge Ingraham excuse a witness on the Executive asking it? When the functions of government are distributive, no one branch should interfere with the action of another beyond grand and manifest facts.

But the "card" suggests another consideration, arising from the manifold sympathy for criminals that is shown by this case to operate for all the branches of justice. We have only space to quote from ex-Judge and acting District-Attorney Whiting's letter to the Executive:

"On looking into the case from the papers presented to me preparatory to the trial, I came to the conclusion that the circumstances were, that there was no malice in the cellar where the deceased was, under the impression that it was a house of ill-fame. That the woman was held by the throat, with no intention to take life, and, perhaps, [accidentally] the deceased was shoved off the gutter, and that a slight pressure upon the throat might have caused death, without premeditation. Without in the least intending to extenuate the crime, it presented itself to my mind as I think still sustained, [appears] as a proper case to take a plea of manslaughter in the first degree, and I so advised the District Attorney to treat the prisoner. The next day the friends of O'Connell strongly urged the same necessity, that the Assistant District Attorney and myself determined to make no opposition to the plea of guilty of manslaughter, as without the gists. The Court granted the motion, and the prisoner and his friends repent of their folly, and appear to be of opinion that I was unfaithful to their interests. I confess I am sine there with them."

So, by common consent of the prisoner has denied me to write what in substance I intended to have written. I have yielded to his wishes, but to what I thinks duty.

"The convict is a youth, as near as I could judge, about sixteen; his life is forfeit of the law; a victim of bad habits and a want of moral principle. Many of our sin inmate of one of our Common Schools, one from which the John, Mary, and Susan of this city gained in the Annals of Crime, was probably ruthlessly ejected.

"On the 15th instant, I shall execute the brain, and to neglect the heart, is the duty of the State, is to my mind the most solemn duty I have to do. The Bible is the text-book which points out the path, the straight and narrow way which leads to the Christian's home, and all religionists following after our Saviour. Why should it be neglected in the solemn hour of execution? Excuse me, my dear sir, this digression does not belong to this letter, and I trust you will believe me when I say, My heart bleeds, and my eyes are this poor last, but for hundreds I see around me every day, following in in a footsteps, which the position of an officer of justice, I am forced to the sacred training of the State or of the home, restrained."

The "Dr. Cheever" into a cellar under an impression it was a house of ill-fame"—one of them ravished an old woman, "held by the throat, [accidentally] shoved off the gutter, and produced the fatal result"—and, "without in the least intending to extenuate the crime," Mr. Whiting "thinks it needless for not only the pardon, but for hundreds I see around me every day following in his footsteps!"

This whole affair, if shared in by all prosecutors and Governors, make New York city worse than a Coffee settlement; and it is against such sympathy we have constantly protested in these columns.

ASSASSINATION AS A POLITICAL METHOD.

THE New York Tribune has published a manifesto, signed by certain French exiles, in justification of the attempt recently made by Orsini and others to assassinate the Emperor of the French, and in palliation—to use the mildest term—of the abstract principle of assassination as a political method.

The fact revives the old question which all our collegiate readers have at some time or other been called upon to discuss at some college debating society—Is Brutus less and such Cæsar a murderer? Some of the best arguments in favor of the regicide Brutus and against him will at once occur to the disciples of our own school of Democracy.

The world, happily, is not a debating society. Theories are of consequence, in everyday life, only in so far as they can be reduced to practice. There is, therefore, no necessity to investigate the abstract right of tyrannicide as a preliminary to the case of the authors of the attempt of the Rue Lepelletier. We, at least, make no pretension to lay down abstract rules for the guidance of humanity. Our part in this world will be performed to our own satisfaction if, in accepting facts as they are, we succeed in reducing their evil consequences to the best practicable of human nature, and acting forth in as strong a light as we can the mischievousness and folly of the wild speculations.

Practically, then, assassination is wrong, because it devolves upon the assassin the private right of punishing the deserving death. If, practically, it was admitted that any one who had the courage was justified in assassinating those whose existence appeared to him antagonistic to the public weal, society would be at an end. The needy borrower would assassinate the lender of money at usurious rates. The hopeless debtor would assassinate his cruel creditor. The gay Lothario would assassinate some curmudgeon of a husband. The injured husband would assassinate some fancied destroyer of his peace. There would, in fact, be no end to the homicides. There are, probably, but few readers of these lines who can not call to mind some individual whose death would premise positive good to the world at large. If Pierri and Orsini were justified in assassinating Louis Napoleon, all of these persons would be directly entitled to perpetrate the particular murders which seem in their sphere to be necessary. Necessary it is easy to realize the state of things to which this would lead.

Society involves the certain abandonment of the right of private judgment. When a man becomes a member of society, he relinquishes to the social body certain of his natural rights, among which is that of ridding the world of obnoxious individuals. Having done so, he has to look to society for the protection of his life. Society has adopted certain fixed laws by which such individuals may be disposed of; no member of society can undo the work.

It may be that Napoleon the Third deserves death. But into that question we do not now propose to enter. But if Signor Orsini or any other individual be morally justifiable in trying him before the tribunal of his own mind, sentencing him, and executing him, there is no reason why the same latitude should not be granted to other persons in other meridians. Thus, we have the strange spectacle of several Anti-slavery orators and presses that the crimes of Southern slaveholders are of a nature to justify, and that the world would be greatly benefited by their removal from the political arena. Such persons have the responsibility, which other persons might be justifiably assassinated. Just so, certain Southern Journals describe the Editors of the New York Tribune as monsters unfit to live. According to Monsieur Felix Pyat, these Southrons would but exercise a natural right in assassinating the Tribune Editors.

We leave to the American sympathizers with the European assassins the agreeable task of justifying these legitimate deductions from their principles.

THE LOUNGER.

THE ANNIVERSARY WEEK.

"OH! that I had the thrust of a crane, that I might taste it all the long way down!" sighed the Irishman's friend, who was describing to him a dose of apoplexy. And, oh! that I were all ear and eye and ubiquitous, sighs good Dr. Primrose in his turn, as he glances over the programme of this famous week. At the doors of restaurants he sees the lickerous gluttons of Anniversary Week come to six!" and as in the papers he reads the alluring advertisements of meetings and speeches without number, he only sighingly ejaculates, "Poor Lounger! —and but enough at that!

The Anniversary Week is the great safety-valve of our social, political, and moral system. The extra steam is let off in one huge shriek, which, for the rest of the year, is puffed and broken away through the columns of newspapers. If any body has a wrong to right, he righted. Poor Jack waits all May, and then bring it on. The compassionate heavens know what is coming, and store their cooling moisture against the time. And the people may fearlessly rage together, and the whole city behaves and acts like the scalding eloquent, but the elevated watering-pot judiciously sprinkles all, and every body and every thing are the more refreshed.

This year there has been an unusual variety and interest in the meetings, and a corresponding explosiveness of steam. The Cooper Institute has had a dreadful time of it, stopping about from one church to another, from one hall to another, with Mr. Cooper's name in front and his trustees at his train. To continue the Tract Society and Stewart's—I mean Appearance Lecture, and a bunch of Taylor's—has perplexed all the sagacity of the worthy clergyman. To prevent the large family uninvited from overflowing the tables of the Bible Society, or to carry their sour looks and sharp remarks when the Home Missionary meeting was holding forth on the resources and the Christian honour of the Doctor. The crowd was sadly pumped on Wednesday, and Mrs. P. took room for only two in her large pew, so that the good man was a limp and undecided spectacle for the time the meetings arrived when Mrs. P. allows the fresh neck-tie.

But he was on all the platforms, preaching down all the sins, including spectacles and kid gloves, and his beaming face dilating with the humor of Beecher, scowling with the fire of Secchey, sparkling with the clear touch of M'Clintock, wondering under the sting of Tyng, lighted with the brilliance of Gallaher, and—in short, he was everywhere, and heard, and applauded all.

"Ah!" said Jack Tar. "All? Yes—far of course he could not applaud, but only pity, as he hurried by Mission Hall, where other persons engaged in discussing the rights (as they are called) of persons, whose case was settled by the Supreme Court of the United States, and where other people were insisting that delicate woman ought to be allowed to vote!

"Forward creatures!" cried Mrs. P., as she towed her husband rapidly by the door, "what do you suppose they work for?"

"What for, indeed!" echoed the benign Doctor, inquiringly, remembering how wonderfully Mrs. P. carried all her points without taking any vote.

"Ah!" said this really good man, and tender Christian pastor, "why don't these people agitate, and spend their work profitably in listening to the learned Dr. ——, and his judicious Dr. ——? What is the use of these useless agitations?"

And so every body had his way and his say in the glorious Anniversary of meeting. There was sharp shooting in many parts of the field, but every in-ecclesiastical tattle was opened with prayer, and was mainly fought in the church. So there were no hard feeling, no bitter recrimination, no unchristian want of courtesy. Reverend brother deferred to reverend brother. Even the laity were kindled with the clerical spirit; and Dr. Primrose left town with refreshed Christian zeal, and a profounder respect for his fellow-beings.

ANOTHER!

THERE is something sickening in the first sight of a telegraphic bulletin in the first edition of an evening paper.—"Terrible Railroad Accident. Particulars later." Busy bodies are running to and fro, traveling every where! Whose death-doom have we heard now? It is like the full roar of distant cannon to those who know their best and dearest are in the battle.

The present case is simple enough. A bridge was left uncared for to that degree that a traveler, seeing it a week before, had declared it was "not safe"—mere cotton wood; and the weight of two trains crossing at the same time broke it down and whirled passengers and cars in fearful confusion.

Now, is it cruel to say that, if it can be proved to have been the business of any officer to attend to the condition of that bridge—if it can be satisfactorily shown that the bridge was a public, and that the officer had not known nor reported it—it is cruel to say that he ought to suffer a punishment as capital as he who fires a pistol into a crowd and kills a man? In this country, where our railroads are not fenced and where the risk of accident is so obvious, accidents are so much more possible than elsewhere—shall we have a man set up for life as a target, until somebody suffers for these dreadful slaughters?

Some catastrophes are inevitable. The consequences of the breaking of axles, the splitting of rails by frost, and many others can hardly be avoided. But the loss of life by such chances is inconsiderable every year; while the massacre by avoidable accidents is a great blot on the whole system itself, or parts with a friend at the ears, without a vague feeling—which he may even laugh—that it is a solemn parting. So is all parting, indeed; but that of a criminal on the scaffold and the sheriff is more solemn than that of a friend bidding good night after the Opera.

How much jugging and lobbying must there be before some man in the Legislature will propose a bill of the most stringent character in relation to railroad disasters—and what, after all, is the life of wife or child, will induce all other men in the Legislature to vote for it?

THE QUEEN!

A STORY is very apt to blossom out with the trees, that the Queen of England is coming over to see her Canadian possessions. It is in full flower this season, and we wish it might not wither fruit. Because, if she came to Canada, she could hardly decline a visit across the line. And if she visits little German allies upon the Rhine, she could not refuse a great American ally upon the Mississippi.

How curious and interesting the spectacle would be! If she were in York, would Mr. President Buchanan invite her to stay at the White House, or would she take rooms at the National Hotel? If she came to New York, would the Corporation present the freedom of the city in a snuff-box, and take her in a carriage to the Crystal Palace in a small steamer to Blackwell's Island? Would she receive us all in the Governor's room? Would the Mayor give her a dinner at the Metropolitan Hotel, or would Dr. Bethune make one of his capital after-dinner speeches? How about shopping? More than all, about calling? Who might call? Who might not? Of course Mrs Van Hoop might, for her husband belongs to one of the Princely Houses. He goes distinctly back to sixteen hundred and seventy, when old Daniel Van Hoop left Holland in a cooper as was found on the continent. Nor how about Mrs. McMaster, whose husband's fortune was a mason? Or how is the year of sixteen hundred and seventy old Sawney M'Masters was one of the council, and perhaps that doesn't count.

We should all like to see the Queen. The gallantry of the American people is prodigious. She would have a tremendous ovation. She is the sister, the laughter of Washington, the friend of mankind, and the Cause of Americans is dear to no one her in most polished and graceful manner. We should all cry, "Amen." It would be quite unprecedented in history. And what impressions and reflections would not the Queen and mother bear back with her to England!

COTTON RISING.

THE chief resistance to the Austrian rule in Italy is the silent, social protest of the aristocracy of Milan against the Viceroys. The old Austrian St. Germain, in Paris, "cut" Louis Philippe when he became King, and reserved the homage of their loyalty for Henry the Fifth, as the rightful heir in exile, and will never be King of France; but the haughtiest of the French nobility was less absolute and rigid than that of Lombardy.

Lately the Viceroy gave a ball at his palace, to which the Milanese gentry would not go in their very Tory-y, of course. It is not of the slightest consequence whether they do or not; but the anecdotes is that the Archduke Maximilian, instead of being sulky and shutting up his ball-rooms, invited "leaders and other philosophers," to Wall Street, and South Street, and Broad Street, and Front Street—merchants and other plebeians! But not content with this single flagrant enormity, he actually danced with—the daughter of a cotton merchant! Of course the few noble persons who were present were properly angry. They were logical. Upon. If plebeian traders, bankers, and such rubbish, are to be asked to the Vice-Imperial palace—if the representative of the sovereign is to dance with young cotton girls—they did quite right to ask themselves, "What is the use of being descended from bandits and murderers, from Viscontis and Sforzas? If people who have done nothing but secure fortunes hundred times as large as ours by an intelligent use of honest talents, and haven't a solitary town captured and sacked, or a wholesale massacre committed, by their ancestors, two or three, or even four, hundred years ago, to show for it—if such as these are to have rank and place, and dance with Austrian Archdukes, where are we?"

Exactly so: where are we? Where are we going to?

"Trust me, Clara Vere de Vere,
From you blood it does not run.
The gardener Adam and his wife
Smile when a lady's genesis is traced.
Howe'er it be, it seems to me
'Tis only noble to be good;
Free hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood."

WHO NEXT!

IT is a curious and interesting inquiry which possesses the minds of every human being studied through Wall Street—" Which of these well-dressed, respectable men, with their pleasant faces, to whom every body salutes, and walks with, unsuspiciously — which of all these is going to turn out to be the great scoundrel of the day?

It is a dirty question, but it is unavoidable. Fraud has become so common that we may well believe the public sense of morality has been dulled. The sophistication of trade is probably more than the most cynical satirist that ever lived could men had suspected. Men's characters, their honesty, and even their simplicity, have become things like great looking-houses, with an immense grand ice expression of strength, and without the slightest power to resist the smallest pressure. Now and great guardian beams falls occasionally, it is a matter of no attention whatever and nobody cares, and is convulsed with excitement. But when they tumble down all the time—when, in fact, there seems to be a total disintegration of the whole larger build high and strong houses, but run up little new huts that seem to be tumbling down—

That is the kind of commercial character which the City of New York is rapidly running up for itself. When a man of large dimensions and capacity betrays his trust and steals the money, nobody is aghast any more—nobody stops and sighs over the pain—for nobody expected any thing else. Yet beauty, grace, strength, purity, permanence, splendor—every thing that is noble in character and building — are, for all that, laid upon eternal foundations. Almost any man can tell you where there were great men to that in which the living men are mean; as the traveler would live futures. Yet we have in all our large commercial cities, and not care to be King in the most palaces of Caesar.

SHELLEY AND BYRON.

IN our last Weekly there was a notice of Trelawney's book upon the last days of Byron and Shelley, [see page 307] which, indeed, is a very interesting book, for three reasons: first, it speaks of Shelley; second, it speaks of Byron; and lastly, it treats of Trelawney, who married a Greek girl during the Greek revolution, thirty years ago, and had some adventures. Upon the two which Byron did not live to fight.

The book is pretty, and John Bullish, and flippant enough. It is the work of an Englishman without imagination, whose solid sense was profoundly affected by the splendid genius of Shelley's genius; but could naturally see in Byron only the reckless and dissolute dissenter from society. In fact, no book ever published about Byron shows him in a more contemptible light. His vanity, his egotism, his affectation, and his weakness are amply displayed by Mr. Trelawney; and it is amusing to know an humorist's idea of what we are reading of a poet who fascinated his own contemporaries more than any poet who ever lived. But Trelawney's account of Byron is to be according that, in the emotion it excites, you feel quite willing to forgive every thing except the author. That solitary death, in a desolate Greek village, upon the margin of a deadly marsh, is one of the solemn scenes of all literature. When Dr. Arnott the servant shoved Trelawney into the room in which lay Byron's deadened body a few days after, there any sent him out for a glass of water, and then, lifting the shroud, saw that both Byron's feet were doubled—with the left foot lying over the right—a man of bonne could not have done it. He would have expected it. Mr. Trelawney says that he was of no use to any one to know more fully, might be left sacred in the secrecy in which he had always hidden it.

But the chief interest of the book is the detail of Shelley's life in his last days. It is slightelderly; but, like every thing which is added to our knowledge of him, it shows the sweet and rare quality of the poet, and leaves a more vivid impression of the man of him he memory. The life of Shelley has never been adequately written. The best account is the egraphy of him, by Thomas Jefferson Hogg, which is to be completed in four volumes, have just been published in London. Mr. Hogg was a contemporary of Shelley, and was exiled with him from Oxford; and his name means a memory of the boy is the son of some English republican of the beginning of the century, who believed in Liberty, and named his son Thomas Jefferson. Mr. Trelawney's book would appear to be only a collection of materials; and, beyond that, rather an unsatisfactory work.

TAKE CARE!

THE city Government is really in danger of losing its reputation! If it does not take great care it will come to be considered tolerably honest! Municipality and swindling will not be thought synonymous terms! The nominations of Commissioners for the new City Hall are so threatening in their promise of good management and accomplishment that they almost remind us the appointments of Mr. Cooper as Street Inspector. But then are fairy tales which the nurse tells us are too good to be true; and a good city government had long been relegated to the realms of fancy. How delightful to think of Mayor Tieman or the engineering young Prince who was to arrive and break all the spells of the wicked enchanter! And what charming fairies the aldermen will make!

HONORS TO THE HONORABLE.

IT is always difficult to say to whom the credit of an original invention belongs. In the gormandism of a joint to be eaten in the earth, the noisiest, the best, or the ir? They have all part in it. Whilst, in fact, no one is more upset. So in politics it is the result of coincident thought. Many minds furnish something toward it. Finally it springs fully formed from one of them, which has the chief credit of it, as the earth on which the plants appear is called their mother.

Thus it is with the electric telegraph. The laws which ultimately led to this result were known by many persons, the various qualities of materials were no private knowledge; attempts, experiments, suggestions, were many and valuable, but at last Mr. S. F. B. Morse combined them in a striking success, and his name is forever justly associated with the great invention.

Now, just associations are this did even for a discoverer. It is more than the case of them ever get, to be sure, but it is not all they deserve. If great and successful generals are to be presented with estates—what was Lord Lonsdale did deny it, seeing that he may some day be himself a great and successful general?—why should not the great discoverers be honored with every sign of honor?

They order this matter better in France," said Mr. Yorick; "a child can tell you the name of the greatest of inventors, let us hasten to say it.

The Emperor has presented, this month, to concert with Austria, Belgium, the Netherlands, Piedmont, Russia, the Roman States, Sweden, Tuscany, and Turkey—which states use Morse's telegraphic system—to give Mr. Morse a "bonus" (plum in England) of a hundred thousand dollars.

"Faith, might Mr. Yorick say, it will send some of them to the poor-house."

But for those unfortunate frances is a sum to be profoundly respected. What benefactor of his kind would not willingly give up a fortune to get it? And the interesting question instantly arises, What percentage ought to be allowed in advance to those who hope to be benefactors?

THE NATIONAL ACADEMY.

WE have no suggestions to make but we forget that May is also the anniversary of Art—that in Tenth Street there may or may not be pictures hung on the walls, and what is the promise of Art for us in future.

Yes this year, as we have previously hinted, they will not be. Some more last year's pictures will, perhaps, are, generally, less favorably represented.

But in nineteen days there is much to be done. Hanging Iliads and Odysseys. Huntington can not always be painting Mercy's Dreams. This year, indeed, Mr. Huntington's studio was so crowded as to be much engaged upon his great picture for Mr. Wright—that which scientific gentlemen that he has merely sent a few works to secure his name a place in the catalogue. President Durand, too, paints his usual pictures. They are pastoral and pleasing—he sane quiet cattle under the same quiet trees as usual—he is an English poet—he sees the same quiet blue mountains, and quiet green meadows, and quiet little spire, and quiet summer sky, and he is as English poets always are. The beauty that Mr. Durand produces, sweet, soothing, peaceful.

Mr. Gray carries us beyond England to Italy, and asks us how we like Tintoretto and Titian. If we do not know, he seems to say, "I think you point good pictures now, or that somebody—Cousin, Turner, or somebody—is a great painter. But I know that the old fellows painted good things, and that they are still our masters. Then can let the new way of painting a fine picture. You have pigments and canvas, and you must combine them somehow. The principles of success in painting must be immutable, and I think the Venetians knew more distinctly what they were than any modern artists. So, by your leave, I will try to find out what they were, and if I can paint as Tintoretto painted, you may judge as you please."

This is undoubtedly the artistic speech made by Mr. Gray's pictures. The critics and artists "fire away" at them, and if it call paintings "old pictures" it is quite likely that Mr. Gray's pictures are abused. But if, sitting before them, any Longer shall find himself returning to the land of old pictures, finding and admiring gleaming canals, and resting in the airy and air and water of Venice the many which in fact they are, he will think the moments lost that he has passed with the works of their lover.

In Mr. Shields's portraits of this year, the chief difference from other years is in the frames. The works themselves appear to be of the usual variability. But if the gentleman at full length taking down the book from the shelves is really in a frame of old-fashioned pollium, why might we not have had another view of it in which it might appear to be using a mirror? Does a gentleman ever take down a book in that manner?

But whether Mr. Elliott puts a subject in one position or another, his own position as a portraitpainter is assured and conceded.

So is Mr. Huntington's. He exhibits this year fewer large pictures than in some previous years, but the same qualities of firmness, delicacy, and truth. Though each more shall, whether they are portraits or cabinet pictures, or studies of certain effects of light and color, or landscape.

HOMER REDIVIVUS

IT has long been known that Mr. Charles Dickens is one of the best actors in England, and his public speaking shows general political and moral and industrial questions is not surpassed in wit and brilliancy and effect by any English orator. He has, also, at various times during the last few years, read some of his smaller Christmas stories in public for the benefit of different charities. In these readings the same overflowing geniality which is the charm of his writing and speaking, entirely captivates his audience, so that there is nothing more delightful than an evening of these readings.

It is Homer rediviveus. It is another last minister. It is the return of the Troubadours—with the great literal difference in favor of—never the Wartburg, that since Homer sang his tale of Troy divine to listening and applauding Greeks, there has probably been nothing so delightful as Dickens reading his Carol and his Chimes.

He has hitherto read exclusively for charity to others, but he is now claiming that charity begins at home, by reading for himself. The brother of Albert Smith, who managed the lecture exhibition of the "Mont Blanc" by which Smith has made a fortune, is to manage the details of the readings; and there can be little doubt of an equally good result for the author.

And what preaching it will be all over England! The little stories of Dickens are quick with the highest human sense. No man has a keener insight into human character, no one has a more various experience of life, no one has a profounder and more generous sympathy with suffering and effort than he, and all these advantages, invaluable to a public teacher, are made available in his readings, which are already a part of the best literature of the world, as no other living man can hope to make them available.

What a preacher, then, is here! How can we well compute the amount of good that such an influence as this? It is not often that a man who can write well can either speak well, but when the best writer is also one of the best speakers and readers, his contemporaries enjoy something which those who come after him can always long for and regret. We do not know very much of Shakespeare's reading, for instance, to believe that it was not very remarkable. But had he possessed the genius of the actor corresponding to his power as a dramatist, what would not the men who sat in the little Globe theatre and saw Shakespeare play Hamlet and Macbeth give!

If any Lounger knows not what to do with his time and money this summer, let him imitate Lord Ashburton, "cross the Atlantic," as Punch says, and cross the ocean to hear Dickens read Dickens.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—I see what you said of Troye's picture of Washington. I have studied it, and I see it is not the picture. I wish I had not more people than; I wish you could see it. I wish to show a collection of the cancelled pictures is exhibited, and a collection as small that it would take little room. I wish the public picture large enough and accurate enough to leave a memorable impression of the man. It should be spacious enough to see mentorious exhibitors surround. The pictures are to be hung upon the walls, and not upon the floor. I write to tell you that what you said of them was correct.

"DEAR LOUNGER,—I am what you call a Tory-y of the old-fashioned sort. I believe in the divine right of kings, and in the divine right of the aristocracy, and in the divine right of the clergy, and in the divine right of the Church. I believe that it is the duty of every body to surprised by the failure of any body in any direction. The Lounger hopes, with all his heart, that those who are interested—and who is not?—in the success of the Holy Land will use the little time that remains to see the pictures.

"Yours, A TORY-Y."

"MR. BEN LOUNGER, who recently put his jaunting-car into rhyme, has made a proposal to change of health and sentiment by taking a gentleman traveling for his fresh air and country lungs. His letter, describing his delight, is too long to be entirely printed. He says, modestly:

"Politicians, and those in public employment generally write a lengthy letter to the papers, giving their reasons, and different views of Ease's promises to hurt them to any comparison between them and myself, seeing that they are in the habit of writing what they depend upon them, still I humbly follow their example.

"Yours, BEN LOUNGER."

Mr. Ben Louger, it seems, went out to walk in the woods and fields:

"The birds were every where. In the blooming cherry-tree, or the brawny-armed elm, they lisped out their notes; they were yellow-bird, and robin, and wren, in the glossy blackbird.

"Especially as would tree I saw the lower branches filled with little birds, and they were laughing all together, as children in a company among their mothers—(I so merrily!—the more they laughed the harder it was to see. If I were a boy, or a girl, I thought, he will of those would chirp out something so funny that even before they had got their laughing fully out they would be again, and after a while a Mrs. Robin Redbreast, sitting higher up, couldn't help it, but must add something, when each grew more and more so after they were merried.

"I found out what the birds were about as much my gruil ha! ha! but you can not imagine how happy I felt.

"Yours, BEN LOUNGER."

"As I rode back upon my home I felt that I had been a new man. Now the birds, the grass, the leaves, the flowers, had all a charm for me. But I, and out the grass, was changed.

"Your of your readers experience the languor of which I have complained. I commend to them to follow willingly my reference example, and see if they do not receive the same satisfaction?"

—ROSE BRIARS, with "limited respect," writes from Alabama:

"I have been reading Harper's Weekly since the first issue, and, with but few exceptions, every number contains some article prejudicial to womankind."

The Lounger grints the entire charge, because its enormity conflicts itself in the minds and memories of all other readers of the Weekly. What can Miss Rosa mean? It is, probably, a sly sarcasm upon our uniform courtesy to the sex. But would she have us depart from the courtesy we feel?

COMING THROUGH THE RYE.

THE ISLAND OF PERIM, RED SEA.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

ACCIDENT ON THE NEW YORK CENTRAL RAILROAD, NEAR UTICA, ON 11TH MAY, 1858.—(SEE NEXT PAGE.)

THE ISLAND OF PERIM.

The reader will find on the preceding page a sketch of the Island of Perim, which has lately become famous, and a map of the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb, of which it is the key.

The Island of Perim, a volcanic rock, six miles wide by nearly three broad, situate in 12° 38′ N. lat. and 41° 8′ E. long., is utterly destitute of vegetation and water. From the hour when some volcanic eruption forced it above the surface of the Red Sea to the present time it has never been the home of man, beast, bird, or plant. Once, in 1799, during the war which was waged in Egypt between the French and English, the latter sent a garrison to Perim as a measure of precaution, and threw up some works of fortification; but as soon as the seat of war was removed from that part of the world the British Government was glad to abandon Perim to the solitude to which its character destined it. Latterly, the French scheme for a Suez canal, and the danger which the British Empire in the East runs in consequence of the disaffection of the natives, have suggested the reoccupation of Perim, and, accordingly, on 14th February, of last year, the East India Company sent a detachment of sappers and miners to construct fortifications thereon. They have been hard at work ever since, and by this time it is to be presumed that the island is in a fair way of defense.

The value of the post is best understood by a glance at the map. There are two channels into the Red Sea—one on either side of the island. But the western channel, which is over ten miles broad, has the double inconvenience of being filled with rocky islets, and of being unfathomable by ordinary anchor-chains. A vessel in that channel can not anchor, whatever the weather may be. Accordingly ship-masters prefer the eastern strait, which is only about a mile wide. It is evident that guns mounted here would command the strait; no fleet could pass them. An efficient modern battery on Perim would completely seal the mouth of the Red Sea.

It does not seem to be certain in whom the dominion of Perim rests. Some say that it belongs to the Sultan; others to the Imaum of Muscat; others to the Sultan of Barbera; others to that tribe of marauders who are such a nuisance in Northeastern Africa—the Somal, or Samanlis. Practically, Perim now belongs to the British, and there seems little doubt but it will remain in their hands for the present.

THE CENTRAL RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

On the preceding page our artist has sketched the scene of the late accident on the Central Railroad, on the morning of the 11th inst. The broken bridge crossed the Sauqoit Creek, directly opposite the village of Yorkville, and about three and a half miles west of Utica. It was of wood, had a span of forty feet—engineers' measurement—resting on stone abutments; from the bridge to the surface of the water being a distance of eight feet, and the water beneath having a depth of four feet.

The Cincinnati express train, going East, at the not unusual rate of thirty-two miles per hour, and a way train, going West, at the rate of ten or twelve miles per hour—we quote the statements of the engineers before the Coroner—passed each other on the bridge. The engines, with their tenders, got off on each side, but as the baggage cars of the express, and the first freight car of the way train touched the bridge, the north side of the structure gave way. The express train, consisting of four passenger cars, was in an instant overwhelmed with destruction. The first car crossed the bridge but was completely wrecked; the second struck against the abutment in its front, and was upreared in such manner that the third shot under it, and the fourth under the third—thus dovetailing, so to speak, one into the other, and effectually destroying all. The great matter for wonder is, that a single passenger in these cars escaped with life. The freight cars of the way train also fell into the creek, one diagonally over the other; two others were drawn off the track and down the embankment at the side of the bridge, and the balance were thrown off the track. The only passenger car attached to this train was badly jarred, but, singularly enough, none of the passengers inside were injured.

The names of the killed are: A. Moore, of Rising Sun, Indiana; Daniel A. Brayton, of Phelps, Ontario County, New York; William H. Perkins, of Rochester; two young children of Abram Mack, of Cincinnati; an aged Irishman, name unknown, but supposed to be Fitzgerald; and a colored preacher, name uncertain. Among the wounded S. S. Horton, of Binghamton, had his throat cut from ear to ear, as completely as though it had been done with a knife. It is said he will recover. A Mrs. Broderick was completely scalped, her head being quite circled, as an Indian would do it with a knife. Several of the wounded had portions of the scalp torn off. Fifty-five persons in all were wounded more or less severely; several, it is feared, will not survive.

There are two theories of the accident: one, that a breaking of the axle of one of the now shattered cars threw the truck cross-wise, and the cars off the track—thus, of course, producing a shock which no bridge could resist; the other, that the weight of two trains was too much for the bridge. This, it is stated, was rebuilt about three years ago, and it is given in evidence that some of the principal timbers were rotten. These were of bastard elm—a species of wood very difficult to distinguish from common elm, but much inferior to that for bridging purposes. The engineers and conductors do not seem to be to blame, as they had no orders against two trains passing the bridge at once. Several residents of the neighborhood have deposed that they knew the bridge to be rotten—a knowledge which comes, unhappily, too late to be of use.

The verdict of the jury is to the effect that the accident occurred from the insecurity of the bridge. The jury "find that the deaths were caused by culpable neglect on the part of the Central Railroad Company in not causing the bridge to be properly examined."

LITERARY.

The history of Wyoming has been so frequently written, in one or another form, that we take up a new volume of it with hesitation. But no one will fail to be gratified with Dr. Peck's Wyoming, now published by Harper & Brothers. We indeed opened the volume with the idea that it could not contain any fresh or interesting material, and we have laid it down after very nearly finishing the entire work. The romance of the history of that delightful Valley is inexhaustible. Should we not rather say the history of its romance? for here is nothing but truth, soberly told, yet most thrilling in its interest.

Dr. Peck deserves, and will receive, the thanks of all lovers of American history for his well-accomplished work, and we have no doubt there are many hundred families in America—in New England, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the far West—who will find the book peculiarly valuable for its sketches of their own family history.

Giving first a general history of the Valley, the author proceeds with personal sketches of the early dwellers on the banks of the Susquehanna. It would be difficult to find in any veritable history a story so wild and so touching as that of Frances Slocum, which is here admirably related. She was stolen by Indians, when a mere child, and for sixty years her family mourned over her loss. Then she was found, an Indian Queen among the Miamis, and her old brothers and sisters went a long pilgrimage to visit her in her cabin, which she would never be persuaded to leave till they buried her by her Indian chief. They were made of stouter stuff than we, those gallant defenders of the most beautiful of valleys. To read their lives is like reading Tasso, only that the splendor with which the poet has invested the brave men of his imagination here surrounds the memory and overhangs the graves of white-headed farmers and stout country boys. The poetry of Wyoming remains to be written. Campbell's "Gertrude" is trash. The poet knew nothing of the Valley, nothing of its romance, or its reality surpassing romance. Such books as this—full of stirring tales, brilliant with the story of the bravest and best of men—such books will be read with devout interest; and hereafter the history of Forty Fort will be the material of a glorious epic.

Alison's History of Europe, from the fall of the first and great, to the accession of the present, Napoleon, Volume III., is published by Harper & Brothers. Its announcement is sufficient. Mr. Alison's indefatigable labors in condensing the history of our own times make it a pleasure to read his account of events within our recollection. The political history of a few years seems to be passing in review before us. Nothing escapes this diligent collector. The minutest incidents which have gone to form any, even the humblest, parts of public history are faithfully chronicled. In his descriptions of the revolutions, revolts, and insurrections in France it seems almost as if he had been an actor in them all—even as if he had fired every gun—so accurately does he relate their occurrences.

Many of the finest efforts of pulpit eloquence have resulted from the recent religious revival. The hearts of pastors have been warmed, and their lips have uttered God's truths with a greater force, more devotion, and more fervor than, perhaps, ever before. It was an excellent idea, therefore, to collect a volume of Revival Sermons, in the New York Pulpit, such as Sheldon & Blakeman have published. The book contains treasures. Here is one of Dr. M'Clintock's noble appeals to sinners to enter in at "the strait gate;" Dr. Williams's "War which knows no exempts, and gives no quarter;" Dr. Bethune, in his own winning style, telling of "Christ at the door;" and Dr. Alexander's grand description of "The Holy Flock." We heard the last sermon delivered to a crowded house, who listened as we have seldom seen people listen to a sermon; and after it was over the wish was generally expressed to print the sermon for preservation. Doubtless many others in this volume were received in the same manner.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on Monday, Mr. Seward presented a petition from the Mayors of New York, Brooklyn, and Jersey City, relative to wharves along the water lots, with a view to the more perfect drainage of these cities. A resolution of the Wisconsin Legislature, favoring the project of a ship canal around Niagara Falls, was presented by Mr. Doolittle. The Senate voted to pay the funeral expenses of Mr. Evans out of the contingent fund. The bill to repeal the fishing bounties then came up and was discussed at length, Mr. Fessenden, of Maine, making an elaborate argument against it. A number of gentlemen spoke, and without coming to a vote the subject was postponed till the next day.——In the House a variety of business was dispatched. The bill directing the Secretary of the Treasury to pay out of the fund heretofore received from Great Britain under the treaty of Ghent various sums to citizens of Virginia, Maryland, and South Carolina for the loss of slaves carried away in the war of 1812 coming up, it was opposed by Mr. Bliss, of Ohio, in some remarks which elicited a reply from Mr. Garnett, of Virginia. The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

On Tuesday the Congressional proceedings were of unusual interest, embracing the final vote on the Minnesota Bill in the House of Representatives, and a lively debate on Mr. Clingman's resolution to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. The Senate passed a bill for the adjustment of land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Arkansas, and further debated the bill to repeal the fishery bounties, Mr. Hale, of New Hampshire, speaking against it.——In the House, Mr. Burroughs, of New York, made a report in favor of granting lands in aid of constructing a ship canal around Niagara Falls. The House then took up the Minnesota Admission Bill, and, after some debate, passed it in the form in which it came from the Senate by a vote of 157 to 38. So Minnesota constitutes the thirty-second State of the Union. A highly interesting debate arose upon the resolution to abrogate the Clayton-Bulwer Treaty. Mr. Sickles, of New York, speaking in behalf of the Executive, reproved the House for its disposition to meddle with this matter, which he said it did not understand, as calculated to embarrass a negotiation now in progress with the English Government.

On Wednesday, in the Senate, a communication was received from the War Department on the subject of purchasing a site for a fort at the Golden Gate, near San Francisco. It has a ranch, or farm, and the proposed price is $200,000. Mr. Broderick said it was not worth over $7000. The subject was referred to the Military Committee. The fishing bounties were further discussed, and incidentally an alteration of the tariff. The event of the day was the swearing in of the Senators from the new State of Minnesota. Mr. Toombs presented the credentials of the Hon. H. H. Rice, and Mr. Crittenden those of General James Shields. Mr. Rice was the delegate from Minnesota when a Territory, and General Shields was a Senator from Illinois a few years ago. Mr. Harlan, of Iowa, presented charges of corruption against Mr. Rice from parties in Iowa, and opposed his being admitted to a seat in the Senate. The charges related to transactions in the sale of Government lands. After Mr. Rice was sworn in, he asked for a Committee of investigation, and Mr. Harlan moved that one be appointed. Mr. Rice said he would resign his seat if any thing inculpating him should be brought to light.——In the House very little was done. Mr. Smith, of Virginia, introduced a bill for the new Territory of Nevada. Land claims in New Mexico occupied the House for a time, when an adjournment took place for want of a quorum.

On Thursday, in the Senate, the Appropriation Bill was taken up and read. It contains thirty-seven pages. The Senate, after a session of seven hours, adjourned without having effected any thing practical.——In the House, a motion by Mr. Phillips, of Pennsylvania, to admit two members from Minnesota, Messrs. Kavanaugh and Phelps, excited a warm discussion. Objection was made to their being sworn by Mr. Sherman, of Ohio. After considerable debate, a proposition by Mr. Millson, of Virginia, to refer the case to the Committee on Elections, was adopted. Mr. Kunkel, of Maryland, made a report accusing R. B. Hackney, door-keeper of the House, of many gross offenses, and recommending his dismissal from office. The subject was postponed till Monday. A report was made from the Committee on Elections by Mr. Harris respecting the Ohio contested seat. Four members of the Committee are in favor of the sitting member Campbell, four for Vallandigham the contestant, and one in favor of declaring the seat vacant. The report was ordered to be printed. Mr. Clarke, of Missouri, reported against the request of Utah to be admitted as a State. Territorial business was discussed, but no bill passed, and the House adjourned.

Friday, being a private bill day, there was little business of importance transacted. In the Senate, a resolution was unanimously adopted asking information concerning the search or seizure of American vessels in the Gulf of Mexico, or adjacent seas, by foreign cruisers. Mr. Rice, of Minnesota, offered a resolution, which was adopted, for a Committee to investigate the charges against him presented by Mr. Harlan. The Vice-President filled vacancies in several Committees. The private calendar was resumed, and several bills were passed.——In the House, Territorial business was considered, after which several private bills were passed, and others laid aside for future action. The House then found itself without a quorum.

On Saturday, in the Senate, a memorial from the California Legislature, calling for Government interference in the case of one Juan Ensey, who was seized in Arizona by a band of armed Mexicans, and who is now held in Sonora, was presented and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. A joint resolution, having for effect the abolition of the so-called Stade dues levied by the government of Hanover on vessels navigating the River Elbe, was introduced. There appears to be a general movement among the maritime nations in favor of abolishing this restriction imposed upon commerce, and it must be successful. The remainder of the session was occupied with affairs of the District of Columbia.——In the House, Mr. Latham, who was arrested for non-appearance before the Willett's Point Investigation Committee, was brought to the bar; but his explanations regarding his absence proved satisfactory, and his discharge, after testifying before the Committee, was ordered. A bill to apportion the patronage of the Departments among the States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, was reported by the Select Committee having the subject in charge.

BRITISH CRUISERS AND AMERICAN SHIPS.

We are called upon again to protect our merchantmen from marauding cruisers which have revived the pretended right of search. Great Britain is the only nation which continues a practice as unworthy of her position and power as it is insulting to our national self-respect. Several vessels have recently been boarded and overhauled in Sagua la Grand, Cuba, by British naval officers. Of these the bark W. H. Chandler and brig Martha Gilchrist have arrived here, and their masters have made circumstantial reports of the cases.

The most flagrant case is that of the schooner Mobile, overhauled, only twenty-five miles from Key West, by her Britannic Majesty's war steamer Styx. Captain Howe, of the Mobile, was unable to understand the proceeding, and at first very naturally mistook the British steamer for a pirate. The hostile intentions of the aggressors were made known by a couple of rifle bullets, fired within hailing distance, and these were quickly followed by two others, which penetrated the rigging, but, fortunately, caused no further damage. A boat was then lowered from the steamer, and an officer, accompanied by six seamen, boarded the Mobile, and compelled Captain Howe to exhibit his papers. Even when he had discovered his error—for we charitably suppose that the English lieutenant mistook the Mobile for a slaver—he offered no apology for his conduct, but stated that he was acting under the orders of his Government. The fact that the British West India squadron has been largely augmented, confirms the supposition that the offending gun-boats have been putting in execution a preconcerted programme.

Congress has already noticed the matter, and our Government will, of course, demand explanation and reparation. In the mean time, the first measure will be to strengthen our fleet in the Gulf of Mexico, and instruct the officers in command to protect our merchantmen—be the consequences what they may—from the heavy hands of foreign men-of-war.

THE SOUTHERN COMMERCIAL CONVENTION.

This Convention met in Montgomery, Alabama, on the 10th inst. A. P. Calhoun, of South Carolina, was elected President. Five hundred delegates were present. The Convention has devoted itself almost exclusively to the discussion of L. W. Spratt's report in favor of reopening the Slave-trade. Messrs. Pryor and Preston, of Virginia, Messrs. Hilliard, Harper, and Hubbard, of Alabama, and Mr. Hunter, of Georgia, spoke against the report, and numerous gentlemen, including Mr. Yancy, of Alabama, and Mr. Spratt, the mover, spoke in its favor.

DIRECT FROM THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

Three men, direct from Camp Scott, arrived at Independence on the 8th inst. They report that the troops were in good health, but that provisions were scarce, with the exception of poor beef. General Johnston would not be able to move forward until a fresh supply of animals was received. The party met the Express Messenger from New Mexico at Green River, with the news that Captain Marcy would not be able to reach Camp Scott before June, in consequence of the great quantity of snow on the mountains. A man arrived at the Camp a few days before the party left, who reported that the Mormons were equipping companies to stop supplies and harass the troops. The party also met Colonel Hoffman, with two companies of cavalry and 150 wagons with supplies, 120 miles east of Laramie. On the 16th of April about 100 wagons were ready to leave Laramie as soon as Colonel Hoffman arrived. These trains would reach General Johnston early in May. The first ox-trains started this spring were met just beyond Big Blue, but, in consequence of the weather, were making slow progress. Some of the trains were waiting for better roads.

MOVEMENTS OF TRAINS AND TROOPS FOR UTAH.

Major-General Smith has issued elaborate orders relative to the movement of the trains and troops of the Utah forces. The trains are to be divided into divisions of 226 wagons each, and the troops will be organized into columns, each column constituting the escort of a division. A general supply train, and the first column, under command of Lieutenant-Colonel Andrews, are already organized, and ordered to march. The second column, under Lieutenant-Colonel Munroe, composing the escort of the first division of supplies, will march from Leavenworth on the 15th inst. The third column, under Colonel May, will march on the 20th. The fourth column, under Colonel Morrison, will march on the 25th. The fifth column, under Colonel Sumner, will march on the 30th. The sixth column, under Major Emory, will march on the 4th of June. These columns for the present constitute the first brigade of the Utah forces, under command of General Harney. Each column will be supplied with four months' provisions, which are to be replenished when passing Forts Kearney and Laramie.

THE LATEST FROM SALT LAKE CITY.

By way of California we have received news from Utah to the 6th of March. The course of Brigham Young is fully indorsed by the Mormons, who have held meetings in different parts of the Territory to denounce the General Government, and to declare their determination to resist. The Deseret News of March 3 announces the arrival of Colonel Thomas L. Kane, who reached Salt Lake City on the 25th of February, from New York via California. The News says, "The Colonel was as little fatigued as could have been expected from so rapidly passing in the winter over so long and toilsome a route."

MORMON DESIGNS.

The Alta California publishes a private letter, received in San Francisco from a priest high in authority at Salt Lake, who says: "Our plans are all matured and laid. If they enter these valleys, which will be most difficult, we purpose cacheing, i. e., burying our grain, for we have abundance of it, and then we'll make a Moscow of every thing that will burn. Burn up the grass, and every mortal thing that will burn, and leave behind us nothing but desolation, upon which it will be impossible for our enemies to subsist. We shall retreat to the dense cañons and places in the mountains, surrounded by natural barriers which render the interior impervious to all ingress, and which are alone accessible through narrow and almost impassable defiles, that can be successfully guarded by a few, to the exclusion of thousands. It is impossible to introduce a large army into this Territory. They can not bring sufficient food to last them more than one year, and if the grass is destroyed, how will their cattle subsist? We will also destroy all the timber, and every thing suitable for fuel, and when they come to the mountains and cañons for something to cook their scanty meals with, they will find Mormon mountaineers there, and perhaps a thousand and one red men to pick them off on the right hand and on the left. Enough on this subject."

WHIPPING THE DEVIL FROM THE EARTH.

Brigham Young, in a characteristic discourse delivered on the 7th of February, said: "Who cares for all the horses in the world? The devil says that he has claim on them, and he means to devote them to his use. I will see that all the horses, mules, gold, silver, clothing, and people belonging to this Church are devoted to the kingdom of Christ, God being my helper, and I will out-general the devil and baffle him in every turn and head him in every nook and corner, and he shall be turned hither and thither as the Lord wills. I am determined, in the name of Israel's God, to see the devil whipped from the earth, and out-generaled and fooled in all his schemes, and whirled about by this Church until he is glad to leave the earth and go to his own place, and then we will see whether or no the Lord God has all things that belong to him."

PERSONAL.

The Cleveland Plaindealer is informed that the President contemplates making a tour of the West during the recess of Congress.

Mr. Oscanyan, a Turk by birth, but an adopted citizen of the United States of more than twenty-one years' standing, has been appointed dragoman at Constantinople.

Senator Douglas visited this city last week and appeared at the Exchange, when he was introduced by Mr. Richard Schell to several of our prominent merchants.

His Excellency, General Augustus C. Dodge, United States Minister for Spain, with his lady and two children, arrived at Gibraltar in the afternoon of the 18th of April, in the French steamer Ville de Cadix, from Cadiz, and departed for Malaga in the same vessel on the following morning.

Sir Phillip Crampton, Surgeon-General of Ireland, and father of the late British Minister to Washington, was reported by last advices to be in a dying condition.

Duncan K. M'Rae, Esq., announces himself, at the earnest solicitation of many personal friends, an independent candidate for the Governorship of North Carolina. He has heretofore been a Democrat, but asserts his determination to be bound by no party ties.

Messrs. William Carey Jones and Richard T. Jacob, sons-in-law of Colonel Benton, have sent a card of thanks to the citizens of St. Louis, in acknowledgment of the honors paid to the remains of the deceased statesman on their arrival in St. Louis.

Señor de Briceno, Special Minister from Venezuela, having received his letter of recall, has taken leave of the President to return home the first opportunity. He is in Philadelphia, the guest of the Venezuelan Consul.

Among the new members of the American Association, elected at Baltimore, is the Austrian Consul-General, M. Loosey—a gentleman who has been instrumental in the introduction of many American inventions into Austria.

Governor Wise, on behalf of the Virginia Legislature, has presented a handsome sword to Lieutenant Robert B. Pegram, U.S.N., in compliment to his courageous conduct in repulsing attacks of pirates in the China Seas. Lieutenant P. is a native Virginian.

Lieutenant Maury has received the great gold medal of the Arts and Sciences, from the Archduke of Austria, bestowed by the Emperor in acknowledgment of his services to science.

It is reported in the London papers that an intimation has been sent to Sir Colin Campbell that a peerage is at his service, but he does not care to accept it. His desire is to be advanced to the highest grade in his profession—that of Field-Marshal—and this advancement he will shortly obtain. The pay and allowance of a Field-Marshal in India would be about £30,000 sterling a year.

Mr. Rarey, the American horse-tamer, in a letter to the London Times, denies that any one except his pupils knows his method of educating horses. He has authorized the Messrs. Tattersalls to pay any man a thousand guineas, if he will prove to them that he understands and can teach the Rarey system.

On Wednesday night last there was a large gathering, principally of Methodists, at Niblo's Saloon, to compliment the Rev. Robinson Scott with a dinner, previous to his return to Ireland with the $70,000 he has collected from our Northern States for the spread of Protestantism in his native land. Addresses were made by Dr. M'Clintock, "Kirwan," the Rev. H. W. Beecher, the Rev. Dr. Jenkins, and others. Mr. Scott's own farewell speech was warmly received.

Among the deaths recently reported in the English papers we find that of Admiral Carden, who commanded the Macedonia in 1812, when, after a stubborn resistance, which brought the ship to a hopeless wreck, she was compelled to surrender to the United States. Captain Carden, when he reached England, was tried by court-martial for the loss of his ship; but he was honorably acquitted, and his conduct was extolled "for his firm and most determined courage, coolness, and resolution in every instance throughout the action." The gallant defense he made of his ship was much praised in Parliament, and after his return the freedom of Gloucester, Worcester, and other cities was conferred on him. It is rather a singular circumstance, that Admiral Carden's father, Major Carden, of Templemore, died of wounds received in the first American war.

The Richmond Dispatch of the 5th says: "There was a 'marriage in high life,' in Warren County, N. C., yesterday—Mr. —— Green, son of General T. J. Green, late of Texas, to Miss —— Ellery, daughter of General G.'s lady by a former husband. The bride is an heiress, and her wealth is computed at eighteen hundred thousand dollars. They went as far as Petersburg, on their way to Europe, where they will probably spend the balance of the year."

EXTENSIVE RAILROAD FRAUD.

Mr. Henry Dwight, broker of Wall Street, and late in the employ of the Chicago, Alton, and St. Louis Railroad Company, has been arrested in this city on the charge of defrauding the Company, and also on the further charges of perjury and embezzlement. There are six charges against Mr. Dwight, on each of which warrants have been issued. The case is very complicated, and will probably undergo a long examination before the whole extent of the fraud is discovered. At present it promises to be another Schuyler case.

AN OLD WIFE IN SEARCH OF A YOUNG HUSBAND.

About six months since an elderly lady of property, living in Brooklyn, New York, who bought her fashionable wares at a celebrated dry-goods house in Broadway, New York, became enamored of a handsome young man who attends there. After many visits she decided to invite the young man to her magnificent house in the city of churches. She told him she wanted to see him on matters of the gravest importance. He blushed, and more out of curiosity than admiration he consented to visit her. The young man was dazzled at the magnificence of the house to which he had been invited, and was entirely lost in conjecturing for what purpose he had been brought thither. The lady, after giving her guest some vinous refreshments, proceeded to narrate the fact of her long observation of his respectable conduct, adding that she had inquired of his employers and found him to be a highly moral and worthy young man—worthy of a better situation in society. She confessed that she had become enamored of him, not, of course, for his physical beauty, but for his moral worth, and finally wound up by offering him her hand in marriage. The lady was on the shady side of five-and-forty, while the lover was not twenty-two summers old. The latter was in love, too, with a handsome young lady in the millinery department of the same establishment where he was employed. He flatly refused, notwithstanding that she had some $30,000 which she could place in his hands. After several interviews, the widow gradually won the young man to her views, and finally he consented to and did marry her. After the marriage she refused to make over her real estate to her husband, and this displeased him. About a week ago the "Benedict" thought he would take a trip to the country to see a few friends. His wife consented, but in a few days, he not returning, she concluded her bird had flown. She started in pursuit of him, and learned that the young lady had accompanied him in his flight. The old lady followed him to Chicago, and there consulted with an experienced detective, who put her, after some inquiries, on the track of the guilty pair, who had gone further West. The wife says she is now prepared to give him full control of all her property, if he will but return alone to his home.

PLEASANT FOR PASSENGERS ON THE MISSISSIPPI.

We published, some time ago, an account of the explosion of the boiler of the steamer Ocean Spray, on the Mississippi, by which many lives were lost. The United States Commissioner at St. Louis has been engaged in investigating the case, and some curious evidence has been elicited. One Mississippi captain, on his cross-examination, said, "We never used turpentine as a common article of fuel; it was only when there was some boat that started at the same hour, and ran in opposition to us, that we used it; the opposition was so warm at one time that we carried passengers for ten cents apiece, and afterward for nothing; I occasionally used to knock the head of the barrel out, dip the stick into it, carry it to the furnace and throw it into the fire, when we had no dipper convenient."

MISSING A CHICKEN AND KILLING A WOMAN.

At the last term of the Oyer and Terminer, in Steuben County, Lewis Peterson, of Hornellsville, was tried upon an indictment for manslaughter, in causing the death of Mrs. Burdick, of the same place, in September last. The facts of the case were these. Peterson, who lived with his father in the house next to Mrs. Burdick's, went out in the morning to shoot a chicken which had escaped from the coop and into Mrs. Burdick's lot. Mrs. Burdick was in the garden digging potatoes for breakfast, and when Peterson fired, his piece "kicked," when the muzzle was raised so that the ball was carried as high as the third rail of the fence, and struck Mrs. Burdick, who died from the effects of the wound. Testimony was produced on the point whether Peterson could have seen Mrs. Burdick from the point where he fired, and also evidence of previous ill feelings between the parties. Judge Smith of Rochester charged the jury that there must be a conviction for manslaughter in the fourth degree, even if they were satisfied the prisoner intended no harm, for the reason that the act of shooting at the chicken on the land of Mrs. Burdick was an unlawful act, and therefore under the statute the killing could not be regarded as excusable homicide. The jury rendered a verdict of manslaughter in the fourth degree, and Peterson was sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail thirty days.

THE DEAD ALIVE.

A German woman, supposed to be dead, was laid out at Baltimore on Thursday night. About six o'clock the following morning her husband heard some one calling from the room where her body lay, and on opening the door she called and asked why her child, which was crying in another room, was not quieted. He was greatly alarmed, and called for the inmates to assist him in removing all traces of the preparations made after the supposed death. She talked to those around her, and drank some wine, a cup of tea, and a glass of water. She had a vague idea of what was going on while they were laying her out, but had not the power to move or speak, and after returning to consciousness asked her husband what they had been doing with her after she fell asleep. She seemed much better than she had been for some days, but about eight o'clock she died. There were many, however, who would not believe that she had really expired, and the superstitious were in a high state of excitement. The affection was doubtless a kind of catalepsy, but the comatose condition was strange indeed, especially as the body presented all the indications peculiar to death.

CURIOUS DIVORCE CASE.

A novel divorce case was last week tried before the Supreme Court sitting at Salem, Massachusetts, of which the Observer gives the following account: "William Little, libelant, vs. Sarah M. Little. This was a libel for a decree of nullity of a supposed marriage between the parties. The allegations of the libel were that the parties were married in October, 1853, and have resided together but a very short time since. That the wife became furiously insane within three months after the marriage, and was removed to the hospital. She returned to her husband in the fall of 1854, and remained but a few days; and since October, 1854, she has not lived with him. It was also alleged that she had been in the hospital previous to the marriage, and that, in fact, she was insane at the time of the ceremony. This allegation was denied by the respondent, and was the great question in the case. The case was tried before the jury, and was probably the first case of the kind ever tried by a jury in the Commonwealth. It was closely contested, and excited considerable interest. The verdict was for the libelant, viz.: that the libelee was insane when the ceremony of marriage was performed."

TRANSFER OF THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA TO THE CROWN.

The House of Commons, on the 30th ult., were engaged in discussing the resolutions for altering the Government of India. A proposition to postpone the subject altogether for the present year was rejected by a large majority—447 to 57. The House then went into committee on the resolutions, and the first, which affirms the expediency of transferring the Government of India to the Crown, was carried without a division, amidst loud cheering. The chairman of the committee then reported progress, and the debate was adjourned to the 3d of May.

ADMISSION OF THE JEWS TO PARLIAMENT.

The House of Lords, in spite of the sentiment of the country and of the whole press of the United Kingdom, has again rejected the bill for the admission of the Jews to Parliament. It is believed that the Commons will now proceed in the matter by resolution, and, acting in defiance of the Lords, will admit the Jews at once. Lord Stratford de Redcliffe, late British Embassador at Constantinople, had made a very significant speech on the subject, declaring that his hands would have been greatly strengthened in the East if he could have pointed triumphantly to England, and shown that from her statute book the last rag of intolerance had been torn.

A NEW MINISTRY.

There are already rumors of the construction of a new British Cabinet, in which the names of Lord J. Russell, Lord Palmerston, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, and Mr. M. Gibson appear. The rumor, though it is said to be one that may be relied on, comes from opposition papers, and is only indorsed by them.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

The new machine for paying out the Atlantic telegraph has been completed, and experiments have demonstrated the perfect success of the enterprise. About the 20th of May final experiments will be made during a preliminary trip of the Niagara and Agamemnon to the deep waters of the Atlantic. On the 30th of April 1260 miles of cable were coiled on the Agamemnon, and 990 on the Niagara. The Directors have decided to order 100 miles more cable, so that there shall be on each ship a surplus of more than 500 miles, making altogether one thousand miles above the actual distance.

THE PRINCE OF WALES IN KILLARNEY.

A correspondent writing from Killarney on the 29th ult., says: "Alighting from his vehicle, the Prince of Wales, who seems passionately fond of walking, proceeded on foot for a mile or two, with gun in hand, firing from time to time at bird, leaf, or fissure in the rocks, in the exuberance of those animal spirits which belong to his time of life, and which, in his person, seem to be the accompaniment of a healthy, though not a robust physique. While thus engaged, a very fine young man was seen passing with the firm step and erect bearing of a soldier, but minus an arm. The Prince, struck with the appearance of the soldier—for such he was—hailed him, and, preserving his incognito, entered into conversation with him. 'How did you lose your arm?' inquired his Royal Highness. 'Fighting for my Queen and country,' proudly replied the gallant fellow, still in ignorance that it was the eldest son of that Queen who was addressing him. 'Well, now,' said the Prince, much moved by the answer, 'if you had the use of your arm, would you fight for the Queen again?' 'Be Gor, I would in the morning,' enthusiastically exclaimed our soldier, 'as many a man of my name did before.' 'You're a fine fellow,' replied his Royal Highness. 'What is your name?' 'My name is O'Sullivan, Sir.' 'A little refreshment will do you no harm,' replied the boy prince, handing him some silver."

RESTORATION OF SHAKSPEARE'S HOUSE.

The "Birth-place" Committee are putting the munificent gift of £2500 from Mr. John Shakspeare to good use, by proceeding with the proposed renovation and isolation of the house in which the immortal poet was born. The committee have entered into contracts for the restoration of a certain portion of the house to the state in which it was supposed to be when Shakspeare drew his first breath in it; and so far is the matter advanced that a portion of the work may be said now to be satisfactorily completed.

LORD MACAULAY AS A BEAU.

A correspondent writes: "You will scarcely credit the announcement, but I assure you, solemnly, it is the fact, that the noble author of the 'History of England'—the Lord Macaulay—has become a perfect Beau Brummel of late! What change has come over the spirit of his dream I can not tell, but his appearance has undergone a wonderful alteration for the better. It may be that he meditates matrimony, or some other stupendous change in his social position; or perhaps he has resolved, though rather late in life, to embark upon what novelists call the 'sea of pleasure,' and plunge into the vortex of fashion. The noble lord used to wear a very seedy, snuff-colored frock coat, a large greasy hat at the back of his head, and a faded black neckcloth a world too high for his short neck. He also made it an invariable practice to carry, or rather trail along the ground, a huge brown cotton umbrella, of a very gampish appearance. The noble lord is now 'got up' regardless of expense. He sports a smart frock-coat of light olive color, a blue cassimere waistcoat, with a long gold chain peeping over the collar; shiny boots, and a fancy cane, in lieu of the old cotton umbrella! Macaulay in shiny boots is almost incredible, but to see him strutting along Parliament Street, swinging his Malacca right and left, and looking as jolly as a two-year-old in a clover field, is something to talk of for a month. If to those substantial and ornamental improvements be added the usual attraction of clean face and hands, you will be able to realize the appearance of the great historian on his way to the House of Lords."

FRANCE.

REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES OF THE EMPIRE.

The French Budget has been made public. The revenue of the empire is derived from direct taxes amounting to £18,344,499, and indirect taxes to £43,270,320, besides other sources, not necessary to specify, £5,941,160; giving a total of £67,555,979, as the ordinary income of the State. If to this total we add the £3,320,000 due to the Sinking Fund, the result will be £70,875,979, by taking in the portions previously neglected. But to this must be made a further addition of £53,334 for extraordinary receipts, and we shall then have the grand total of revenue at £70,929,313. The expenditures give a total of £69,453,357; to which must be added £1,214,933 for extraordinary works, making the total expenditure £70,668,290. It has been stated that the total income was estimated at £70,929,313—consequently there will be a presumed balance on the right side, or a surplus of £261,023.

ANNUAL INCREASE OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

The increase of the national liabilities since the revolution of 1848 is represented by an increase in the amount of dividends paid equal to £5,520,000 yearly, of which £2,640,000 has arisen from debts contracted by the Revolutionary Government, and £2,880,000 by the Empire. The total amount of increased dividends has, however, been reduced by a sum of £720,000, through the conversion of the 5 per cents. into 4½. If we suppose the whole of this money to have been borrowed at 5 per cent., the successive governments of France will have received in the course of the last ten years £112,400,000 by way of loans over and above the annual revenue. It would consequently appear that France is adding to her National Debt at the average rate of £11,250,000 sterling every year.

THE CONFERENCE.

The Plenipotentiaries have had two meetings at the French Foreign office. The Moniteur thus officially describes their proceedings: "The Plenipotentiaries of Austria, France, Great Britain, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia, and Turkey, assembled in conference the day before yesterday at the Hotel of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in order to take cognizance of the final treaty signed at Constantinople on the 5th of December last, and to ratify the result of the labors of the commission appointed by Art. 30, of the Treaty of Paris for settling the frontiers of Russia and Turkey in Asia. The conference formerly acknowledged the receipt of the communication from the plenipotentiaries of the two powers."

REMUNERATION TO PROFESSOR MORSE.

The representatives of Austria, Belgium, Holland, Piedmont, Russia, the Papal States, Sweden, Tuscany, and Turkey have had a conference at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, in Paris, to take into consideration an application which had been made to the French Government by Professor Morse, of the United States, for an indemnity to be awarded him for the use of his invention relative to the transmission of dispatches by electric telegraph. The application having been favorably received by the French Government, the different powers above mentioned, who have all adopted the invention, were applied to, and readily agreed in the view taken by the French Government. The meeting was held in order to consider the matter, and fix on the manner in which Dr. Morse should be remunerated for an invention which has rendered such important services. From the result of the first conference, there is every reason to expect that an understanding favorable to the application will be come to.

DISOWNING AN INDIAN MAIDEN FOR AN HEIRESS.

The Paris correspondence of the London Globe sends the following piece of gossip: "I gave you the particulars some days ago of an attempt on the part of M. Alphonso M. to disown his former marriage in the Pacific Ocean with a young maiden of Wallis Island, to wed an heiress at Havre. The Ariadne of the distant isle has been summoned to show cause before the Paris Tribunal, why she had not put up banns at the mayor's office at Havre ere she took the rash step of a solemn and sacramental union with this volatile Alphonso, who now reverses the sad and tragic ballad of Monk Lewis, and avenges the infidelity of 'the fair Imogene.' A letter has been published from Monsignor C., Bishop of Enos, 'Vicar Apostolic of Central Oceania,' alleging the notorious fact of the marriage, blessed by Abbé Meriais, missionary at Wallis Island, and the Christian character of the fair Indian, who can read and write, and ranks higher in the civilized scale than thousands of European women. Ten to one French bureaucracy will ignore the contract as civilly informal, though religiously obligatory. The case of the late Paris banker, Pescatore, who got married at Seville, coram ecclesia, was so decided two years ago."

SPAIN.

BOMBAST AGAINST THE UNITED STATES.

Some time ago the official Gazette of Madrid published a telegraphic dispatch from the Duke de Rivas, Spanish Embassador in Paris, to the effect that the President of the United States was about to send a Message to Congress for the purpose of declaring war against Spain. A question was asked on the subject in the Cortes, and from the answer of the Minister of War it appears that the only foundation for M. de Rivas's telegram was a letter from New York in a Paris paper. Nevertheless the news, such as it was, caused great excitement in the Spanish capital, and the España, notwithstanding the explanation which has taken place, indulges in the following piece of bombast against the United States: "It would be forming a very erroneous idea of the condition of the American people, and ascribing to it a strength which it is far from possessing, to admit the possibility of so gigantic a struggle as that the United States would undertake on the day they would discharge a shotted gun against an European vessel. The social organization of the United States makes them an asylum for adventurers—not the fatherland of citizens; they have not that strength which results from unity. It would be impossible for them to launch into a maritime or continental war (!). The United States are more of a phantom than a giant; they will make a great noise, but not come to blows. If a rupture were to take place we should see how many good admirals and sailors they can count upon; and we should be edified as to the number, the valor, and skill of their sailors and soldiers. It is perfectly easy to understand the wishes and the impatience of a few hundred fillibusters, eager to rush upon Cuba, as a rich prey. But, apart from the fact that there is no reason to apprehend a landing on our coast, we are convinced that the United States government will think twice about it before involving itself in a war with Spain."

PASSAGE OF THE CONSPIRACY TO MURDER BILL IN THE TURIN LEGISLATURE.

The Conspiracy to Murder Bill has passed the Sardinian Chambers. The principal clause states that "Conspiracy against the lives of sovereigns and chiefs of foreign states is punished with imprisonment, which may be extended to ten years' hard labor when there have been preparatory acts; except in those cases in which the penal code fixes a heavier punishment, in consequence of there having been acts of execution constituting an attempt, the crime being then considered perpetrated."

INDIA.

CAPTURE OF JHANSI AND KOTAH.

Telegrams from Suez, bringing Bombay advices down to the 9th of April, have been received. The two brigades forming Sir H. Rose's force combined before Jhansi on the 27th of March. The rebels, about 12,000 strong, including 1500 Sepoys, retired to the fort, and an investment was made, and the siege commenced on March 28. On the 1st of April a very strong force, under Tantia Togee, a relation of the Nena, attempted to relieve Jhansi. Without abandoning the investment, Sir H. Rose attacked the relieving army, and gained a decided victory, taking 18 guns, several elephants, and all the camp equipages. On the 4th of April, after a struggle in which the British loss was severe, the town was stormed and taken; and, on the 6th April, the fort was occupied. The Ranee fled with a few attendants, but was hotly pursued by the cavalry. The enemy lost 3000 men in the battle of the 1st and in the assault of the fort.

News has also been received of the capture of the town and fortress of Kotah in Rajpootana. The rebels made a desperate attempt to take the palace of the Rajah of Kotah on March 25, by escalade, but were repulsed with great loss. On the 30th, General Roberts carried the position of the rebels by assault, and occupied the town of Kotah. The rebels fled, and a great slaughter occurred in the pursuit. All their guns, with the exception of two, have been taken.

MEETING BETWEEN THE BRITISH AND GHOORKA CHIEFS.

Correspondence, giving full particulars of Sir Colin Campbell's grand attack on Lucknow, has come to hand. The letters of Mr. Russell, special correspondent of the London Times, are by far the most graphic and spirited. The following extract from a letter dated "Camp of the Martinière, March 17," gives a picturesque description of a state meeting between Sir Colin Campbell and the famous Jung Bahadoor. Mr. Russell says: "A canopy was prepared in front of the Commander-in-Chief's mess tent. A guard of honor of Highlanders, their band and pipers, were drawn up near it, an escort of the 9th Lancers and a battery of field guns were in front and on the flanks, and all the ceremonials which could be devised under the circumstances were executed admirably well. Sir Colin, in full uniform, was punctual to the minute, and all his staff not on duty were also present en grande tenue. The chief, it was plain enough, would rather have been close to the Begum's Palace. His eye and his ear were by turns directed toward that place, whence, as the time wore on, could be heard the increasing rattle of musketry. Still the Jung came not. Minute after minute passed by very slowly. It was plain that his Highness the Maharajah, if he knew of the Commander-in-Chief's arrangements, did not possess the 'politeness of princes.' It was five o'clock, and the musketry was rolling out in great volleys. Sir Colin was walking up and down, like a man who had waited quite long enough for his wife to get on her bonnet, and was about 'to stand it no longer,' when a great buzz amidst the soldiers announced the arrival of Jung Bahadoor, 'the Lord of Battle,' and the band of the Highlanders and the thunder of the guns gave him a welcome. Inside the canopy were Sir Archdale Wilson, Colonel Hogg, Colonel Young, Colonel Sterling, Sir Hope Grant, Major Bruce, Major Norman, Dr. Tice, etc. As the Maharajah approached the Commander-in-Chief and his aids-de-camp on duty stepped out to meet him.

SPLENDOR OF THE MAHARAJAH'S ATTIRE.

"Who in London does not remember the Maharajah's diamonds and jeweled head-dress? In the light of the setting sun they even looked more brilliant than under the Opera chandelier. Indeed, he was so very brilliant, that for a time one only looked at the casque and at the scarlet coat, crisp with jewels and gold, and not at the man who wore them. With white-kid-gloved hand raised to his glittering crest, above which nodded a plume of bird of Paradise feathers, delicately loaded with emeralds and diamonds, Jung Bahadoor advanced toward Sir Colin Campbell, took the outstretched hand of our chief, and presented his two brothers, who, almost equally gaudy in attire and rich in decoration, accompanied him. Colonel M'Gregor, in his full uniform and orders, was on the right of the Maharajah, and after him came a long following of Generals in rich dresses, most of them with faces of the Calmuck type, broad in the shoulders, short-necked, and thin-legged. They seated themselves on chairs, any thing but easy for them, on the right of Sir Colin, whose Staff sat on his left, and then there was a long interchange of courteous speeches, but Sir Colin's mind seemed intent on the Begum's Palace, and his ears fixed on the rapid roll of the musketry. Still the speeches and conversation went on, the Maharajah's quick eye glancing furtively from Staff to Highlander, and back again.

A COUP DE THEATRE.

"In the midst of all this courtly ceremony a tall figure, covered with dust, broke through the crowd of spectators at the end of the line of Highlanders, and strode up toward the chief, who rose from his seat and advanced to meet him. It was strange enough, amidst all this glitter of gold lace and fine clothes, to see this apparition in hodden gray tunic, turbaned cap, and trunk boots, with long sword clanking on the ground, and head and face and garments covered with dust, walking stiffly up the aisle of men. 'I am desired by the Chief of the Staff, Sir, to tell you that we have taken the Begum's Palace, with little loss, and are now in possession of it and the adjoining buildings.' And with a few pleased words from Sir Colin, the Deputy Adjutant-General to the Chief of the Staff, Hope Johnstone, marched out of the crowd again and vanished. Jung Bahadoor perhaps imagined it was a well-executed coup de théâtre; but it was a hard reality—as hard almost as the skirl of the bagpipes, which were played by six as fine Highlanders as ever trod on heather, who walked twice in front of us to a heart-stirring pibroch, and then played a few morceaux, to the great delight of the Bahadoor. His Excellency finally mounted, with his brothers, on two elephants with gorgeous howdah cloths, and returned to his camp. It is said that when Maun Singh came in to Jung Bahadoor, and made some explanations respecting his Laodicean conduct, the latter said, 'Oh, don't make excuses. Had I not visited London, it is likely enough I should have been on the other side myself.' The Maharajah not only stipulated for the salute of guns, but asked for his six Ghoorka regiments attached to Franks's Division, for some English cavalry, and heavy guns to be attached to his forces."

STORMING OF THE BEGUM'S PALACE.

In another portion of his letter, Mr. Russell writes: "As we crossed the narrow ramp of earth leading to the gateway we could not but feel astonishment at the small loss by which we had gained such a position. Along the front of this wall, in addition to the guns, there were loopholes for at least 2000 muskets, and it seemed scarcely possible to effect an entrance at the point where one portion of the 93d and of the Sikhs had rushed through, with bayonets at the charge, on the astounded foe. The gateway to which the ramp led was protected by loopholed turrets at the sides, and by a considerable fire from the walls of the place. The breach made by our guns was on our left of the gateway, but when our troops entered it was only to find themselves in front of a similar wall, directly under the fire of the enemy, who were concealed from them at half-pistol shot. The only way of getting at the enemy was by a hole, miscalled a breach, and so narrow and low that not more than one man could enter at a time, and then only by bending his head. But to avail themselves even of this mode of entrance our men had to struggle through the outer breach or to clamber up the steep bank of the ditch, where, impeded by their numbers in the narrow space, they made for the inner breach; they were held in check under the enemy's fire till some of them forced their way in through the bricked-up windows, which led them into small dark rooms filled with Sepoys. Held by such troops as those who assaulted the place, the Begum's Palace would have been impregnable to infantry. Entering with difficulty through the suffocating breach rank with hot air, gunpowder, and dead bodies, I passed into the first of the court-yards in which the fight took place. It was filled with exulting Highlanders, still flushed with the heat of victory, and Sikhs burning gold and silver tissue and lace for the sake of the metals. General Lugard, seated in the midst of them, was busy giving orders to a group of officers, and first among those I came across was Leith Hay, leaning on the javelin of one of the Begum's state servants, and full of the incidents of the charge, in which he bore no small part; for he was, I believe, the second or third man who entered through the breach in the gateway. Brigadier Adrian Hope, an excellent and gallant officer, was also there, and he pointed out to me the narrow window through which he had leaped in upon the enemy. How a man could have escaped who entered in such a fashion is beyond my comprehension. But there were few slain outright, for the apparition of these brawny soldiers alone unnerved the hands of their enemies. Many fled at once, and were pursued and shot down in the court-yards without offering a resistance; others fired their muskets or matchlocks once, made a wild thrust with the bayonet, and ran also; others, surprised in holes and corners, fought with the ferocity of wild beasts. One officer of the 93d killed with his own hand eleven Sepoys, whom he shot with his revolver or sabred in the court-yard."

SIR COLIN'S PLAISANTERIE.

A correspondent of the Bengal Hurkaru, to disprove a rumor that the Commander-in-Chief is in a low and desponding state of mind, relates the following anecdotes of his excellency: "The other morning, on Sir Colin Campbell returning rather earlier than usual from his matutinal walk, he entered his tent, and to his surprise discovered the chief of the staff trying on a very handsome pair of slippers that had been worked for him (Sir Colin) by one of Scotland's bonnie lassies. His excellency did not exhibit the least annoyance, but merely observed, in his dry way, 'Sae ye think ye'll be stepping into my shoes, do ye; and are practicing a wee bit to see how they'll do, eh, Mansfield?' On the day Secunderabad was stormed Sir Colin, now foremost in the fight, and where the fire was hottest, came suddenly upon his favorite 93d, who were lying now under a long low wall, waiting for orders. The old veteran exclaimed aloud, at the top of his voice, 'Up Hielanders, and at 'em—Scotland expects that every man this day will do his duty!' When the Kaisarbagh was reported to have been taken, turning to General Mansfield, the gallant Scot cried out with honest pride, 'By ——, like Cæsar, I can now describe my victory in three words, Nunc fortunatus sum.' (The Chief of the Staff did not understand his excellency's joke.) 'Why, mon, dinna ye twig? Nunc fortunatus sum—I'm in Luck-now.'"

CHINA.

THE WESTERN POWERS IN COMMUNICATION WITH THE EMPEROR.

The intelligence from China is interesting and important. From the dispatches of the French Envoy, published in the Paris Moniteur, we learn that the four commissioners have succeeded in delivering their credentials to the provincial governor, Soutchou-Fou, who is in direct and easy relations with the Imperial Court at Pekin. The result is, that the real state of the case is brought under the notice of the Emperor. Mr. Oliphant and M. de Contades, who conveyed the notes of the four powers to Soutchou-Fou, although unguarded, experienced no incivility or violence. They passed along canals for two days, and at last reached the great city of Soutchou-Fou, which they describe as being about as large as London. The Governor's palace stands in the centre of the city, and to this spot they were conducted along streets crowded with spectators for a length of two miles. Much interest, and something of wonder, might be discerned on the faces of this mighty crowd, but there was perfect silence and orderly behavior. The Governor received the emissaries with salutes, placed them in seats of honor, and feasted them with Chinese delicacies. The next day he returned their visit. In due course they took their leave, and departed on their return to Shanghai, having been completely successful as to the object of their mission.

LIFE IN BOSTON.

BOSTON, MASS., }
May, 1858. }

[It has been suggested to me, Dear Editor, that the mere addition to the above of the name of the hotel at which I am stopping would operate as a receipt in full of my bill; but out of consideration for you, I suppress it. It is a very fair hotel; but, as I pay for my board, I will take the liberty of saying that my chamber-maid is dirty, and the ice-creams vapid.]

When we arrived here, some days since, the Captain, who commands our party in chief, called on our Uncle Uriah, and apprised him of our advent. Uriah is in the China trade. Years ago, Uncle Uriah presented mother with a real China shawl. When my youngest sister was born, we wanted to call her after our good uncle; father said that, as my second sister was called Willelmina after Uncle Willium, and my third Georgina after Uncle George, we ought to call this one after Uncle Uriah; but it was found impossible, and she was baptized Dorothy. Whether this annoyed Uncle Uriah or no I can not say; but he didn't even ask us to dinner. The Captain asked him what there was to see in Boston?

"To see?" said Uncle; "why, there's the Common, and Bunker Hill Monument, and State Street. Lord bless me, there isn't a city in the United States to well worth seeing as Boston!"

"No doubt," growled the Captain, who, being a Southerner, is not overwhelmed by affection for the Bostonians; "and pray, Sir, is there any thing else?"

"Any thing else? Why, what more would you have? Isn't there State Street? Where would you ask for any thing finer?"

"True, true."

"Then there's Bunker Hill Monument. A splendid work of art, Sir; nothing like it in Europe."

"Certainly not."

"And there's the Common. Take the Common as it stands, with the fountain, and the elm, and the historical associations—and I defy the world to produce its equal."

The Captain declares that as Uncle Uriah said this he rose from his desk, waved his handkerchief as though it had been the national flag, and looked as though he would challenge any body who differed from him.

"Well, now," said the Captain, "as to theatres?"

"The Boston Theatre, Sir, under the management of Monsieur Barry, a French emigré of the highest family, has no parallel in the world. And the Museum! Have you seen the Museum?"

The Captain confessed that having been but a few hours in the city, he had not yet had that satisfaction.

"Ah! I thought not. You'd better go," replied my Uncle, as much as to say that, whatever the Captain's experiences in his had been, there was a shock in preparation for him such as his wildest dreams had never anticipated.

"And public buildings?" urged the relentless Captain.

"Well, Sir, all I can say is, that the man who can gaze on the State House, and the Court House, not to speak of the Tremont and Revere, without feelings of the liveliest emotion, must be a creature of such organization—such organization, Sir, that Uriah Pet don't want to make his acquaintance." And Uncle Uriah bowed the Captain out of his office.

I thought we would follow the example of the prudent boy who lays aside the plums in his pudding and applies himself severely to the dough while the edge of his appetite lasts. We undertook Washington Street and the Common as our first day's work.

Washington Street is the Broadway of Boston. At the proper hour it is filled with showy people all the way from State Street to the Common. The hats are very bright, and the hoops, I think, are larger than those in use in New York. The Captain (he is a shocking creature, with the most promiscuous taste) declares, in his coarse way, that "the Boston ankle is a better article than you find in New York." For the gaiters I can answer; they are faultless. We met three pretty girls between State Street and the Common; but Erastus declares that one was a New Yorker and another a freshly-imported English girl. But this as it may, the belles we met were generally ladylike, gentle-looking little things; they did not look you out of countenance as your Broadway belles do, and they walked as though the set of their hoops was not the only thing they were thinking of. With the men, I am bound to say, we did not fall in love. They looked very mild indeed. The Captain says that young Bostonians are not allowed a latch-key till they are twenty-five; what he means by this I don't know, but I'm sure, if it be any thing illnatured, that it should not be relied on. The only really handsome and well-dressed man we met labished dreadfully when Maria looked at him, and felt so sucking his cane by way of relief.

The Common is a wild expanse of ground—much larger and more airy than any place you have in New York. They say that once upon a time it was a famous place of meeting for lovers: now, I would as soon think of meeting my lover on a church-steeple as there. For children, however, it is a delightful place; and when I think of the agonies the poor little things endure, pent up in your wretched steaming city, during the hot months of summer, and of the dangers of your parks and squares, infested as they are by the vicious class of people, I confess I envied the Bostonian mothers their advantages. Well, we saw the fountain, and we saw the elm—of the latter we had a front and a back view, which I hope you will appreciate as much as we did; we saw the people likewise.

Governor ——, whom we knew at Washington, made us acquainted with several great people. I noticed that the greater they were—some of them alluded to the President as a paltry official—the more exclusively-local were their instincts. They seemed to consider New York and Philadelphia a kind of suburbs of Boston. This last was the centre of the earth.

"Have you met the poet ——?" inquired a very great man indeed.

"No," said I; "but I should much like to meet him."

He asked us very kindly to accompany him to a house that evening where the great poet had promised to call.

We gladly accepted the invitation. The poet was there, in the flesh. People hung round him breathless. He was a quiet, middle-aged gentleman, dressed inoffensively, with a thoughtful eye, and generally a placid expression. The conversation was general when we entered.

"Hush!" said my Boston friend, after a few moments' conversation, "he is going to speak."

"For my part," said the poet, and we fairly hung on his lips in the ardor of expectation, "I think boiled mutton with caper sauce a dish for a king."

A buzz of applause followed the sentence. "What a practical man for a poet!" "How tersely he expresses himself!" "What excellent taste he has!" "Boiled mutton forever!" And a dozen wealthy men pressed round the poet with offers of mutton and caper sauce.

"Have you ever written any thing on mutton, Mr. ——?" inquired a young lady who I am told is the reigning belle of Boston.

"What nonsense, Stella," interposed her mother.

"Why, mamma, hasn't Dr. Watts written lovely poetry about lamb, and as Mr. —— prefers mutton—"

"Miss ——," interrupted our entertainer, addressing himself loudly and sternly to me, so as to attract the general attention of the company, "have you noticed the clipper?"

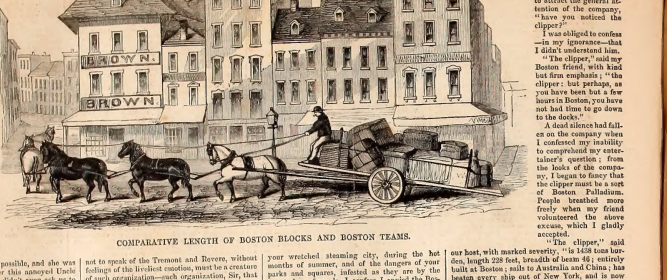
I was obliged to confess—in my ignorance—that I didn't understand him.

"The clipper," said my Boston friend, with kind him firm emphasis; "the clipper: but perhaps, as you have been but a few hours in Boston, you have not had time to go down to the docks."

A dead silence had fallen on the company when I confessed my inability to comprehend my entertainer's question; from the looks of the company, I began to fancy that the clipper must be a sort of Boston Palladium. People breathed more freely when my friend volunteered the above excuse, which I gladly accepted.

"The clipper," said our host, with marked severity, "is 1458 tons burden, length 228 feet, breadth of beam 42; constructed with a view to Australia and China; has beaten every ship out of New York, and is now going to run against an Aberdeen clipper for ten thousand dollars. You had best see her."

I said I would without delay. My docility pleased my entertainer, and the entire company began to regard me as a person not willfully malevolent, but accidentally ignorant and capable of instruction.



"Steam," observed the poet, and there was a catching of breaths when his really fine voice was heard, "is one of the greatest inventions of the present age."

Again the room was filled with a murmur of applause, and more than one person turned to me and asked me if we had any conversationalists in our part of the country who could compare with Mr. ——?

When we returned to the hotel I found Erastus in a bad temper. He was furious, he said, because "the liquor was so bad; New York poison was vile enough; but since the original enactment of the liquor law in Massachusetts, good liquor was not to be had at Boston at any price." His sister and I congratulated him on his misfortune, and recommended toast and water.

"June," said he, fiercely, "I have been collecting statistics on the subject. I find that during the period when the sale of liquor was contraband in Boston, the number of deaths traceable, more or less directly, to drunkenness was less than it ever was before or since; and even now, since they have fallen into the habit of adulterating their liquors, the mortality must be tremendous. Why can not they do as they do in France, and have all liquid regularly tested? In New York," he added, "people expect to be poisoned if they drink in barrooms; but why should it be so here? I wish they would make me mayor for a short while?"

We have seen all that remained to be seen in this city. We visited Bunker Hill Monument, a very creditable affair; also the State House, a curious old place—which, by-the-way, had the British flag flying when we saw it. The Captain, whose father fought in '12, was furious at seeing the hostile fog afloat in the centre of an American city: but it seems that the Bostonians always fly the Union-Jack when they discover a countryman coming up the Bay. They make the most of their advantages.

We have also seen the inside of several private homes. On the whole, I think the Bostonians are more hospitable than the New Yorkers, or any other Northern people. They give excellent dinners, and have good cooks; and, to a certain set, the ladies are all well-bred, and can talk on something else besides fashions and servants. Some of the old families preserve a dignified stiffness, which reminds one of the manners of the people of the Faubourg St. Germain.

Boston, moreover, is, in the Captain's opinion, the best governed city in the United States. They have a great old-fashioned way, he says, of carrying out their laws and punishing criminals rigorously. He knows a deal to people who have come to other cities in the United States; but it has its advantages. You seldom hear of murders, or street fears, or even burglaries. Then, the police do their duty, and the firemen do not set fire to buildings for the purpose of robbery. In short, the Captain assures me, such enormities as occur daily in New York would lead at once to the organization of a Vigilance Committee. If they would only get rid of their prejudice against the Smith, says the Captain, who never forgets his profession, he would as soon strike hands with the Bostonians as with any people he has seen in the country.

JERROLDIANA.

"Wit," said Douglas Jerrold, "bears an extra value when rung down immediately it is wanted. Men pay unwisely who require credit." It is probable that he never had to "pay money" for his brightest and keenest flashes were also the suddenest—so rain is superficial for the moment.

Thus, at a social club to which Jerrold belonged, the subject turned one evening upon music. The discussion was animated, and a question of taste was cited as an exquisite composition. "That song," exclaimed an enthusiastic member, "always carries me away when I hear it."

Jerrold—Looking eagerly round the table.) Can any lady whistle it?

In No. 29 of the first volume of Harper's Weekly, we gave a portrait and biographical sketch of Douglas Jerrold. Here are gathered some of those sayings which in times past on the London dinner-table on a tray, and made the name of Jerrold a terror to stupidity, and a synonym for Wit.

He had a peculiar style of delivering. What a lesson is in this paraphrase of our Lord's command, "He go after a serpent, and he unmakes a devil."

"Mostly without dinners in this world. She is saved without edge or point—very well for shoe, but of no real use to be carved."

"Speaking your mind," he says, "is an extravagance that has ruined many a man."

"Reputation is he tendency what real truths is to music."

"The bottle is the devil's crucible, and melts all."

"Character flirt. Yes, it has wings; and, of course, the lighter it is, the quicker it goes."

"Interest is a mortgage dodged. Just come up, and the sooner it goes out the better."

Jerrold said, speaking of a young gentleman who had shared the danger of peril before he could hold a razor—

"Nowadays men think they're frogs before they're tadpoles."

He said of New Zealanders—

"Very convenient people: we only kill our enemies—they eat 'em. You must come to the bay." Jerrold made no learning in the end how Zealanders are brought to relish 'em.

It must have been a liberal descendant of Dives into whose mouth he put this speech about a name:

"I don't like the name of Lazarus for a servant's parrot, discussing the usual topic preliminary to a christening. 'If I say, and doesn't sound genteel—not at all appropriate."

Describing the sordid avarice of a certain Hebrew old-clothesman, he said—

"The only difference between Moses — and Judas Iscariot is, that Moses would have sold our saviour for more money."

Of outward signs:

"The names of houses are for the world outside. When folks read 'Rose Cottage' on the wall, they seldom think of the lives that such roses include."

And of a choice of ruin:

"To be ruined your own way is some comfort. Where we are ruined in our own way, so it is a triumph over the villainy of the world to be ruined after one's own pattern, however."

He did not spare the ladies; thinking that there was yet a little balance due in man's account with woman:

"Look here; you must allow that woman ought, as soon as in her list, to make this world quite a paradise, finding that she had as the original author. You talk to philosophers, and when all is said and done about what we owe to woman, you must allow that we are the everlasting balance against her. There's that little matter of the apple still to be settled for."

His theory of the Fall was, that "Eve ate the apple, that she might dress." He said, "In marriage, as in battle, it is permitted to the weaker to advantage of the enemy;" and as a pendant to the proverb, "Every man has his thorn," said, "Yes: never find a woman without pins and needles." Of a celebrated actress, who, in her declining days, bought charms of carraine and pearl-powder, he said, "Egad! she should have a loop about her, with a notice upon it, 'Beware of the paint.'"

Here follow some more of his ideas of women:

"Virtue's a beautiful thing in women, when they don't go about, like a child with a dress, making all sorts of noises with it. There are some women who think virtue wrongous them as elaws were given to cats—to do nothing but scratch with."

"What woman would do if they could not cry, nobody knows. They get round lady enough as it is, but if they could not cry when they liked, how they would be put upon—what poor, defenceless creatures they would be!"

"Nature has been very kind to them. Next to the riskiness there is nothing in the world armed like a woman. And she knows it."

"Out of which follows this advice to married ladies:

"Cultivate your nerves. You can't put them too much. Something will always be happening in the house, and, unless your husband be worse than a stone, every new trifle will be a new pain to you, and a new claim upon you. There are some domestic wounds only to be healed by the powder."

"Never own a woman is right: do it once, and on the next occasion of it, she'll be always wrong for the rest of her life."

"When some women get talking, they club all their husbands' faults together; just as children club their cakes and apples, to make a common feast for the whole set."

"Is it not wonderful that, down to the present time, women have had no champion? Where is their Goliath's iron strength? They have only to be of one accord, and no name banded, poor as the greatest rogues have been unfortunate from the earth—safe like an old multiplication sum from a whipping-boy. And this truth is allowed to be profound, that, like a well sunk to the antipodes, we learn to afford a look into Eve—but then what would turn so giddy at the very brink—or, by some accident, it is one of the very first truth-look she has many that Hebrew has not yet discovered."

He says of an honest Benedict:

"He lived in a glass house, straightforward fashion: and as he was never lucidity tender to her before company, found the greater reason to believe that he was neither savage nor silent to her when alone. For some married folk keep their love for home for the world, for the eyes of the world; thinking it too fine and too precious to wear every day at their fireside."

Of homely beauty:

"Pity would never have been beautiful; born in sorrow, and the child of the sad sister—they should not have passed for nothing handsome; but she had in her countenance that sign of plainness by the which more than any beauty Heaven has yet fashioned. Her sweet, meek, little face was the sunshine reflected from the kitchen to her eyes, glittering for a moment there beyond all words of discretion. And from cottage-windows it is made to meet the hardest winds—rent, poverty—in the iron book of daily life; and the early touching had given to her face its best expression—that which the Holy Family mirror had anticipated time."

What a fine thought is this, on the mind of childhood:

"I met the mind of childhood the tenderest, holiest thing this side paradise. It is the one unselfishness of the gentleness, with love—yes, with a heart-worship of the first pure object—the mother. Is anything more to be preached? A creature unlocked by the talent of the world—innocent as the day it was born—and all for love pleasures. A being fresh from the source of light, with something of the reflection upon it. Oh, if the book be this, how holy the duty to see that, in its created form, it shall not be soiled! Let the world be outside at the temple, but only uncertain thing should enter it."

And this, on a command reversed:

"And God said, Let there be darkness in our image."

"What a fine creature is man, so long as he always has his eyes open! Shut his eyes, and he is the first thing but what shall be some way worthy of his Maker. To do is to make the world a pleasant place, and to have every body happy about us. 'And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness.' but it is sad—it is melancholy work, when man says, 'Let us make Man in our images.'"

What a trenchant sarcasm it was, when he said of a fawning fellow, whom he calls a posture-master, "He has proved what was the ancient saying, never his other truckle'd, he began to creep—and once was our curtain."

Sadly of a thin paragraph on the slippery path of life:

"How few there are who, starting in youth, animated by great motives, do not at thirty seem to be hastening to a second fall!" What sage-purposes did they wear—and what happened? Why, a party of five gentlemen in which have they thought to serve for—and what leaks into the morning-room!"

And what a world of cynic wisdom is in this little fancy:

"There are hearts all the better for keeping; they become mellower, and more worth a woman's acceptance than when they were young. Like certain pears, which as children gather green fruit—to the discomfort of those who obtain them."

Speaking of an Anglo-French alliance, he said, "The best thing I know between France and England is—the Channel." Of Australia, he said, "Here we kind, that just tickle her with a box and the laughs out of the Land of the Lie." Of a pretty bird, and his charming wings: 'would be quite a bird of paradise if it didn't carry such a terrible bill." Of a fat, wealthy gentleman, "The gold would break the Bank of England if she put her hand upon it." Of a scoundrel, "He would pocket a knife upon his father's tombstone to kill his mother."

Jerrold had a favorite dog that followed him every where. One day, in the country, a lady who was passing turned round, and, waiting, said, "Come, you little beast!" whereupon Jerrold, addressing the lady, replied, "Oh, madam! I wonder what he thinks when we call mankind!"

"Whatever duty-abstract philosophers may say to the contrary, Jerrold said, the first duty is the beautiful handmaid of life, casting flowers and odoriferous herbs on the path of those who, crushed and bleeding, carry up their mean as they snuff the odor, and walk half an inch lighter for the weight of a sweetness."

"Work for ready money. Take to bilk upon posterity: in the first place, you are sure of your commodity's being paid; and in the next, if it be duly lessened, the next may be laid out on some piece of remote or marble of all the slightest value in the slightest."

A very popular medical gentleman called on Jerrold one day. When the visitor was about to leave, Jerrold, looking from his library window, espied his friend's carriage, attended by servants in flaming liveries.

Jemmies. "What, doctor, I see your livery is meates turned up with scarlet fever?"

Jerrold and Laman Blanchard were strolling together about London, discussing passionately a plan for joining Byron in Greece. Jerrold, biting the story many years after, said, "But a shower of rain came on, and washed all the Greece out of Blanchard."

A certain sharp attorney was said to be in bad circumstances. A friend of the unfortunate lawyer met Jerrold, and said, "Have you heard about poor B——? His business is going to the devil."

Jerrold—"Well, it is right; then he's sure to get it back again."

"Call her a kind man," said an actor, speaking of an absent acquaintance; "a man who is sorry from his family, and never sends them a farthing? Call that kindness?"

"Yes, unremitting kindness," Jerrold replied.

THE FOUR-FOLD DREAM.

If there be no city called Hippesford among the northwestern towns of England, let it be there, whither I went years ago to see a friend who was hung. The name under which he suffered was supposed to be a feigned one; the crime which he expiated was that of murder; the victim of his master and his benefactor as he slept, for the taking of a sum of money which, in all probability, he might have had for the asking. One of those atrocities to give a reason for which baffles the ordinest of human minds. The fact remains that Mavarani was that of insanity: there being no doubt whatever that he was having committed the deed; but this plea was, in my opinion, very properly set aside. His advocate happened to be an intimate friend of mine; and it was through the interest—morbid and reprehensible I am well aware—which he had inspired me in the most unhappy criminal that I found myself among that crowd in front of Hippesford jail. I heard somebody going on to say that a little more fuss for the occasion.

"Your cruel-hearted ruffian, if you dare to mock the poor wretch like that again," cried a drop, low voice, "I'll save Mr. Calcraft some trouble in your case."

The speaker was a fire, powerfully-built sailor, wearing by his head a knot above the throat, and under his flashing eyes and threatening town, the fellow who had provoked his wrath subsided at once into submission, and presently sank into silence. Having achieved this end, he made no further observation to me, but he looks intently fixed upon the ghastly preparations above us. He alone, amidst the hum and noise of the crowd, maintained an absolute silence, and never took his eyes upon the scaffold above, as though he would thoroughly comprehend all in it: the extreme severity of his face was remarkable even among those thousand eager and expectant countenances. Not caring to know the dreadful sight myself, I watched that face when the death-bell began to toll. Then I saw every muscle in it quiver, as if I should see reflected in it whatever was happening. It was burning and quivering with excitement when the bell ceased, and remained so until by three or four persons into view. Immediately after he had caught this fixed expression, and established as completely as though a certain hid been drawn over some picture; and, as the sailor cast his looks upon the ground, I heard him mutter in a solemn whisper, his thanks to Heaven.

As for me, I was glad to escape from hanging together by the reinless human tide, I said to him, secure of sympathy, "This is a sad night, my friend, is it not?"

"Yes, Sir," said he, "a terrible night, indeed; but I might have been worse."

"How so?" said I.

"Well, it's a long story," he replied, "but if you like to come in to it, and to take a cup of tea with me (of which I feel the need) at my lodgings, I'll tell you something about it. It will be a relief to me, I feel, to tell it even to a stranger."

So we two went up into a little room overlooking the main street, which had been let (as had been agreed upon when he took the apartment) throughout that session to a party of five gentlemen, and a lady (!), who had only just evacuated it. And there he told me this story:

"You must know, Sir, that I am a little shoe, at first, for you throng his fairly dazzled and dumbfounded. I am quite a stranger to parts of this sort, thank God; nor have I ever seen so great a crowd before. I live upon the northeast coast, where the fish are not so many as in these parts, and my own employment is a particularly solitary one: I am a light-house keeper. I sometimes spend a fortnight without seeing any other face than that of my mate—either throughout my own watch above deck, and on that of the seagull, and of the baffled vessels which beats forever against our rock. Even my holiday time is passed among people who seem almost as lonely in sea as I do. My friends dwell at a considerable distance from my town, and when I attend from me, only they can see every night our lantern burning steadily out to sea, which my mother and sister say is a good comfort to them when I am far from home. It is lonesome, you see, for them to know that there is a solitary human being save themselves within miles of them, the next post being a long distance beyond the headland, whither often, on the darkest nights, I have to walk to get my letters, for the while chalk heaps that are laid down to mark the perilous reef of rock, the direction of which, at all times, they say, the smugglers used to alter, so that the poor revenues men were guided over the precipice into the jaws of death below.

"Years ago, a vessel was cast ashore, and went to pieces upon the reef one night at—[Here follows the name of the place, which I omit.] All the crew, save one, were thrown by the scornful sea upon the shore, dead men; save one, the sailor given an invidious, fairly look toward the thing that hung upon the high jail-wall there, motionless, with its ghastly cowl drawn over it—" and that man was an Italian foreigner. My people took him in, and acted toward him as Christian people should do, and he was grateful, and staid with us, making himself as useful as he could, for weeks, for months. When he had been our guest for near upon a year, the man who was then my mate in the light-house died; and, mainly through my father's recommendation, the Italian was appointed to be my companion in his place. I was pleased that the poor fellow was thus provided for; but yet I had rather that he had been given any other post than that; not from any assignable cause, or of course, this could have been prevented, but from a vague, uncomfortable feeling that I had always had in connection with him, such as I should not have dreamed of mentioning to his prejudice, if, indeed, I am perfectly certain even to my mother.

"When I found myself in the narrow light-house, alone with this man upon the waste of water, this satisfied feeling of mine was turned upon him on the winding stairs without a shadow; I loathed his company in that little sitting-room upon the level of the story, which, when my old mate was with me, had seemed as comfortable a parlor as need be to a girl when I went down for the first time, and, after thinking, what is he doing below there, and whereabouts shall I find him when I descend? I did not think that I was afraid of him then. Time was when I had not qualified from a mother-sister, and, when I first encountered this man he, and had come off victor; but still I did not fancy taking my rest in the snug little bedroom, with a fire all, knowing that this man was awake, and watching, watching, all the night long.

"Still, you will say, I am a coward, and, having this something repellent about him which I can not explain, there was nothing evil in the said against him. Poor Italian! I feel as I was ashamed of myself, whenever I reassured about the matter, for I had no fear.

"On the night of this day, twelve years ago, the stormiest of August, eighteen hundred and——, to be exact, I was alone with this man, and while he lay in his bed, combating with a certain fever which followed his ague like a nightmare, my mother shook him in piteous terror.

"'Husband,' cried she. "Husband, I have had a fearsome dream, and it seems to me as to teach that I am miserable. Wake, wake! I do believe that George [that was myself] is in danger through me!'

"'Great Heavens!' cried her father. 'Why! was awake, just now, by that very dream, and am not asleep yet! Get my pistols, and I will. But it must be only fancy; consider how full the poor fellow has always shown himself to be of gratitude to us all, and what could he get by the murder of our George?'

"'George has all his savings in his room at the light-house,' returned my mother, sobbing. 'I am not fancy—I am sure that he means to murder him.'

"Two or three shrieks ran through the house as she spoke; and my sister Mary, with her hair all dishevelled, and in her night-dress, stood in the room.

"'Oh, mother! father!' cried she. "I can not stay any longer by myself; I have dreamed a dream that haunts me whenever I shut my eyes. When I left my room, I thought that I saw Philip, I thought the Italian was at my very heels, who seemed leaping in my path with a horrible laughter. He has murdered brother George, I do believe.'

"'You dreamed that?' exclaimed her parents.

"'Yes,' said she. 'I dreamed that I saw my brother's throat in the light-house.'

"My father rose in haste, dressed himself, and started at once, in the moonlight, for the lifting village over against the rock, which was my lonely dwelling-place. It was a good ten miles off, and when he had been about two hours upon his way, and it was in the middle of the most dangerous road, with a distressed and unwonted look. Little did I understand why he wrung my hand, and bestowed me so cheerily, with even extra hug; how it was that I came to be upon the chalk-downlands, there, at such an hour, instead of at my post, I had a tale to tell to him, which I was, by that time, ashamed to relate: although I had started on the errand with a will to do so.

"'Father,' said I, 'I have done a foolish, cruel, cowardly thing.'

"'George,' replied he, 'I forgive you before you tell it to me. I am too glad to find you alive and well to be angry with you.'

"'I have quarreled, father, with the poor Italian foreigner, although he is the best friend I. I have given him fair warning that I will not be his mate in the light-house any longer.'

"'Thank God!' said my father.

"'Nay,' said I, surprised enough, 'but it was a very foolish thing to do, since I had nothing wherewith to justify it, except a dream.'

"'A dream!' exclaimed my father, with a look of terror. 'What, another dream? Did you dream he was going to murder you, lad?'

"'Yes, father,' said I, 'I dreamed that seven two hours ago; and even now, in the broad daylight, I feel that I could not venture to sleep another night upon the rock with that man only in my company.'

"'Heaven forbid you should!' responded my father, solemnly.

"'I saw him,' continued I, 'as though with my eyes open, at I lay in my bed, with his hand kept close to his throat, as though he were keeping some weapon out of sight, and with Murder set upon his face, as plain as though the sun were at my eyes when there in blood. I was on my feet in a second, and yet, not until I was down that my dream was true. I thought I heard a groan from upon the iron stair. I thought I saw a shadow fit for an instant across the door of the lantern; but when I got up there he was trimming the lamps as naturally, and with all my agony upon me, as any such sick astonishment and coolness, that I am, upon reflection, fairly staggered, and don't know what to think. I am sure that there was I at that moment, of the warning which my dream seemed to convey: that I had him sick some other employment elsewhere, for I would have him for my mate no longer. Then I signaled for a boat, and came on shore, intending to tell you all, and to consult you what is best to be done in this strange business. But I am afraid you think me a fool.'

"He may father, upon his part, told me of those dreams at home, and of the reason of his being upon the way whereon I had met him. It seemed to me both that the neglect of four such wonderful coincidences—to say no more—would be far from right, but that at the same time we should not be justified in punishing upon such evidence one who might be, after all, as innocent of any evil as either of us. So I turned back to the village with my father, with the intention of putting off to the rich, and coming to some arrangement with the Italian that should not drain him of his bread.

"A little after my departure, however, it appeared that he had himself slipped into a boat, and that, taking with him what little property he possessed, he had landed, and been seen to walk away northward, out of the town. None of us have ever set eyes upon this man from that eventful night, whether innocent, or whether he is guilty; it is not in human power to tell. So certain, however, in my arrogance, did I feel of his evil, that when I was fixed in the paper of their being about to hang an Italian foreigner at this place, for the murder of a man in his sleep, I came here at once to satisfy myself—in hope rather than in fear, I am ashamed to say, but this forceful dream was not to be found to have had foundation. Pity for the soul of you poor wretch, however, and sorrow for your heart, even before I saw him; and when I looked upon those awful lineaments, as he was lifted up on the scaffold, I thanked Heaven, for the sake even of my heart, that the man was a stranger, and that our dreams, wonderful as they were and are, still need surveying."

Here the story of the sailor ended; and presently he broke away to the railway station, and to the line which was to take him home. I have never seen him since, or heard any other reference to his tale; but the circumstances under which I heard it, with all their terrible realities of Vice and Death, are not more finely fixed upon my memory than are the occurrences which he related as above: neither do they lose any distinctly, in my own mind, the impression of truth.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

BOOK VII.—CHAPTER I.

Vignettes for the next Book of Beauty.

"I QUITE agree with you, Alban; Honoria Vipont is a very superior young lady."

"I knew you would think so!" cried the Colonel, with more warmth than usual in his tone.

"Many years since," resumed Darrell, with reflective air, "I read Miss Edgeworth's novels; and in accordance with Miss Honoria Vipont methinks I confer with one of Miss Edgeworth's heroines—a prude, of course, perfection—who has based—so free from silly romantic notions—to reform with solid information, moral philosophy, and natural history—the man of her choice. Her watch and her heart to the precise moment, for the one as for the other, and the man selected and to marry at last a respectable steady husband, whom she will win with dignity, and would lose with—decorum! A very estimable young lady!"

"Though your description of Miss Vipont is satirical," said Alban Morley, smiling, in spite of some irritation, "yet I will accept it as praise; for in every one, nevertheless, of the just features of the qualities that make an intelligent companion and wife. And you must allow that the qualities we must look to, if we marry at our age. We are no longer boys," added the Colonel, sentimentally.

DARRELL. "Alas, no! I wish we were. But the truth of your remark is indisputable. Let me look! Is not that a face which might make an octogenarian forget that he is not a boy?—what regular features! and what a figure!"

The friends were riding in the park; and as Darrell spoke, he bowed to a young lady, who, with one or two others, passed rapidly by in a barouche. It was that very handsome young lady to whom we should have seen Alban Morley attentively in the great crowd, for which Cave Vipont's family party had been the nucleus.

"Yes; Lady Adela is one of the loveliest girls in London," said the Colonel, who had also lifted his hat to the brunette whom Darrell had saluted too! I have known her ever since she was born, and my father and I are very intimate with an excellent man, but stingy. I had much difficulty in arranging the eldest girl's marriage with Lord Hector, and on a trustee in bankruptcy. If you feel a preference for Lady Adela, though I think that she would suit you rather than a Miss Vipont, I will answer for her father's consent, apparent and her consent. 'Tis no drawback to you, though it is to most of her admirers, when I add, 'There's nothing with her!'"

"Nothing in her! which is worse," said Darrell. "Still, it is pleasant to gaze on a beautiful landscape, even though the soil be barren."

COUSIN MORLEY. "That depends upon whether you are merely the worshipper or admirer of the landscape, or the disappointed proprietor of the soil."

"Admirable!" said Darrell; "you have disposed of Lady Adela. So ho! so ho!" Darrell's tone (his old high-mettled humour) fiercely sent to him from Faulkner, and in spite of the five years that had added to the age, of spirit made trisker by long repose) here put down its ears—lashed out—and indulged in a bound which would have unseated any but a London rider. A young Amazon, followed hard by some two or three young gentlemen and their grooms, shot by, swift and reckless as a hero at Balaklava.

But with equal suddenness, as she caught sight of Darrell—whose hand and voice had already soothed the excited nerves of his steed—the Amazon wheeled round and gained his side. Throwing up her veil, she revealed a face so prettily arch—so perversely gay—with eye of jocund laugh, and hair facile half loosened from their formal bond—that it would have beguiled resentment from the most insensible—reconciled to danger the most timid. And yet there was really a grace of humility in the apologies she tendered for her discourtesy and thoughtlessness. As the girl reined her light palfrey by Darrell's side—turning from the young companions who had followed her—the latter looked on a-foam—and devoting to his ear all her lively overflow of happy spirits, and softened awed by a certain deference, but still apparently free from dissimulation—Darrell, with the high-bred ease of one who has mingled, unestranged, though low, echoed her sportive tones; her youth, her fearlessness were irresistibly contagious. Alban Morley watched observant, while interchanging talk with his companion, the sweet face—so full of high fun, but who belonged to that joyeuse race, with which the surface of life patricians is divided—never sowing into the deeper, fiercer duties—but with plenty of leisure—plenty of health—plenty of quarter of an hour's wit, and plenty of debt to their tradesmen—basing at Melton—scheming at Tattersall's—pride to maiden aunts—attention to thrifty fathers—flirtation but solid matches—in brief, fast livers, who got through their youth heirless, and left to the next not, middle-aged before they are thirty—tormented by wedlock—solaced by the responsibilities that overwhelm the cares of property and the dignities of rank—undergo abrupt metamorphosis into persons of quarter sessions importance, lay members, or decorous peers—their ideas encircled as their duties grew—their opinions, once keen as rebellion to the world, hemmed into the palisades of fenced property—valuable, busy men, elegant as Henry V. in the intervals of the cares of state, he said to the Chief Justice, "There is my hand; and to Sir John Falstaff, "I know thee not, old man."

Said to thy prayers."

But, meanwhile, the effect of this jeunesse doree glittered round Flora Vyvyan; not a regular beauty like Lady Adela—not a fine girl like Miss Vipont, such as Lely and Kneller portray—such a pretty, radiant face—more womanly for affecting to be mannish—more feminine for affecting to be heroic—more delicate for affecting to be a heroine—an only child—spoiled, willful—not at all accomplished (my belief in true accomplishments are learned and few here by the jeunesse doree)—no accomplishment except horsemanship—and that, indeed, perfect in its kind, and the capacity to take three whiffs from a Spanish cigarette. That last was unbecoming—very unbecoming—and Alban had on that merit alone. (N.B. Young ladies do themselves no good by smoking cigarettes. Men, generally, in a lover that rather smokes than "sighs like furnace," by advertising their heroic self-denial. You would prefer, Miss Vyvyan must be course—vulgar perhaps; not at all; but a man prefers a woman to do all those things with the air and look of the highest breeding. Fairies can not be vulgar, no matter what they do; they take the most unfairylike liberties —pinch the maids, turn the house topsy-turvy, and fly away over the heads of the grave and pretty. Flora Vyvyan was a fairy. Not peculiarly intellectual herself, she had a veneration for intellect; found out young men among the best persons likely to fascinate that fast young lady, Lord Hector, and encouraged his addresses, as every people you would least suspect—the architects to themselves. Yet is it possible that Flora Vyvyan can have exercised the coquette to so extravagant a degree as to have designed the conquest of Alban Morley—a man older than her own father? She, too, an heiress—certainly not mercenary; she who had already refused better worldly matches than Lord Hector—she was —young men, handsome men, with coronets on their trappings—who had been among the suitors of their lovely hours? The idea seemed preposterous; nevertheless, Alban Morley, a shrewd observer, perceived this idea, and encouraged by his friend.

Lord Hector, the young lady and her satellites shot off, and the Colonel said, cautiously, "Miss Vyvyan is charming."

DARRELL. "Admiring! the epithet requires construing."

COUSIN MORLEY. "The sort of girl who might make a man of our years really and literally—an old fool!"

DARRELL. "All fool such a man must be if girls of my sort are permitted to make him a present of their hearts. Yet, on the whole, I think that, with those pretty hands resting on one's arm-chair, or that sunny face shining into one's study window, one might be a very happy old fool—and that is the most one can expect."

COUSIN MORLEY (with a little nervous groan). "I am afraid, my poor friend, you are for gone already. No wonder Honoria Vipont fails to be admired. But Lady Vyvyan has a maxim—she truth of which my experience as yet denies me the moment it comes to marriage—the most sensible men are the—"

"Oldest fools!" put in Darrell. "If Mark Antony must sink a-gaze of himself for that painted harridan Cleopatra, what would he have done for a blooming Hebe? Alban, you have spirits! Alas! why are these to be unsuitable companions for us, as we reach that climax in time and sorrow—when to the one we are grown the most indolent, and of the other have the most need? Alban, that girl, if her heart were really won—her wild nature wisely mastered—gently guided—would make a true, prudent, loving, admirable wife—"

"Heaven!" cried Alban Morley.

"Such a husband," pursued Darrell, unheeding the ejaculation, "as—Lionel Haughton. What say you?"

"Lionel—oh, I have no objection at all to that; but he's too young yet to think of marriage —a mere boy. Besides, if you yourself marry, Lionel could scarcely aspire to a girl of Miss Vyvyan's birth and fortune."

"Ho, not aspire! That boy, at least, shall have his own in vain from the want of those two. I settle on Lionel Haughton and his heirs five thousand a year; and if, with gentle blood, youth, good looks, and a heart of gold, that fortune does not allow him to aspire to any girl in England under the rank of a duke, and still be rich enough to buy a superior companion in Miss Vyvyan, I am—"

MORLEY. "Don't say hug—"

DARRELL. "No, and still be young enough to catch a butterfly in Lady Adela—still be bold enough to chain a panther in Flora Vyvyan. Ah! that young woman would be a noble work of its gaudy auction mart—that Lionel Haughton is my property—that I have created a treasure-hunter. I wish that world to be kind to him while he is yet young, and can enjoy it. Ah, Morley! Morley, like Punishment, hobbles on—et ses pieds etaults. What would have delighted us yesterday is now an ostrich as to digestion—and yesterday's pleasure is not the morrow's. A pennyworth of sugar-plums would have made her eyes sparkle when we were crowned pupil-nobles at a preparatory school, but no one gave us sugar-plums in after life. Even the old dessert France keeps before us her daintiest sugar-plum in gilt bonbonniere. Do you ever covet them? I never do. I have passed have the sugar-plums in time. And as we talk, there he comes. Lionel, how are you?"

"I resign you to Lionel's charge now," said the Colonel, glancing at his watch. "I have an appointment in Westminster. Two friends of mine have been quarreling—high words—in an inn where my son and I dine on quarters. I have promised to meet another man, and draw up the form for a mutual apology. High words are to stand—no apology. Not an opinion but to swallow them up again if they were as high as steeples. Adieu for the present. We meet to-night at Lady Dulcett's concert?"

"Yes," said Darrell; "I promised Miss Vyvyan to be there, and hope for from disturbing the congregation. You, Lionel, will come with me."

LIONEL (embarrassed). "No; you must excuse me. I have long been engaged elsewhere."

"That's bad; but I'll excuse you. Lady Dulcett's concert is just one of the places to have a young man shown—to—you. Colonel Morley waved his hand with his usual languid elegance, and his hack cantered off with him, leaving the two friends—age to youth—together.

"Unalterable man," said Darrell, as his eye followed the Colonel's receding figure. "Through all the mutations on Time's dusty high road—stable as a milestone. Just what Alban Morley was as a schoolboy, he is now and if mortal span were extended to the age of the patriarchs, just what Alban Morley is now. Alban Morley would be a thousand years hence. I don't mean externally, of course; wrinkles will come—gout—rheumatism—but the same mind, the same man's body is a garment, as Socrates said before me, and survives the changes incidental to the physiologists, man has a new suit, flies and cockfight, from top to toe. The interior being that which is called the same in an Alban Morley. He has loved, hated, rejoiced, suffered? Where is the sign? Not one. At school, at college, in doing nothing, but decidedly somebody—respected by small boys, petted by big boys—an authority in fags, a leader in fighting bouts—even at war with those who did; never in scrapes—advising others to keep out of them—a favorite with masters, calm above mortal cares as an Epicurean deity. What can wealth give that he has not got? Is there any thing that I can collect to please him? Talk of ambition, talk of power—he has their respect already—and more. Alban Morley—the ancient of all the realm he cares for; Good Society has not a vote against him—he transacts its affairs, and has no need to be—he wields its power. Ever requested to do a favor—no man great enough to do him one; ever asked, and not vexed to a fraction in each man's price; impeccable, yet confident in each man's foibles; amoeb as to pain, but sympathetic; insensible to wounds, among him—but not insensible; thorough-bred. Lionel, I envy that man! I have never refused a finer gentleman out of five thousand a year of mine."

"Thank you, thank you! you will make her so proud and happy; but may I ride on and prepare her for your visit?"

"Certainly; her address is—"

"Gloucester Place, No. —."

"I will meet you there in half an hour."

CHAPTER II.

"Let observation, with extensive view, Survey mankind from China to Peru."
—JOHNSON.

"And Gloucester Place will every where find, indispensable
—and Gloucester will every where find, indispensable to the happiness of women."—VISITING ACQUAINTANCE.

LIONEL knew that Mrs. Haughton would that day spend more than usual forewarning of avoidance from Mr. Darrell. For the evening of that day Mrs. Haughton prepared "to give a party." When Mrs. Haughton gave a party, it was a serious affair. A notable and bustling housewife, she attended herself to each preparatory detail. It was to assist at this party that Lionel had resigned Lady Dulcett's concert. The young man, reluctantly acquiescing in the arrangements by which Alban Morley had engaged him a lodging of his own, seldom or never let a day pass without gratifying his mother's proud heart by an hour or two spent in Gloucester Place, often to the forfeiture of a dinner-party, or short evening excursion, with gay comrades. Difficult in London life, and at the full of its season, to devote an hour or two to visits, apart from the track studied out for us by every mode of existence—difficult to cut off an hour or two from pleasure. And Mrs. Haughton was exacting—also in her choice as to the court she chose to pay. She took the prince of the joint. She liked her neighbors to be fashionable, elegant, young man dismount from his charger, or descend from his cabriolet, just at the striking hour when Gloucester Place becomes illuminated. Like a queen, he must be sure to come to her before he changed his dress, that she and Gloucester Place might admire him in uniform. Was he going to dine at some very great house, he must take her in the way (though no street could be more out of his way), that she might be enabled to say in the parlors to which she herself repaired, "There is a great dinner at Lord So-and-so's to-day my son called on me before he went there. If I had not been disengaged, I should have asked permission to bring him here."

Not that Mrs. Haughton honestly designed, nor even wished, to draw the young man from the dazzling vortex of high life into her own little circumscribed sphere. Quite the reverse. So proud of Lionel to think that her friends were to understand that he was in honor paid to her presence. She had in this, too, a lively recollection of her lost Captain's doctrinal views of the world—views loved. He had early established in the time when Impertinence, installed in society's vestibule, though last dressed waving, still schooled her cigarette, and maintained the etiquette of her court; and even when his son was grown to manhood, he had cast out of his native sphere, he lost not all the original brightness of his mind. He had constantly cherished confidence, when owning his past errors, and tracing to its sympathy with Jessie the cause of his decline, "I should say," he has a man's birth, nor his fortune, that gives him his place in society—it is his wife." Jessie rejoiced. She must not be soon tawning to snobs, nor should his enemies treat her as one. Mrs. Haughton regretted, as she my fall in life to dining with a lord man who beat me £100, and lived in Upper Baker Street, but was not to be cut from a place they called a drawing-room (the Captain was spoken on a fourth floor), and from rooms as spoke over a cook-shop, and from a world which they called a dinner (the Captain at that moment would have welcomed a penny). Mrs. Haughton would not forget—the thing gat wind—for the first time my character record of a man's life, his moral character and character and character once called, Jessie, a man becomes reckless. Teach my boy to beware of the world's worst enemies—no-account parents. Don't cry, Jessie—I don't mean that he is to cut all persons who are not rich, or that any other people—nothing so low as cutting relations. I continued, for instance, to visit Guy Darrell, though he was of the table of the Lords, and I actually saw him once in brown beaver gloves. But I mean that he is to go to those and to those, and not add people there—people who lived also at the back of Holborn. But he is not to be asked to go to their houses, that he had, I must have cut him."

The experience of this kind of talk Lionel was saved from any design of Mrs. Haughton's to attract his orbit into the circle within which she herself revolved. Not that the limits of his practice she gave—illumine or axe odd people there. That was a matter of no sort of personal pride. But had they asked him to their parties, she would have been the first to resent such a liberty.

Lionel found Mrs. Haughton in great bustle. The gardener and his men were below in the area. Men were bringing in a grove of evergreens, intended to border the stair-case, and under the direction of the gardener, more skilled, the recipients were already laid out in the dining-room. The drawing-room was already in full glare, waiting flowers to fill the epergne, but darting to and fro, like a dragon-fly, from the epergne-room to the hall, from the flowers to the epergnes.

"Dear me, Lionel, is that you? Just tell me, that who put those flowers in the epergne! the rataffa-cakes should be opposite to the sponge-cakes, or whether they would not go better—"

"My dear mother, I never observed—I don't think you have made a bad choice. But epergnes have those doors slant—come up stairs. Mr. Darrell will be here very shortly. I have called on to prepare you."

"Mr. Darrell—so-so—how should you let me know? Come, Lionel, how thoughtless you are! You should have some respect for your mother—you do, I know, but—"

"Never mind now, mother—don't scold—I could not help it. He is to engaged, so sought after; if I had not seen him in the night never have come, and—"

"Never mind now! Who is Mr. Darrell, to give himself such airs?—Only a lawyer, after all," said Mrs. Haughton, with majesty.

"Oh, mother, mother, you do not like you. He is one benefactor—one—"

"Don't, don't say more—I was very wrong—quite wicked—only my temper, Lionel dear. Good Mr. Darrell! I shall be so happy to see him—see him, too, in this house that I owe to him—see him by your side! I think I shall fall down on my knees to him."

And her eyes began to stream.

Lionel kissed the tears away fondly. "That's my own mother now indeed—now I am proud ef you, mother; and how well you look!—I am proud of that too."

"Look well!—I am not fit to be seen, this figure—though perhaps an elderly quiet gentleman like good Mr. Darrell does not notice ladies much. John, John, make haste with those plaids. Gracious me! you've got your coat off! —put it on—I expect a gentleman—I'm at home, in the front drawing-room—no—that's all set out—the back drawing-room. Lionel, send Susan to me. Lionel, do just look at the supper-table; and what is to be done with the flowers, and—"

The rest of Mr. Haughton's voice, owing to the rapidity of her accent, which defied the distinctness of her utterance, was lost in air. She vanished at culminating point—within her chamber.

CHAPTER III.

Mrs. Haughton at home to Guy Darrell.

THANKS to Lionel's activity, the hall was disencumbered—the plaints hastily stowed away—the native chapeau on the fretty perquisitions—and the footman in his livery waiting at the door —when Mr. Darrell arrived. Lionel himself came out and welcomed his benefactor's footstep across the threshold of the home which the generous man had provided for the son.

If Lionel had some secret misgivings as to the result of his interview, they were not and must happily dispelled. For, at the sight of Guy Darrell leaning so affectionately on her son's arm, Mrs. Haughton instantly forgot everything up to the impulse of her own warm, grateful, true woman's heart. And her hand went forward —her seizure of Darrell's hand—her first fervent blessing—her dire words, simple and eloquent with feeling—made that heart so transparent, that Darrell looked it through with respectful eyes.

Mrs. Haughton was still a pretty woman, and with much of the delicacy of form and manner which constitutes the gentility of person. She had a sweet voice too, except when angry. Her defects of education, of temper, of conventional polish, were not discernible in the over flow of natural emotion. Darrell thought her resolved to be pleased, if possible. Pleased he was, much more than he had expected. He even felt accepted for the decorated Lares Excavis which he had never before admitted to himself. The house-keeper's daughter was of coarse presuming dowdy, and in her candid rush of gratitude there was not that unbothered sensibility which Darrell had thought requisite in her epistolary compositions. There was elegance too, void both of pretension and constraint, in her own thrift, in the furniture and arrangements of the room. The income he gave to her was not spent with shutterly waste on any one's gewgaws. To ladies in general, Darrell's manner was extremely attractive—not the less attractive because of a certain gentle shyness which, implying respect for those he addressed, and a modest misdoubting of his own powers to excite a compliment and bestowed self-love. And to that lady in especial such graces appeared to the hapsiest good-breeding.

He was well set off without a hitch, till, as Darrell was taking leave, Mrs. Haughton was reminded by some evil genius of her evening party, and her gratitude, hoping for some opportunity to require obligation, prompted her to invite the kind man to whom the facility of giving parties was justly due. She had never ventured to herself, despite all that Lionel could say, the idea of Darrell's station in the world —a lawyer who had spent his youth at the back of Holborn, when the stylish Captain had deemed it a condescension not to cut, might indeed become very rich; but he could never be in the fashion. "For man," she argued, "he must be very lonely. He is not, like Lionel, a young dancing man. A quiet little party, a few people of his own early rank and habits, would be more in his way than those grand places at which Lionel goes. I can but ask him, I ought to ask him. What would he say if I did not ask him? Mrs. Haughton's mother in law says she asked!" All these ideas rushed through her mind in a breath, and as she clasped Darrell's extended hand in both her own, she said, "I have a little party to-night!" And paused—heard remaining words, and answered the interpreting what was to cause, she continued: "There will be some good music—young friends of mine—playing charmingly. I hope Darrell bowed. Lionel began to shudder.

"And if I might presume to think it would amuse you, Mr. Darrell, oh, I should be so happy to see you—so happy!"

"Would you?" said Darrell, briefly. "Then I should be a chud if I did not come. Lionel will escort me. Of course you expect him too."

"Yes, indeed. Though he has so many fine places to go to—and it can't be much that he is used to—yet he is such a dear good boy that he gives up at once to gratify his mother."

Lionel, in agonies, turned an unfilial back, and looked steadily out of the window; but Darrell, far too august to take offense where none was meant, only smiled at the implied reference to Lionel's general want of taste in fashionable world, and replied, without even a touch of his accustomed irony—"And to gratify his mother is a pleasure I thank you for being stir to share with him."

More and more at her ease, and charmed, with having obeyed her hospitable impulse, Mrs. Haughton, following Darrell to the landing-place, added—

"And if you like to play a quiet rubber—"

"I never touch cards. I abhor the very name of them, ma'am," interrupted Darrell, somewhat less generously in his tones.

He mounted his horse; and Lionel, breaking from Mrs. Haughton, who was assuring him that Mr. Darrell was not at all what he expected, but really quite the gentleman—nay, a much grander gentleman than even Colonel Morley—regained his kinsman's side, looking abashed and discomfited. Darrell, with the kindness which his fine spirit could not withhold him so divinely to apply, hastened to relieve the young guardsman's mind.

"I like your mother much—very much," said he, in his most melodious accents. "Good boy! I see now why you gave up Lucy Babcott. Oh and who is a canier by yourself, or with younger friends, and be sure that you call on me, or that we say to Mrs. Haughton's party by ten o'clock. I can go later to the concert if I feel inclined."

He waved his hand, wheeled his horse, and trotted off toward the fair suburban lanes that still pacify the sentience of London glimpses of rural fields, and shadows from spiral hedgerows. He seemed to be alone with his soul. Mrs. Haughton had revived recollections of bygone days—memory linking memory in painful succession. And with his youngest relative elsewhere—that wild Charlie now in his grave—his own laborious youth, resolute manhood, solitary room—and the strong man felt the want of that solitary self-commune, without which self-concupset is unattainable.

CHAPTER IV.

Mrs. Haughton at home miscellaneously. Little parties are useful in bringing people together. One never knows whom one may meet.

GREAT kingdoms grow out of small beginnings. So, from a special cause, was the decoration from a humble centre. On coming into possession of her own property, Mrs. Jones, in Gloucester Place, she was naturally seized with the desire of an appropriate "visiting acquaintance." The accomplishment of this desire had been deferred a while by the excitement of Lionel's departure for India, and the natural reluctance to which the attentions of the spacious Mr. Courtenay Smith had exposed her widowed sensibilities; but on quitting what she recovered from the shame and anger with which she had detected that abject impostor, Society in time, then the desire became the more keen because the good lady felt that, with a mind so active and restless as hers, an object of occupance might be her best preservative from that mania of loneliness which frequently overhead the incautious ear to adventurers wooers. After her experience of her own weakness in connection with a harper, and in a manner to her escape, Mrs. Haughton made a firm resolve never to give that shock once to her heart. No, she would distract her thoughts—she would have a VISITING ACQUAINTANCE. She commenced by singling out such females as the various times had been her gentecleel lodger—new lodging—old lodging. She interchanged polite notes of her accession of consequence and fortune, which she was sure they would be happy to hear; and these notes, in the first flush of her "Mrs. Haughton, Gloucester Place," necessarily produced answers from persons of correspondent cards. Gloucester Place then practized itself for a party. The ci-devant lodgers pleasantly entertained the hostess in that turn they gave parties. Mrs. Haughton was invited to several parties; and here, with a new and bright dash of her "social circle." Thus, long before the end of five years, Mrs. Haughton had attained her object. She had a VISITING ACQUAINTANCE. If it is true that she was not particular when on her first visit she knocked up whose house a card could be left, or a morning call achieved—who could help to fill her room, or whose room could contribute to fill hers, still in time, was contented. She was so tuft-hunting, that, in addition to this, she had no vision of a column in the Morning Post. She wanted, kind lady, only a vent for the exuberance of her social humanity; and here, when she has rather liked acquaintances who looked up to, instead of condescended on her. The Courtenay Smiths have invaded by tribes not congenial to its natural evil civilized atmosphere. Hengists and Horsas, from remote Anglo-Saxon regions, devoured the intervening channel, and insulted the British commonalty in the very streets of town. Some of such immigrators Mrs. Haughton, of Gloucester Place, was the personage of the highest distinction. A few others of grandeur ranks in the world, though they owned to themselves that they were not all as aristocratic as Mrs. Haughton's house, still, once seduced there, came again—being persons who, however independent in fortune, or gentle by blood, had but a small "visiting acquaintance" in town; fresh from economical retirement in the country, or from distant provinces in these hing kingdoms. Mrs. Haughton's rooms were well lighted. There was music for some, whist for others; tea, ices, cakes, and a crowd for all.

By ten o'clock all the rooms already nearly filled, and Mrs. Haughton, as the stood at the door, receiving company, felt that, even on the stair-case would become inaccessible—the head attendant, sent with the ices from the neighbouring confectioner announced, in a loud voice,

"Mr. Haughton—Mr. Darrell."

At that latter name a sensation thrilled the assembly—the name so much in every one's mouth at that period, not least in the mouths of the guests invited, that it was impossible the hostess may call them "a sad mixture," calmists depend—could not fail to be familiar to the ears of Mrs. Haughton's "visiting acquaintance." The interval between his announcement and his ascent from the hall to the drawing-room was busily filled up by murmured questions to the smiling hostess. "Darrell! what? the Darrell! Guy Darrell! greatest man of the day! A connection of yours? Bless me, you don't say so?" Mrs. Haughton began to feel nervous. Was Lionel right? Could the man who had only been a lawyer's clerk at Holborn really be, now such a very, very great man—greatest man of the day? Nonsense!

"Ma'am"—said one pale, puff-checked, flatnosed gentleman, in a very large white waistcoat, who was standing by her side till a vacancy in one of the two whist-tables should occur—"Ma'am, I'm an enthusiastic admirer of Mr. Darrell. You say he is a connection of yours? Present me to him."

Mrs. Haughton nodded flutteringly, for, as the gentleman closed his request, and tapped a large gold snuff-box, Darrell stood before them—Lionel close at his side, looking positively sheepish. The great man said a few civil words, and was then placing a chair to make way for the press behind him, when he of the white waistcoat touching Mrs. Haughton's arm, and staring fixedly at Mr. Darrell, cried, very loud: "In these anxious times public men dispense with ceremony. I cannot help asking—Mr. Darrell? Mr. Darrell? Thus pressed, poor Mrs. Haughton, without looking, muttered, not," Mr. Addington Pole," but "Mr. Darrell," and turned to welcome fresh comers.

"Mr. Darrell," said Mr. Poole, bowing to the ground, "this is an honor.

Darrell gave the speaker one glance of his keen eye, and thought to himself—"If I were still at the bar, I should be sorry to hold a brief for this fellow. However, he returned the bow formally, and, bowing again at the close of a highly complimentary address with the words, "Pole fetched up his opening sentence, expressed himself "much flattered," and thought he might venture to say he never be welcomed in the crowd, Mr. Poole contrived to follow him, and claim his acquaintance at the house of the other day—the weather—the funds—the crops, length Darrell perceived, sitting aloof in a corner on the sofa, to whom indeed it surprised him to see in a London drawing-room, but who, from some motive, Darrell was not unwilling the enlightened constituency of Ouzelford, had been on a visit to the chairman of his committee in his inflexible manner—and having connections in the town—and, being a very high character, had done him good service. Darrell nodded, but did not rarely forget a face, and never a service. At any time he would have been glad to see the man who had served him, but at this moment he was grateful indeed,

"Excuse me," he said, bluntly, to Mr. Poole "but I see an old friend." He moved on, and thick as the crowd had become, it made way with respect to the lawyer, for the distinguished orator. The buzz of admiration as he passed—louder than it had greeted the statesman—would have had sweeter music than Grisi's most artful queer to a vainer man—nay, once on a time, Guy Darrell himself had the credit to know. He gained the corner, and roused the solitary sitter.

"My dear Mr. Hartopp, do you not remember me—Guy Darrell?"

"Guy Darrell!" cried the ex-mayor of Gateboro' rising," who could think that you would remember us?"

"What? not remember those ten stubborn voters, on whom, all and singly, I had lavished the most persuasive oratory in vain? You cause, and with the brief words, "John—Ned—Dick—pledge me—Guy Darrell" the man was so convinced—the votes won. That's what I call eloquence"—Ionto rem—Confound that fellow Pole—where is he?—Ah!—Hartopp, why! may I ask who is that Mr.—what's his name—then you're with the wrong party?"

"Pooh," answered Hartopp. "Who is he Sir? A speculative man. He is connected with the Addington Poles in a copper mine. Willians (that's my foreman—a very long head he has too) have put money in the thing for good, and wanted me to do the same, but 'tis not in my way. And Mr. Poole may be a very honest man, but I'm not sure we would like him here. I have grown crickey; I know I am liable to be taken in—and I'm not sure that the retired Companies' upon principle—especially when they promise thirty per cent, and work copper mines. Mr. Poole has a copper mine?"

"And deals in brass—you may see it in his face! But never mind us now, my good, old Hartopp? If I remember right, you were settled at Gateboro' when we last met."

"Yes, Sir, and am now a rather in the neighborhood. I am gradually retiring from business, and can't stand an active life, and I've children, and I have a family, and we live in enlightened times, when children require a finer education than their parents had. Mrs. Hartopp is anxious that daughter Anna Maria was in need of some finishing knowledge to be obtained in the city, and Maria—and so we have taken a house in London for six weeks. That's Mrs. Hartopp yonder, Sir, talking to the lady in black—my wife, I believe—Williams says that bleds of that sort are best, and I think so in exergise—if he has rested on Mrs. Hartopp's head for hours together, every evening since we have been in town."

"Significant of your connubial felicity, Mr. Hartopp."

"May it be so of Anna Maria's. She is to be married when her education is finished—married to Williams, a son of your friend Jessop, of Ouzelford—and between you and me, Darrell, that is the reason why I consented to come to town. Do not suppose that I would have a daughter finished unless there was a husband at hand who undertook to be responsible for the results."

"You retain your wisdom, Mr. Hartopp; and I feel sure that not even your fair partner could have brought you up to London unless you had decided on the expediency of coming. Do you remember that I told you the day you so admirably settled a dispute at our committee-room,

"It was well you were not born a king, for you would have made an irresistible tyrant."

"Hush! hush!" whispered Hartopp in great alarm. "If Mrs. Hartopp should hear you! What an observer you are, Sir! I thought I was a judge of character—but I was once deceived. I dare say you never were."

"You mistake," answered Darrell, wincing, "you deceived! How?"

"Oh, a long story, Sir. It was an elderly man—the most agreeable, interesting companion—he taught me nothing nevertheless—and in a preybewitching little girl with him, his grandchild. I thought him a retired officer of the harum-scarum chap in his day, but that he had a true sense of honor"—(Darrell, wholly unmoved in this narrative, expressed a yawn, and wondered when it would end); "Only think, Sir, just as he was saying in myself, I know the actor—I never was taken in,' down comes a smart fellow—the man's own son—and tells me —or rather tells the old gentleman—that he came to tell me—that this charming old gentleman of high birth and fortune was a returned convict—been transported for robbing his employer."

Pale, breathless, Darrell listened, not unheeding—but with the deepest heed of—Joy.

"The convict? He called himself Chapman, but the son's name was Lionel—Haughton."

"Ah!" fattered Darrell, recoiling, "and you spoke of a little girl?"

"His daughter's daughter; he came after her with a magistrate's warrant. The old miscreant had carried off with him much that was valuable in old wing, I suppose. Luckily she was then in my charge. I gave her back to her father, and I have reason to suppose that he is making up by through with him. Some relation, I presume?"

"What was her name, do you remember?"

"Crane."

"Crane? Crane?" muttered Darrell, as if trying in vain to fix his memory with that name. "So he said the child was his daughter—are you sure?"

"Oh, of course he said so, and the lady too. But can you be acquainted with them, Sir?"

"No," said Darrell, hungrier to see Lionel. Liars—infamous liars! But have the deceptive pieces proved? I must be sure of that! Better that the father should be exposed and denounced by the son?"

"I conclude so. I never saw them again. But you believe the father really was, then, a felon, a convict—you exercise your own discerning circumstances? There was something in that man, Mr. Darrell, that made one love him —positively love him. I was glad to be able to him that I had given up the child he trusted to my charge, and saw his grief, I felt a criminal myself."

Darrell said nothing, but the character of his face was absolutely alternately—pitiless—tenderless—the face of an inexorable judge. Hartopp, thinking his eyes suddenly to that countenance, recoiled in awe.

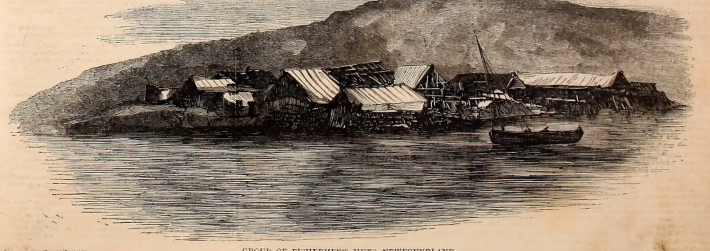
"You think I was a criminal?" he said, pitcously.

"I think we are both talking too much, Mr. Hartopp, of a thing of minimum importance, and I advise you to dismiss the whole remembrance of intercourse with any of them from your honorable mind. I can never be grateful to you for the tale you have poured into mine. Men of honor should avoid—that is the very thought that approaches them to knaves!"

Thus saying, Darrell moved back without redeem, and again was lost in the crowd. Hartopp, the crowd, scarcely noticed Mr. Haughton by a retreating step, and bent beside Lionel as if he had buried down the stairs. He was impatiently searching for his cloak in the back parlor, when a voice behind him, in a low, hissing tone, said, "Sir!" and turning round with petulant quickness, he beheld Addington Pole. Mr. Pole—it requires an habitual intercourse with equals to give perfect and invariable control of temper to a man of irritable nerves and of a quick temper—Mr. Pole, whom Darrell really liked, he had much sweet in his character, and where he was offended, he was contented, he was offended, he could be extremely uncivil. "Sir," he cried, almost shaking his foot, "your impertinence annoy me; I request you to cease them."

"Why will you be angry with me?" said Poole, with an angry growl. "I have no need to force myself on any man. But I beg you to believe that if I presumed to address a remonstrance, it was to do you a service, Sir—yes, a private service, Sir." He lowered his voice to the whisper, and laid his finger on his nose—"There's one Jasper Lessly, Sir—eh? Oh, Sir, I'm not the man to betray a secret. I respect family secrets. Perhaps I might be of use, perhaps not."

Certainly not, Sir," said Darrell, flinging the cloak he had now found across his shoulders, and striding from the house. "Men of honor should avoid—that is the very thought that approaches them to knaves!" Such was his stirring to the utmost in his power—what?—to make himself agreeable to Flora Vyvyan? No; to make Flora Vyvyan agreeable to himself. The man did not presume that a fair young lady could be in love with him; perhaps he believed that, at his years, to be impossible. But he asked what seemed much easier, and was much harder—he asked to be himself in love.



INTERIOR OF A FISH-HOUSE.

COD-FISHING ON THE NEWFOUNDLAND SHORES.

We give herewith two illustrations depicting a fishing-station on the coast of Newfoundland and a fish-house. That large fishing fleet which every year sails from our Eastern ports for the Newfoundland fishing-banks has nothing to do with these villages. Our Yankee fishermen dress their fish on their own decks, and pack them in the holds of their vessels, returning home when they have "a fair of fish," that is to say, when they have exhausted the quantity of salt taken on board on leaving house.

The English and French settlers on the bleak shores of Newfoundland, however, follow their trade of cod-fishing in smaller craft, which start out to sea each morning, and return to the stations at night. A fishing-station is a collection of rude huts, put up for the temporary accommodation of the hardy fishermen and their wives. The location of the station is close by the water, in some sheltered nook, where the boat may be safe from the summer gales which keep their owners on land, and, moreover, near as may be to the many spots of water, or rather bottom, which experience has shown to be the favorite strong-holds of the deliberated cod. Hither migrates, in early summer, a jolly company of rough but kindly villagers: the men fitted for their arduous but pleasant labors, and eager for the sport—the women ready to do their share, in preparing meals, mending clothes, repairing fishing-tackle, and lastly, but most important of all, salting and drying, or "curing," the finny products of their husbands' skill. Latterly, the "saving" of cod-liver oil has become an additional and important labor intrusted to these dames and their children.

GROUP OF FISHERMEN'S HUTS, NEWFOUNDLAND

The boats start out to the fishing-grounds every fine morning before daylight. They "try for fish," which means heaving the boat to, and letting one or two lines to the bottom to see if there are cod there—until they "strike a school," when the anchor is let go, the sails are furled, and all hands let down their hooks. Each man is provided with two or three lines, the lines holding two hooks each. In "good fishing" the fish take hold as fast as the hooks appear at the bottom, and the fisherman at the other end of the line hauls away as fast as he can, letting one line run down while he is pulling in the other. At such times great powers of endurance and considerable skill in economizing strength are needed. To haul up from a depth of from thirty to ninety fathoms (from 180 to 540 feet) a five-pound lead, two thirty-pound cod, and the additional weight of line, is no child's play in the first instance. To continue the operation for hours without rest or cessation brings out a development of muscle and a breadth of chest which would delight a painter, and creates an appetite which would frighten a tavern-keeper.

When the boat is filled, or, in any event, two hours before sunset, the little fleet returns landward. Being moored, all hands busy themselves in gutting and washing the fish. They are thinly salted and laid in heaps or "fakes" for the night, and then come under the hands of the women exclusively. These resalt them on the morrow, and then stack them up in great piles in the fish-house. Here they are left for some days till the salt has thoroughly penetrated them, and the pickle has soaked through. They are then taken down, carefully washed in enormous tubs of brine, and wheeled out to long tables of brushwood, where women and children assiduously spread and turn them till they are completely dry. The operation of drying extends over several days, and on the care with which it is performed depends in great measure the eventual marketable value of the fish; a crisp, white codfish bringing a far higher price than a damp, clammy, ash-colored one. The fish which are spread out during the day are carefully taken into the fish-house every evening, and respread the next morning, until in course of days they are sufficiently crisp, when they are stacked up in a dry corner of the house, there to remain until the dealer comes around to make his purchases.

Thus, it will be seen, no slight care and labor are needed ere the codfish are ready for shipment. The fisherman deprecates rain during his season quite as earnestly as the farmer during his; and, slightly changing the old proverb, holds it good policy to "make fish while the sun shines."

The fishing-hamlets of Newfoundland are inhabited by a primitive, simple-minded, and cheery people, who know little of the vanities of the great world, and care less, being quite sufficient to themselves. When the season is over, there ensue great rejoicings and merry-makings; especially if there has been a profitable return for labor. And then, presently, comes on grim winter, locking the country up with bars of ice and storm; the simple winter's store of provision and fuel has been laid in, the house has been made secure against wind, rain, and cold, and the cheerful housewives sit before bright fires, knitting stockings, mittens, and Guernsey frocks of surprising thickness, while their lords lounge about the chimney-corner arranging "fish-crafts" and sharpening hooks for next season's operations, spinning tough yarns, meantime, of past gales and shipwrecks, or chanting some doleful ditty of the famous "October gale," when Newfoundland's shores were lined with wrecked boats, and so many widows were made by one storm.

Miscellany.

—AT a social gathering of literary men, about fifty years ago, one of the company put a question, which puzzled for the moment all the rest. It was this: Supposing all the New Testaments in the world had been destroyed at the end of the third century, could their contents have been recovered from the writings of the first three centuries? This question of was novel to all, and no one even hazarded a guess in answer. Lord Hailes, a Scotch Judge, who was present, resolved to devote his next vacation to its solution.

"On returning home, as I knew I had all the writers of those centuries, I began immediately to collect them, that I might set to work on the arduous task as soon as possible." Pointing to a table covered with papers, he said, "There have I been busy for these two months, searching for chapters, half chapters, and sentences of the New Testament, and have marked down what I have found, and where I have found it; so that any persons may examine and see for themselves. I have actually discovered the whole New Testament from those writings, except seven or eleven verses (I forget which), which satisfies me that I could discover them also. Now," said he, "here was a way in which God concealed or hid the treasure of his word, that Julian, the apostate emperor, and other enemies of Christ who wished to extirpate the Gospel from the world, never would have thought of; and though they had, they never could have effected their destruction."

The labor in effecting this feat must have been immense; for the Gospels and Epistles would not be divided into chapters and verses as they are now. Much must have been effected by the help of a concordance. And having been a judge for many years, a habit of minute investigation must have been formed in his mind.

—IN 1774 came to Paris a handsome young fellow of twenty, to seek his fortune in the great capital. He had little money, no profession, and few friends; but he was tall, had fine eyes, and rich brown hair, and was a wonderful talker. Accordingly, by the time he was thirty he had made himself a place and a name in Parisian Society—the name being that of Count de Rivarol.

Besides being a man of society, he translated Dante's Inferno ("I translated it," said he, "because I found my ancestors there"), wrote a prize essay on the superiority of the French language, and stood so high in the literary world that Voltaire called him "the Frenchman par excellence." Naturally enough he had become the "pet of the circles;" naturally enough also, he had led a loose, careless life. And with what result? With this: that at one-and-thirty he wrote, "As for my life, it is a drama so wearisome that I am tempted to think Mercier must be the author of it. Formerly, I could make up in one hour for eight days of folly; and now, it takes me eight long days of wisdom to make up for the folly of an hour." He was famous for his

Epigrams,

a few of which have come down to us. On the eve of the Revolution, he said to the old noblesse, "You mistake your memories for your rights." Very wisely he said, "The philosophes resemble those worms which pierce through the dikes of Holland—they prove that institutions are perishable, but they do not prove that they are not also necessary;" but he added, very falsely, "The people is a sovereign which only requires to eat. His majesty is tranquil while he digests." He was never quite owned by the noblesse, whom he defended; and they occasionally reminded him that his nobility was counterfeit. Lamenting one day, to the Duc de Créqui, the popular attacks, he said, "Alas, we have lost all our privileges!" The Duke slowly repeated, "We have?" "Well," replied Rivarol, "is there any thing singular in what I say?" "The singular thing about it, my dear fellow," said the Duke, "is your plural." Nevertheless, he continued to despise the people, who presently made him run away from France. Said he, "The people is always and every where the same: invariably it is a cannibal; and when it takes revenge upon its rulers, it punishes crimes which are sometimes doubtful by other crimes which are always certain." Again: "It is with liberty as with strong drink, the people can not taste it without becoming intoxicated." But he said, shrewdly, "In France the man who cries Fire! is persecuted; the incendiary is undisturbed." Then he hated Mirabeau, of whom he said: "Mirabeau is capable of any thing for money, capable even of a good action!" And again: "His brain is an immense sponge, swollen with ideas which are not his own. His reputation is due entirely to this, that he has invariably written upon matters of the day while the interest attached to them was still palpitating and fresh. His pamphlets are like fire-ships sent forth to destroy an enemy's fleet; they may indeed burn it, but they likewise destroy themselves. For the rest, he is simply a barbarian as to style: he is the Attila of eloquence; and if, in all his wordy volumes, there are any phrases neatly turned, they are by Chamfort, by Cerutti, or by myself."

Rivarol once kept a secretary, who by the evening had always forgotten what he wrote in the morning: "You would be a capital secretary to a conspiracy," said he. Of Buffon's son he said: "'Tis the poorest chapter in the Histoire Naturelle of his father." Of the Duc de Créqui: "He fears God without believing in Him." Of the Duke of Orleans: "He has every vice, but is incapable of a crime." To the tedious and twaddling Florian, whom he saw with a manuscript sticking out of his pocket: "Monsieur Florian, if you were not so universally known, you would certainly get robbed." To a friend, who asked him his opinion of a verse he had written: "It is good, but rather prolix!" Of a madrigal and an epigram, which were both rather poor: "There is too much of the madrigal in the epigram, and too much of the epigram in the madrigal." He died, worn out, at forty-six—brilliant to the last, but sorrowful and longing. In one of his last conversations, he said, "To me, as to the universe, a God is needful, to save me from the chaos and the anarchy of my soul. The idea of God can alone deliver our spirit from its prolonged torture, and our mind from its vast and weary solitude." On his death-bed, there were roses before his window, and his room was strewed with the young flowers of spring. But he sank daily. At last he said, "My friends, the mighty shadows are closing round me; the roses are changing into poppies. It is time to think of eternity." Time indeed!

—"To be liberal we must economize," pithily said Béranger. William Penn has another thought on Economy.

Frugality is good, if liberality be joined with it. The first is leaving off superfluous expenses; the last is bestowing them to the benefit of others that need. The first without the last begins covetousness; the last without the first begins prodigality. Both together make an excellent temper. Happy the place where they are found.

—SOME wretched bachelor has made it his business to ascertain

The cost of a Modern Belle.

I saw her dancing in the ball, he says. Around her snowy brow were set twenty-five hundred dollars; such would have been the answer of any jeweler to the question, "What are those diamonds?" With the gentle undulation of her bosom there rose and fell exactly one hundred and fifty-two dollars and fifty cents. The sum bore the guise of a brooch of gold and enamel. Her fairy form was invested in fifty dollars, represented by a slip of lilac satin; and this was overlaid by one hundred and fifty dollars more in two skirts of white lace. Tastefully down each side of the latter were six dollars and fifty cents, which so many bows of purple ribbon had come to. The lower margin of the one-hundred-and-fifty-dollar skirts were edged with fifty-five additional dollars, the value of some eight yards of silver fringe, a quarter of a yard in depth. Her taper waist, taking zone and clasp together, I calculated to be confined by one hundred and fifty dollars. Her delicately-rounded arms, the glove of spotless kid being added to the gold bracelet which encircled the little wrist, may be said to have been adorned with one hundred and eleven dollars and thirty-eight cents, and putting the silk and satin at the lowest figure, I should say she wore four dollars and eighteen and three-quarters cents on her feet. Thus altogether was this thing of light, this creature of loveliness, arrayed from top to toe, exclusively of little sundries, in three thousand two hundred and forty-two dollars and fifty-seven cents.

—IN last week's Miscellany was a quaintly beautiful description of a milkmaid of the olden time, by Sir Thomas Overbury. Here is his idea of A Courtier.

A courtier, to all men's thinking, is a man, and, to most men, the finest; all things else are defined by the understanding, but this by the senses; but his surest mark is that he is found only about princes. He putteth away much of his judgment about the situation of his clothes. He knows no man that is not generally known. His wit, like the marigold, openeth with the sun; and therefore he riseth not before ten of the clock. He puts more confidence in his words than meaning, and more in his pronunciation than his words. He follows nothing but inconstancy; admires nothing but beauty; honors nothing but fortune; loves nothing. He is not (i. e. ceases to exist) if he be out of court, but, fish-like, breathes destruction if out of his own element. Neither his motion nor aspect are regular; but he moves by the upper spheres, and is the reflection of higher substances.

If you find him not here, you shall in Paul's, with a tooth-pick in his hat, a cape-cloak, and a long stocking.

—IF you remove the "tooth-pick in his hat," substitute a fashionable frock coat for the "cape-cloak," and peg top trowsers for the "long stocking," may you not pick out many a courtier in this our day, as well as some whom our author describes as

"Timeists?"

A Timeist is a noun adjective of the present tense; he hath no more of conscience than fear; and his religion is not his but his Prince's. When he gives, he curses; when he sells, he worships. . . . . In a word, he danceth to the tune of fortune, and studies for nothing but to—keep time.

—TALENTS, says Kirwan, in his Happy Home, are

No Protection against Temptation.

Were they so, Bacon would never have taken a bribe, nor would Dodd have committed forgery; Voltaire might have been another Luther; David Hume another Matthew Hale; and Satan himself might yet be in the canopy of heaven, an orb of the first magnitude. Indeed, high talent, unless early cultivated, as was that of Moses, and Milton, and Baxter, and Edwards, and Wesley, and Robert Hall, is the most restive under moral restraints; is the most fearless in exposing itself to temptation; is the most ready to lay itself on the lap of Delilah, trusting in the lock of its strength. And, alas! like Samson, how often is it found blind and grinding in the prison-house, when it might be wielding the highest political power, or civilizing and evangelizing the nations!

—TALENTS are God-given—and they are to be used in a God-fearing manner. Only in such way will their possessor be happy and useful. Unite to Talent or Genius, therefore,

A Firm Religious Belief.

I envy no quality of the mind or intellect in others, said Sir Humphry Davy, be it genius, power, wit, or fancy; but if I could choose what would be most delightful, and I believe most useful to me, I should prefer a firm religious belief to any other blessing; for it makes life a discipline of goodness, creates new hopes when all earthly hopes vanish, and throws over the decay, the destruction of existence, the most gorgeous of all lights; awakens life even in death, and from destruction and decay calls up beauty and divinity; makes an instrument of torture and shame the ladder of ascent to paradise; and, far above all combinations of earthly hopes, calls up the most delightful visions of palms and amaranths, the gardens of the blessed, the security of everlasting joys, where the sensualist and the skeptic view only gloom, decay, annihilation, and despair.

—WHAT is a Bohemian, in the conventional sense of that word? many of the readers of this Miscellany have doubtless asked themselves—without getting a satisfactory answer—as indeed one but seldom obtains much information by "inquiring within." We do not propose to enlighten the existing ignorance on the subject any farther than may be effected by this specimen of

Parisian Bohemianism:

The Bohemians have a club at a certain restaurant, where their conversation drives the garçon into idiotcy in the flower of his youth. After some weeks the maître presents a formal remonstrance of several articles against their proceedings, and demands redress. They have forced him to take in a paper which nobody reads, by always hallooing, "Le Castor, le Castor!" There is only one backgammon board, and when any one wants it they cry, "The board is in use!" M. Marcel has brought his easel, and M. Schaumard his piano, into the salon, and placarded the window with "Cours gratuit de Musique vocale et instrumentale, à l'usage des deux sexes." ("Free lessons in vocal and instrumental music, for both sexes.") They bring a machine and make their own coffee, on the rediculous pretext that they can not countenance an immoral connection between mocha and chicory, and thus they discredit the establishment. Not content with having destroyed the intellect of the garçon, they have corrupted the unhappy boy to the extent that he has addressed some passionate verses to the impeccable matron who presides at the comptoir; and for these and other reasons the Society is requested to transfer its revolutionary manners to another locality. Apologies and promises heal the breach; and on Christmas Eve, being accidentally without any money whatever, they propose to have a banquet that shall cost a hundred thousand francs, and have just entered on that speculation when they meet a young man of property, whose sole object in life is to become a citizen of Bohemia, and who begs humbly to be permitted to pay their bill.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

THE humors of the Telegraph are very amusing. A year or so since the agent of the Delaware and Hudson Freighting Line at Honesdale, Pennsylvania, sent the following dispatch to the agent at New York:

D. HORTON. DEAR SIR,—"Please send me shipping-book for eighteen forty-nine."

The dispatch as received read as follows:

D. Horton. "Please send me a shipping box eighteen feet by nine."

This other might have been more disastrous in its results; the same parties were concerned. Mr. Horton wrote the proprietor of the line here that he had been subpenaed on a trial to be held in the Supreme Court of New York, and that as navigation was about to open it would be necessary to send a man to perform his office duties. The following reply was intrusted to the tender care of the telegraphic wires:

"See the Judge at once, and get excused; I can not send a man to fill your place."

The dispatch as received read as follows:

"See the Judge at once and get executed; I can send a man to fill your place."

Mr. H. claims on the margin of the dispatch—a stay of execution.

Notice was recently served upon Thomas Clark, of London, that the walls of a building owned by him had been condemned and would be pulled down. It was found that Mr. Clark had been in prison for more than forty years for contempt of Court! Dickens's Circumlocution office was no creature of the fancy.

Daniel Webster's father made a cradle for little Dan out of a pine log, with an axe and augur, and Lewis Cass was rocked by his staid mother in a second-hand sugar trough.

It is rumored that Mr. Rarey, the American horse-tamer, uses a file of Congressional speeches to subdue the refractory animals put under his charge. After reading about a quarter of an hour the quadruped gives in, promises an entire amendment of morals and manners if he will only stop.

There is a power to make each hour
As sweet as Heaven designed it;
Nor need we roam to bring it home,
Though few there be to find it!
We seek too high for things close by,
And lose what nature found us;
For life hath here no charm so dear
As home and friends around us.

Colonel D—— of the British army, well known for his gigantic size and burly deportment, being once importuned by a diminutive tailor for payment of a bill, petulantly exclaimed—

"If you were not such a little reptile, I would kick you down stairs."

"Little reptile!" remonstrated the dun, "and what if I am? Recollect, Colonel, we can't all be great brutes!"

"Well, Doctor," said a chap suffering with the tooth-ache, "how much do you ax for the job? Guy! but you did it quick, though!" "My terms," replied the dentist, "are one dollar." "A dollar for half a minit's work! One dollar—thunder! Why, a doctor down t'our place drawed a tooth for me, two year ago, and it took him two hours. He dragged me all around the room, and lost his grip half a dozen times. I never seed such hard work—and he only charged me twenty-five cents. A dollar for a minit's work! you must be jokin.'"

If you wish to increase the size and prominence of your eyes, just keep account of the money you spend foolishly, and add it up at the end of the year.

He who thinks his place below him, will certainly be below his place.

A novelty was lately introduced at a fashionable shop, not, however, by the shop-keeper, but by his customer. A lady, with great exquisiteness of manner, asked for dress silks—"not a gray, nor a lead color, but a subdued mouse!" The smart young man behind the counter expressed his regret that "that shade of color had not yet been introduced in the French studios; but he informed the lady that he could show her the next best thing, which was enraged rat!"

A Southern Methodist minister, detailing his experience on a "certain" circuit, counted twenty-six children that were named after him, and added that during the year he received as compensation for his labor thirteen dollars.

A correspondent in Vermont asserts that some time ago, a man died in the northern part of the State, after eating too many par-boiled beans. He was buried, and not long afterward his grave was covered with a crop of growing beans. The superstitious thought they had sprung from the dead man; but the boys laughed, and probably knew who planted them.

A physician of some note, in Chicago, called at one of the leading drug stores in the city for a scab of vaccine virus. The apothecary sold him the desired article encased, as usual, in a thick coating of white wax to guard it from the injurious effects of the air, and wrapped in tin foil as a still further protection, the whole forming a lump the size of a walnut. In about ten days the M.D. re-entered the emporium of emetics and purges. "It isn't worth a straw!" says the doctor, pettishly tossing upon the prescription-counter the virus which he had recently purchased. "But," urged the druggist, "there must be some mistake; it has been tried repeatedly, and with invariable success." "I have used it in a dozen cases, and not one of them has 'taken;' there is your stuff, Sir, call it what you please—I call it a humbug and a swindle, Sir!" quoth the doctor, waxing wroth. The scab was examined. Part of the foil had been removed and some small encroachment made upon the wax, but the virus itself remained imbedded in its tenacious sheath entire. The truth flashed upon the pill-maker, and an unwonted smile radiated in wrinkles over every feature. The learned professor had inoculated a dozen patients with white wax!

An old lady of my acquaintance has four daughters with the following names: Clementina, Wilhelmina, Martina, and Mazin Ann. I remarked to her, on hearing them, that the last was a very singular name, and asked her how she came to think of it. "Why, you see," she said, "I got tired o' fancy names, and concluded to give her a good Scripter one." "Ah!" I said, thoughtfully, vainly taxing memory to recall the portion of Holy Writ in which it appeared, "I can not remember ever seeing it there." "Well," she replied, convincingly, "you don't read your Bible then. Didn't you never hear of 'Mazin' Grace, how sweet the sound?'" Of course I remembered it, and acknowledged my unheard-of forgetfulness.

A practical joke was once attempted to be played on Mr. Erskine, as he went one day to Westminster Hall, with his ample bag crammed full of briefs. Some waggish barristers hired a Jew's boy to go and ask him if he had "any old clo' to sell?" "No, you little Hebrew imp," exclaimed the indignant counselor, "they are all new suits."

"Do you keep nails here?" asked a sleepy-looking lad, walking into a hardware store, the other day.

"Yes," replied the gentlemanly proprietor. "We keep all kinds of nails; what kind will you have, Sir, and how many?"

"Well," said the boy, sliding toward the door, "I'll take a pound of finger nails and about a pound and half of toe nails."

"Pathrick dear, come in and go to bed jist," said the wife of a jolly son of Erin, who had just returned from the fair, in a decidedly "how come you so" state. "You must be dreadful tired, shure, wid your long walk."

"Arrah! git away wid your nonsense," said Pat. "It wasn't the length of the way at all that fatigued me; 'twas the breadth of it!"

"One of the best editors the Westminster Review could ever boast, and one of the most brilliant writers of the passing hour, was a cooper in Aberdeen. One of the editors of the London Daily Journal was a baker in Elgin; perhaps the best reporter of the London Times was a weaver in Edinburgh; the editor of the Witness was a stone-mason. One of the ablest ministers in London was a blacksmith in Dundee; and another was a watch-maker in Banff. The late Dr. Milne, of China, was a herd-boy in Rhyne. The principal of the London Missionary Society's College at Hong Kong, was a saddler in Huntley; and one of the best missionaries that ever went to India was a tailor in Keith. The leading machinist on the London and Birmingham Railroad, with seven hundred pounds a year, was a mechanic in Glasgow; and perhaps the very richest iron founder in England was a working man in Moray. Sir James Clark, her Majesty's physician, was a druggist in Banff. Joseph Hume was a sailor first, and then a laborer at the mortar and pestle in Montrose. Mr. M'Gregor, the member from Glasgow, was a poor boy in Ross-shire. James Wilson, the member from Westbury, was a plowman in Haddington; and Arthur Anderson, the member for Orkney, earned his bread by the sweat of his brow in the Ultima Thule."

Said a philosophical old gentleman to his "hopeful," "My son, when cabmen take the pledge, and the police will not take supper when on culinary duty; when an omnibus half empty goes the same pace as a full one; when the laws of private property extend to umbrellas, and a case of confiscation may be dealt with as a theft; when your laundress gives up taking snuff, and abstains for four-and-twenty hours from touching any body's gin-bottle; when a bachelor in lodgings finds a shirt without a button off, and has his shaving-water brought without ringing more than five times for it; when the beef-eaters are all of them confirmed vegetarians, and no alderman will take a second plate of turtle—then, O my son! thou mayest chance to find a wife who will not object to travel without eight-and-twenty packages, and who will show herself possessed of such angelic self-denial as even to refuse thy offer of a dress because she finds and confesses that she doesn't want it."

In a recent trial before the Fire Commissioners, the following change of puns took place: witness was asked by the First Commissioner—"How long was it before the engines began to play?"—Witness: "I should say we were at work, Sir, within five minutes of being called. We do not call it play."—Second Commissioner: "I thought the playing of an engine was an expression well understood."—Third Commissioner: "I thought so too. I thought the engines played while the fire was at work."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

NEW YORK, Monday, May 17, 1858.

THE Wholesale Produce Markets have been more active for Breadstuffs, yet, with free receipts of the leading kinds, prices closed in favor of buyers. Flour and Corn were mainly sought after by home dealers. The demand for Wheat was principally for shipment. Sound lots of Wheat were least plenty, and for such holders were asking somewhat firmer prices toward the close. The high claims of shipowners tended to check the export trade. Rye and Barley improved a little during the week, yet they closed languidly. Oats ruled dull and heavy.... Cotton has been less sought after, and it has declined a shade....The movements in Groceries have been less extensive, but prices have not varied much....Provisions have attracted less attention, and holders have not been able to sustain prices....Hay has been freely offered and purchased at previous rates....Hops and Grass Seeds ruled quiet and languid....Naval Stores were depressed and drooping....Tobacco was in fair demand, and was very firm....A moderate inquiry prevailed for Wool at unaltered quotations. The new clip will soon begin to arrive, and buyers are moving with reserve in anticipation of lower prices....The Spring Trade in Dry Goods is drawing to a close. It has been much lighter, yet far safer, than usual. Desirable goods continue to find ready buyers, and prices favored sellers....The week's imports of Dry Goods amounted to $599,063 against $755,906 the correspoding week in 1857. The imports since the 1st of January have been $17,956,732 against $39,711,113 same time in 1857. The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Freights were quite active, especially for Liverpool, during a portion of the week, but they closed tamely. For Liverpool—Cotton, 3-16d. @ 7-32d. per pound; Flour, 2s. 6d. per barrel; Grain, 9d. @ 9½d. per bushel; Rosin, 2s. 6d. per barrel; Beef, 4s. 6d. @ 5s. per tierce; and Heavy Goods, 20s. @ 25s. per ton. For other ports proportionate rates. The total number of vessels of all classes in port on Saturday was 775.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were unusually heavy for Beeves, the supply of which was largely in excess of the requirements of buyers....Milch Cows were quiet, at unchanged prices, notwithstanding the diminishing receipts.—The war on Swill-Milk venders intimidates City buyers....Veal Calves were less abundant, but were also in limited request, and prices were feebly supported....Sheep and Lambs were plentier, and 25 to 50 c. per head cheaper, yet not active....Swine were more freely offered than they were needed, and prices declined a shade....The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

	Week ending May 5.	Week ending May 12.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

THE COURSE OF TRUE LOVE NEVER DID RUN SMOOTH.
ALDRICH'S NEW POEM.
Published immediately,
TRUE LOVE NEVER DID RUN SMOOTH.
(AN EASTERN TALE IN VERSE.)

This piquant little volume, by the author of "Babie Bell," tells of the haps and mishaps of two Eastern lovers whom a whimsical old Caliph endeavors to keep apart; and illustrates, in most delicious verse, the truth of Shakespeare's line, "The course of true love never did run smooth."

LIST OF CONTENTS.

I. The Caliph Muses.—II. How it struck the Lovers.—III. The Wedding Fête.—IV. How the Little Maiden Wept.—V. How Giaffer passed the Night.—VI. Hearts and Crowns.—VII. The Afrites give Giaffer a Hint.—VIII. In the Pavilion—Finale.

The book is issued in elegant style, with many dainty, quaint, and ingenious illustrations, upon fine cream laid tinted paper, and will delight the connoisseur of fine books.

Price 50 cents in muslin, or $1 50 in half calf. Sold by booksellers every where. This book will be sent by mail, postage paid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

RUDD & CARLETON,
Publishers and Booksellers,
No. 310 Broadway, New York.

A NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of HARPER & BROTHERS' PUBLICATIONS, with an Index and Classified Table of Contents, is now ready for distribution, and may be obtained gratuitously on application to the Publishers personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in Postage Stamps.

The attention of gentlemen, in town or country, designing to form Libraries or enrich their literary collections, is respectfully invited to this Catalogue, which will be found to comprise a large proportion of the standard and most esteemed works in English Literature—COMPREHENDING MORE THAN TWO THOUSAND VOLUMES—which are offered, in most instances, at less than one half the cost of similar productions in England.

To Librarians and others connected with Colleges, Schools, &c., who may not have access to a reliable guide in forming the true estimate of literary productions, it is believed this Catalogue will prove especially valuable as a manual of reference.

To prevent disappointment, it is suggested that, whenever books can not be obtained through any bookseller or local agent, applications with remittance should be addressed direct to the Publishers, which will be promptly attended to.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, Franklin Square, New York.

WILL TRUTH COMMAND ATTENTION?—To restore health we must purify the blood. Fevers, without exception, arise from foreign matters having been absorbed and retained in the circulation. These causes of sickness may produce an influenza, a croup, a rheumatism, gout, cholic, or a cough. But Brandreth's pills, simple, potent, and vegetable, remove the cause, and the cure follows, of course. They are the means of every day saving many valuable lives. Principal office 294 Canal Street, Brandreth Building. Sold also at 296 Bowery and 241 Hudson Street, at Cushman's, Broadway, corner of Twenty-second Street, and by Mrs. Hayes, 175 Fulton Street, Brooklyn. Price 25 cents a box.

CATARRH!

I am fully aware, that credulity has been taxed to its utmost, and public confidence nearly annihilated, by impositions and fraudulent pretences, in the shape of "cure alls" and specifics for every malady. As a physician of many years practice, I have witnessed with abhorrence and disgust such mercenary frauds. But I claim exemption from the charge of such duplicity from the fact—long since established—that my discovery of the nature, origin, and character, or, in other words, my pathology of Catarrh is true, and, that my treatment proves a positive and radical cure.

Applicants by letter must faithfully describe their symptoms.

WYOMING. Its History, Stirring Incidents, and Romantic Adventures. By GEORGE PECK, D.D. With Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

The Valley of Wyoming, which is no less celebrated in English poetry than in American history, has been made the scene of terrible as well as romantic legends, which are now, for the first time, sifted in the light of critical research. For more than forty years the author has enjoyed special advantages for the study of its local traditions, and has assiduously devoted himself to the collection and exposition of facts. His work consists mainly of a succession of historic scenes, each narrative being complete in itself, and at the same time forming a portion of a general description on a larger scale.

GROTE'S HISTORY OF GREECE.

Now Ready, a New Edition, with Portrait, Maps, and an Index. 12 vols. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents each.

A HISTORY OF GREECE, from the earliest Period to the close of the Generation contemporary with Alexander the Great. By GEORGE GROTE, Esq.

NIEBUHR, the Historian, in 1827.—Endeavor to become acquainted with Mr. Grote, who is engaged on a Greek History. I expect a great deal from this production.

The Quarterly Review.—The author has now incontestably won for himself the title of the Historian of Greece.

The Times.—Mr. Grote is unrivaled in the erudition and genius with which he has revived the picture of a distant past, and brought home every part and feature of its history to our intellects and our hearts.

The Spectator.—The better acquainted any one is with Grecian history, and with the manner in which that history has heretofore been written, the higher will be his estimation of this work.

The Athenæum.—A great literary undertaking, equally notable whether we regard it as an accession to what is of standard value in our language, or as an honorable monument of what English scholarship can do.

The Examiner.—The acute intelligence, the discipline, faculty of intellect, and the excellent erudition every one would look for from Mr. Grote; but they will find here also the element which harmonises these, and without which, on such a theme, an orderly and solid work could not have been written. Poetry and Philosophy attend the historian on either hand, and do not impede or misguide his steps.

The Morning Chronicle.—We have seen no historical work of modern times which we would place above Mr. Grote's history.

The Literary Gazette.—A narrative which, long meditated, patiently elaborated, and accompanied at each stage with applause and expectation, will probably never be superseded.

The Dublin University Magazine.—Mr. Grote will be emphatically the historian of the people of Greece.

Motley's "Rise of the Dutch Republic" is written with knowledge, carefulness, judgment as to the substance, and with force, life, and attractive grace of style; above all, the man has written the thing he would.—Globe.

THE present Number is the first of the Seventeenth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. The Publishers refer to the Volume just concluded as the best assurance for the character of that which is now commenced. They believe that the Magazine embraces in its general plan every thing essential to an attractive literary miscellany, adapted to the wants of the American public. Its regular circulation has not been diminished even during the unexampled financial revulsion, which has proved disastrous to so many literary and commercial enterprises; and they are assured from every quarter that the Magazine is recognized as a necessity rather than a luxury. They therefore announce no "New Features" for the future. They will continue to fill the Magazine with articles inculcating sound views in Life and Morals; leaving, as heretofore, the discussion of sectarian opinions in Religion, and sectional questions in Politics, to their own appropriate organs. Wise men and true patriots agree upon points far more numerous than those upon which they differ. The object of the Magazine will be to unite rather than to separate the views and feelings of the people of different sections of our common country.

The Publishers do not find it necessary or expedient to appeal to public attention by issuing "Specimen Numbers" containing an unusual amount of matter or illustrations. They intend that every Number shall prove the Magazine to be the best and cheapest periodical published. It will contain a larger amount of matter, more numerous and better illustrations, printed in a better manner, than any other Monthly Magazine; and the Publishers are confident that it will deserve and receive the same cordial appreciation and liberal patronage which have been accorded to it during the Eight Years of its publication.

MR. THACKERAY'S NEW NOVEL, "THE VIRGINIANS," with many humorous Illustrations by the Author, was commenced in the DECEMBER Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE. It is printed from early sheets—received from the Author in advance of publication in England—for which the Publishers pay Mr. Thackeray the sum of Two Thousand Dollars.

HON. WILLIAM M. GWIN, OF CALIFORNIA.

THE Golden State is represented in the Senate of the United States by a gentleman of wide experience, thorough culture, and great perseverance. William M. Gwin was born on the 9th of September, 1805, in Sumner County, Tennessee. He is the son of a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal Church, Rev. James Gwin, who enjoyed a wide celebrity in the Southwestern States, and whose calling and experience led him to desire that his son should be furnished with a thorough education. His father placed him under competent instructors, and himself superintended his mental training. He was severely drilled in mathematics, and early displayed a great aptitude for geometrical discussions. Indeed, he evinced a remarkable fondness for all branches of study, and thoroughly investigated the natural sciences and the classics. He finally graduated in the Medical School of Transylvania University. For some time he pursued his profession in Nashville, Tennessee, but his attention was much taken up with the study of the law, which he engaged in with great avidity, reading thoroughly the American and English commentators, and comparing the institutions of England and America. He was subsequently admitted to the bar; but he never, as his term erroneously stated, practiced in the legal profession.

Early in life Mr. Gwin was favored with the friendship of General Jackson, who knew him from his infancy, and had observed with pleasure the development of his mind. His industrious habits and strict reliability suited the old hero, who, during his Presidency, in 1833, appointed Mr. Gwin to the responsible position of United States Marshal for the State of Mississippi. Unfortunately this office afterward proved almost ruinous to his private fortune. He was continued in this position during the Presidency of General Jackson and under Mr. Van Buren. In discharging his duties he was often pained by the distress he witnessed; and in a number of instances he became security for his friends, and took from others worthless paper currency in satisfaction for executions. At a subsequent period he was obliged to sacrifice much of his own property to redeem those pledges which his unwillingness to cause distress, even in his official capacity, had prompted him to receive.

When President Harrison came into office Mr. Gwin resigned his Marshalship, and became a candidate for Congress. The district in which he resided had just given a majority of twenty-five hundred votes for General Harrison; but, in the contest for Congress, Mr. Gwin's personal popularity was great enough to secure his election, on the Democratic ticket, by a similar majority of twenty-five hundred votes, and he was duly returned to serve as a representative in the Twenty-seventh Congress. During his term of service in the House he gained a prominent position by his restless devotion to the interests of his constituents and his sagacity as a politician. At the close of his term he was re-nominated unanimously; but the consequences of his liberality and kindness while Marshal had so involved his private affairs that it became necessary for him to decline a re-election.

While pursuing his private business Dr. Gwin was appointed, in 1847, by President Polk, to superintend the erection of the Custom-houses at New Orleans, which post he filled during Mr. Polk's term, and resigned on the change of Administration consequent on the election of General Taylor to the Presidency.

Upon resigning the superintendency of the New Orleans Custom-house he removed to California, toward which the eyes of the American people had been turned by the marvelous tales of gold-finding which were just then exciting the world. He was among the earliest settlers of that wonderful country, and from the first has taken a genuine interest in its welfare. Unlike many who sought the El Dorado merely for its precious dust, and who, as soon as their "pile" was gathered, deserted their benefactress, Mr. Gwin gave all his energies and talents to the work of moulding out of the chaotic mass, which the society of California resembled from 1847 to 1850, a strong, permanent, law-abiding, and prosperous State. Perhaps the world has never witnessed a more anomalous and apparently hopeless state of things than was presented in California in 1848–49, when a large population, feverish with the thirst for gold, or intoxicated with the excess of supply spread around them, grew reckless, counting no scheme too wild and no law worthy of reverence. The whole country seemed mad, and the frenzy diffused itself into politics and government. In the midst of this excitement a few wise, far-sighted men were laboring daily by the foundations for a State that should outlast its crop of gold, and which should at once plant the North American race firmly on the shores of the Pacific, and secure to themselves and their children the blessings of liberty, education, and peace.

HON. WILLIAM M. GWIN, UNITED STATES SENATOR FROM CALIFORNIA.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRADY.]

Foremost among those who were bravely toiling for these richest nuggets was the subject of this memoir; and to his guiding hand California is largely indebted for the admirable Constitution she possesses, and for the gradual settling down of her wild hordes into the present high condition of refinement and solidity of which our young sister State is so justly proud. In the winter of 1848 it became evident that some steps must be taken by the people of California to save themselves from utter anarchy. Society was disorganized; there was no State government nor any municipal authority; the treasury of San Francisco was empty; rogues and gamblers were apparently masters of the entire country; and the only image of authority was a military governor, who had no sufficient force to carry out his mandates. In this condition of things, General Riley issued a proclamation to the people of California, directing them, among other things, to choose thirty-seven delegates to form a State Constitution. Although there was a strong opposition to this course—and, at one time, a disposition to resist it—yet, with great efforts, the people were brought to see the necessity for arriving at a State Government through some mode; and Dr. Gwin, who had been untiring in his efforts to promote the best interests of the Territory, was rewarded by receiving 1075 votes (with two exceptions the largest number cast) for delegate to the Convention to form the State Constitution.

The election for delegates was held on the 1st of August, 1849; the Convention met at Monterey on the 1st of September, the Constitution was finished and signed on the 13th of October, and on the 13th of November it was adopted by the people, and John C. Fremont and William M. Gwin were chosen United States Senators, to accompany the instrument to Congress. Thus, in less than four months, the community passed from a condition of perfect lawlessness into the order of a State, with a Constitution afterward (on the 9th of September, 1850) ratified by Congress, and the machinery of a government which soon reduced society to tolerable system. Too much praise can not be given to the few men among the pioneers who produced this happy change, and Dr. Gwin is justly entitled to a considerable share of it.

He has retained his seat in the Senate ever since, and is now serving his second term. Devoting himself steadily to the interests of his own State, he is distinguished for sagacity, business tact, and unremitting devotion to his constituents. His voice is seldom heard in debate, except to press or defend measures of importance to California; his speeches are few, but statesmanlike and logical; his demeanor is grave and impressive; his tall, magisterial form, Roman features, and gray hair, always a picture to us a senator of Nature's selection. Ordinarily an attentive observer of the public business, he is always in his place, but rarely indulges in a set speech, except allusion to California is made, when he is immediately on his feet, and sometimes fairly overwhelms his opponents with arguments in asserting the claims of his constituents.

His great desire now is to secure the building of the great railroad to the Pacific, which he feels is not only a military necessity, and justly due to the people of California, but a matter of policy for the benefit of the Atlantic States, as it will open up more advantageously the trade of the Pacific, and forever bind California to the Union—a matter which he has more than once intimated is not so certain if that great iron fetter is not forged. He has urged this matter upon the Senate this session; and as it is likely to become one of the important questions of legislation, he will long be a person of prominent interest both to the Atlantic and Pacific States. Like many of these senators, he keeps up an establishment in Washington, and the hospitalities of his mansion, presided over by his accomplished wife, form the theme of much complimentary comment in that gay city.

THE BURIAL AT SEA.

BY MARK LEMON.

THE solemn words are said,
"Let the sea receive the dead!
In its vast unfathom'd bed,
Until Time shall be no more!"
The frothing of a wave!
And the good, the kind, the brave,
Is in his ocean grave—
All his storms of life are o'er.

His mesmates stare with eyes
Of dull and long surprise,
That where their comrade lies
Not a trace should now be seen;
The waves still roll and leap
O'er the chamber of his sleep,
Down, down in the great deep,
As though he had never been.

His mesmates walk away,
And in hoarse whispers say,
"God rest him!" So they pray.
"Who doubts their prayer is heard?
When seated at their mess
They find one face the less;
Each shares his fellow duties,
Though he does not speak a word.

Some think that when again
They cross that restless main,
They'll look at him in vain
For their mesmate's place of rest,
And some will sadly sigh,
And wish that when they die
In church-yard they may lie
With those they have lov'd the best.

Death will no more end go
Without his fitting woe—
Methinks 'tis dowdy so
When he is seen in on the seas:
The World is then so small,
A Ship contains it all—
The dead man touch the pall,
How large a part was he!

THE RIGHTS OF OUR FLAG.

IT is fortunate that, at the moment when the attention of the country is drawn to a series of insults to the national flag, and one of the gravest international questions is thereby raised, the Secretary of State is a statesman who is master of the subject, and who in 1842, while United States Minister in France, wrote a comprehensive and conclusive paper upon the whole question.

The present difficulty arises from the wave of explicit terms in the existing treaty for the suppression of the slave-trade. England has been driven from the old ground of asserting a sovereign police upon the seas, so tractively claimed by Lord Palmerston in 1841. But notwithstanding the vital interest of the subject, notwithstanding the elaborate correspondence of eminent statesmen in which the question has been exhausted, treaty and world-understanding the Ashburton treaty and the letters of Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, the point is not yet in terms decided, whether the national flag is an absolute protection for the ship that carries it.

Two things, however, are very clear. One is, that the flag of the United States can not be subject to the whimsical contempt of inferior British officers; and the other is, that the recent events which have aroused such general public attention will lead to a final solution of the question. There can be little doubt how it will be ultimately decided. The flag of the nation must be sacred, as its soil is. If joint treaties are made, the opposing parties must attend to their own flags. It is better even that a sheer should pass, under the protection of the stars and stripes, than that every American vessel should be delayed, overhauled, and mistreated, whenever a foreign naval officer may see fit to sail or to fire a gun. Because, as Lord Stowell has justly decided, it is impossible to concede that a nation may "press forward to a great principle by breaking through other great principles that are in the way."

It is unquestionably true that nations may enter into treaties for the suppression of the slave-trade or of piracy; but the practical operation of those treaties must be made consonant with all other national rights, and with national honor. The tone of General Cass's letter to Mr. Dallas justifies us, by its calmness and moderation, that this will be the result of the action now pending. That very calmness is also the earnest of conscious power; and we are very confident that the veteran Secretary of State will win his greenest laurels in his triumphant vindication of the rights of our national flag.

THE MORMON HEGIRA.

By the time this paper is in the hands of the reader we shall probably know something definitely as to the accuracy of the rumors from Utah. That Colonel Kane went thither in an official capacity is hardly probable; but that his journey was undertaken with the countenance of the Government at Washington is doubtless true. And whether Governor Cumming has certified to Great Salt Lake City, and the Saints have moved away or not, there can be little question that the rumor foreshadows the fact, and that the Mormon war is virtually at an end.

It is ended, also, before it was begun. The United States troops have been in camp since their arrival last summer in the Territory. The newspapers in the States have been flooded with various correspondence from the scene of hostilities. The Mormon tabernacle echoed with the country little sparkles of unimportant rumor. We have had Brigham Young's diatribes and the experienced reader knows that the thunders of the belligerents have remained each in his own place, awaiting the spring. The spring has now opened, and with it comes the end of the theatrical dedication by the Mormons of their hostile position.

What else could they do, sooner or later? If the United States army had once engaged them in the field, the issue could not be fought out; and who could suppose that even Brigham Young would have any doubt of its issue? For him and his people the alternative was extinction by dispersion and destruction. The probabilities are, therefore, all in favor of the truth of the reported retreat of the United States Governor into the Mormon city.

If the difficulty be thus practically ended, the country will have paid dearly, but for a valuable lesson. It will not again be likely to allow a community of miscellaneous and ignorant fanatics, based upon the principle of polygamy, to encamp in a position favorable, by its remoteness and natural character, to be a fortress against the Government. It will not again commit the grave mistake of appointing the chief of the band its own Governor in that region, and will not, therefore, vote to the Administration the supreme enormous sum to undo the consequences of the error of another.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

THERE has been one grave question in connection with this enterprise, which seems now to be happily answered. Granting that the wire were safely laid along the great ocean bed to the bottom of the sea, could messages be accurately transmitted? could the electrical current be maintained? In the experiments made upon the coil at Plymouth, England, during the winter, this has been by no means clear. But since the arrival of Mr. Field in the United States the question seems to have been conclusively answered. All the experiments also, in regard to the machinery for paying out the wire, are so favorable that every thing now promises most fairly for the successful success of this great inter-continental enterprise.

SUCCESSFUL SWINDLERS.

NOT a day passes but some unsophisticated stranger acquires experience in this city at the expense of some of the numerous "establishments of punchbeck watches; the patent-safe swindles; the counterfeiting and for robbing verdant countrymen which have so frightfully made sad subjects for newspaper paragraphs, still continue, and, for aught that we know, multiply as ever. All the precautions, all the warnings in the world seem to have failed either to repress the roguery of one step further, or to inspire our rural friends with common prudence. Over the darkened letters, addressed to gull-seeking and other wishful men, the mysterious seals and coffins by the agents of the mayor within the past sixty days; most of them contained money. Very many of the letters in the Post-office previous to publication should have been a guarantee of their common sense.

As to the lotteries, they seem almost beyond the power of the law. It is well known that, in spite of all the precautionary measures which have been adopted, the business of these vile lottery tickets was never so active as it is at present. Those who have never looked into the subject would hardly believe their eyes if they saw a list of the persons, in this and other Northern cities, who are regular subscribers to the Southern lotteries. Considerably more than half the support of these pernicious institutions comes from the North. Persons of every class, ladies of wealth, clergymen, lawyers, editors, clerks in mercantile establishments, sewing-girls, and servants in abundance, regularly throw away their money in the purchase of lottery tickets. Little as we hear about it, the system is enormously universal.

These facts are not very flattering to our common sense. Neither in France nor in England do the people patronize so gross swindles as these which thrive here. The French and English have their delusions and their rogueries; but the sale of punchbeck watches is not carried on in their public thoroughfares, and illegal lotteries are not pressed upon public notice by advertisements in the papers. There is a sense of decency and propriety which drives these shameful kinds from their social page into the shade. Here, on the contrary, our rogueries and humbugs court publicity. Peter Funk's gold flag float in Broadway; the Georgia lotteries are daily advertised in the papers; Barnum writes his life to show the folly of honesty and the practical excellence of an easy conscience.

Our new mayor, Mr. Tiemann, is exerting himself very creditably to suppress some of the more glaring swindles with which the city teems. But the necessary reform can not be achieved until the healthier tone in public sentiment is established, and that which is really dishonest and dishonorable be frowned upon by the community at large.

DEAD WALLS.

THE dead wall is a literary common. Every body has a right to graze upon it, and first come the first served. The Great Singer (not he of needle-and-thread notoriety), but the contatrice, who is equally given to humming—and having it overcome herself of at least once—full, and turns out upon her portion a herd of great black capital letters, informing the public that she is ready to be paid at the rate of twenty-five cents a second. The quack doctor occupies a moderate corner, where, however, there is plenty of room for expansion. The Life of Nervous Anxiety, or "Purple Invigorator." A comic periodical—rather less in the ribs, after the manner of such cattle—will flourish in the centre, and nearly runs over a police reward of five hundred dollars for the apprehension of a man wearing a silk hat with a light complexion and whiskers inclined to red." Professor Bilks acquaints the public generally, at an angle of forty-five degrees, that his Grand Panoramic Physiological Concert will take place on Friday next, when four-and-twenty performers, all of whom have been in training for weeks, will be chosen at hazard from the audience, and made to exhibit in their own persons the most wonderful biological phenomena. Hard by the professor's announcement crawls a long, gaudy, slender invitation to go and see Blankwell's "Grand Panorama of the Celebrities of the Moon, from drawings taken on the spot," which spot means the large attic studio at No. — Bowery, where the whole affair has been gotten up by two gentlemen who have never been out of America. An infant phenomenon, who plays the Carnival of Venice on a double-bass, and sings a cavatina in words of one syllable, has established herself in one corner; while in the other, a youthful giant, who is so tall that it takes him an hour and a half to drive on his trousers, displays his wonderful proportions to a very small woodcut and very large letters. Numberless little bills have established themselves here and there, wherever there was a spare corner left by the larger placards; and a poem in praise of "Cough Candy" peeps out from behind the Great Singer. The spot-and-dotter imperfectly conceals an advertisement of a patent metallic coffin. Side by side with the police reward is a summons to the inhabitants of the — Ward, calling a meeting to consider the propriety of establishing a Vigilance Committee. The Professor of Biology is justified by an exhibition of "Laughing Gas." The comic periodical is nearly obscured by an announcement of the first number of the Spiritual Telegraph. Baubooble's Grand Panorama conducts the eye to an advertisement of a new edition of Tom Thumb's Life. The Infant Phenomenon occupies a space close to the announcement of a sermon by the Reverend Doctor Bellows; and we are side by side with a reward offered for "the recovery of papers of value that have been lost or stolen," a near passage to the information to "Nothing to Wear."

It would seem as if such arrangements had something more in them than chance. This dead wall is a type of a host of humanities or philosophers, or perhaps a little of both, and had, by aid of their paste-pot and brush, given to the public their own ideal.

To those fond of such species of observation, there is something very interesting in the mutations of a dead wall. It is the barometer of the time, and records faithfully the various changes and progress of public taste. Ten years ago the dead wall was a different character from that which distinguishes it to-day.

There were not so many Italian singers, or panoramas, or old paintings. But there were more notices of building-lots for sale, property to let, and the establishment of banks. The spaces now covered with announcements of Reynolds's loathsome novels, and Sue's highly-seasoned romances, would then have been devoted to good, solid reading-matter, such as the "Young Man's Road to Wealth," the Waverley Novels, with probably a harmless piece of trash like the "Children of the Abbey."

Then what an index of trade is our dead wall! Contrast the number of vessels advertised to sail fifteen years ago with the innumerable Flying Clouds, White Spunks, Stormy Petrels, etc., etc., of the present day. When the sailing of the first ocean steamer was announced on some dead wall in this city was a sensation it doubtless created! What groups gathered round the little placard—what solemn progressions of idlers there—what eminent shakes of the head—what dismal curiosity! Now scarce a day passes without the appearance of a host of such announcements, and we read them carelessly by, unless some one of them has a Speed es ters, and stops to read the date of the departure.

Naturalists tell us that certain animals change their coats periodically. The dead wall is diurnal in its transformations. Fashions never changed more rapidly. Observe your dead wall this morning. It is decidedly theatrical in its aspect. The imaginative management Flamboyus announces "a series of grand conciliar performances during the summer season, when the establishment known as the Flamboyant Theatre will be converted into a VAST TROPICAL GARDEN, combining Eastern splendor with Oriental magnificence, where the vernal coolness of a SYLVAN SHADE will be wedded to the histrionic delights of a Thespian temple!" So Flamboyus, with comedies and concerts, usurps the entire area. If, however, you pass that way in the fall, you will observe that the luxurious, shadowy person moving to and fro before the place—you wonder what the man can be about, and determine home to bed. Next day you call at your dead wall, and lo! it is the very odor of sanctity. Sermons, charities, donations, conversions, and the moral paraphrase of entirely obliterated yesterday's vanities; and that pious bill-sticker, whose ghostly form alarmed you the night before, has, with the addition of his paste-brush, converted the heathen surface into one great advertisement of Virtue.

TRUST IN GOD AND DO THE RIGHT.

COURAGE, brother! do not stumble,
Though thy path is dark as night;
There's a star to guide the humble—
"Trust in God and do the right."

Let the road be long and dreary,
And its ending out of sight;
Foot it bravely—strong or weary,
Trust in God and do the right.

Perish "policy" and cunning,
Perish all that fears the light;
Whether losing, whether winning,
Trust in God and do the right.

Trust no party, church, or faction,
Trust no "leaders" in the fight,
But in every word and action
Trust in God and do the right.

Trust no forms of guilty passion,
Fiends can look like angels bright;
Trust no union, solemn, solemn,
Trust in God and do the right.

Some will hate thee, some will love thee,
Some will flatter, some will slight;
Cease from man, and look above thee,
Trust in God and do the right.

Simple rule and safest guiding,
Inward peace and inward light;
Star upon our path abiding,
TRUST IN GOD AND DO THE RIGHT.

THE LOUNGER.

JOHN BULL.

THAT Mr. Bull is the wisest, most Christian, and most enlightened of the great citizens of the world there is not the slightest doubt—in his own mind. That he is a great bully and brag, and never tries to whip a very lofty tone, and makes a most unscrupulous estimation of superior wisdom by so doing, is the decided opinion of his cousin, Mr. Jonathan. That Mr. Bull shall cruise in his frigates along Mr. Jonathan's very wharves, and fire at him, and stop him, and insult him, is Jonathan's belief. But Jonathan will blow all the treaties to thunder before he will submit.

They have made a contract together to look out for slavers. But slavers may run up any national flag they choose. If the flag is to be taken as an evidence of nationality, what is to prevent the perfect unanimity of a ship's flag? Clearly, when there is reason to suspect a vessel to be a slaver, she may, in the interest of humanity, be overhauled and examined unmolested, whether an English flag, or a French flag, or an American flag. But the extremeness of proof must be conclusive. Mere suspicion might be wrong. The suspected vessel is not to be assumed to be a slaver, and fired into, and her crew killed. If this is done, it is done at the risk of the officer and of his Government. When a treaty is made to prevent the dishonor of a flag, it is done because that flag is respected, and because the people who bear it are resolved to defend its honor. If it is not to be counterfeited by a common enemy, it is certainly not to be insulted by a friend. If it shall not protect a pirate, it surely shall not be subject to the spite and jealousy of an ally, and every country must look out for its own flag.

This question has been pretty thoroughly argued between Mr. John and Mr. Jonathan. They have even passed from words to blows; and there is no reasonable doubt that Mr. Jonathan has finally made up his mind on the subject. He will not allow tuppenny officers of Mr. John to stop his ships in an insulting and vexatious way to gratify their national or individual antipathy. He would like to know what John would say if he should cruise about the Irish and English channels, or the Bay of Biscay, and fire, at his own sweet will, into passing vessels. Mr. John may say that there are no slaves brought to the neighborhood of England or France. That is very true; but under my treaty of "rights for the weak" tuppeny officers can expect where they please. And while humanity rejoices at the prospect of the slave-trade, yet, like the captain to whom its execution is intrusted can not execute it properly, the treaty itself must be abrogated.

As for the present difficulty, it is mainly interesting as showing the state of the public mind. There is, undoubtedly, a disposition to repel the first insolence of Mr. John, because, when his first blow is delivered, he hits harder. Therefore it is also a just feeling in regard to the treaty, as was shown by the miserable farce of a meeting at the Exchange to condemn the spirit of some resolutions practically annulling the treaty passed at an informal meeting.

Mr. John and Mr. Jonathan ought to dwell together in unity, for their own interest and for that of the world. As the other gentleman says, "It is he in no hurry to pick a quarrel—for two reasons: first, Monsieur Johnny Crapeaud is engaged with Mossoey here. If he should try to flog Mr. Jonathan, Mr. Crapeaud would come dancing over the channel, and the Massoey boy would set up Yo-ho, and lay his fore-paws in the Mediterranean. With the bear's paws and Crapeaud's legs on that sea, Mr. Bull's little trips to and from India would be very awkward. In fact, there are many reasons why Mr. John will probably submit to silly little officers, and inform Jonathan, with an air of loftiness, that he need not lose his temper for nothing.

INFELICISSIMUS!

To all literary men in the city of New York Henry William Herbert was more or less known. With uncertain antecedents in his own country, with a furious and unpardonable temper and habits of intoxication, a long and happy life was not to be expected. Yet when, a few weeks since, his accidental death was announced, it moved us to a hope of something brighter and more peaceful—a hope that has disappointed us.

That he was very wretched, and that he had reason to be so, no man can doubt. He was born a gentleman; his liberal associations and taste led to appeal to every honorable aspiration; he was literally and thoroughly educated; he was endowed a cloud to a foreign country to live by his wits; he brought with him his terrible temper; he fell into wretched habits; and, last, was subjected to a mortified pain; the avenging Nemesis came in the form of a history of his faults and infirmities, and, as a gossip to his wife; she left him, refused to see him, and he died himself. You will find us in the cemetery, just outside of the gate, where he is interred, for the last time, to look at her beloved face." "I forgive all men who have wronged me," and ask forgiveness of all whom I have wronged." "Think of me, sometimes, as a most miserable man." "I leave my small, very small, property to——, with this inscription: 'Henry William Herbert, of England, aged fifty-one years. Infelicissimus!"

There is nothing so odd but "pray for him" and that every kind soul will do. However intemperate, irascible, reckless, he may have been, there is something piteous in his death. He might have been cowardice—it might have been crime. For no man has a right to shrink from whatever is laid upon him. But over the grave the pall of pity is made. Think how we all love life—how we cling to it when it seems only misery—how we shrink at the thought of its close. Shall we not, then, believe that even a man quietly arranges his worldly affairs—says farewell to his friends, and ends it—trusting that though the human instinct forbids suicide, God can judge how guilty it is—and shall we not believe that he was very wretched, and write in silence upon his head-stone Infelicissimus!

THE BROOKLYN MERCANTILE LIBRARY.

NEW YORKERS do not often remember that just across the river is the third city in the country. It is just across the river, but it seems across an ocean. People travel to Boston and Philadelphia, and see all the intermediate cities; they never go to Brooklyn on their way to anywhere. We cannot enumerate our cities, we name all these with Savannah, Charleston, and New Orleans, but Brooklyn gets rarely a mention. The citizens of New York mention it as a dependency of "the metropolis"—the citizens of other parts of the country suppose it to be a suburban town.

It is not worth a visit for its entirely unique character. When the stranger comes to the Battery, the Astor Library, and the Crystal Palace, let him go to Brooklyn. He will find a fine harbor and splendid city, with broad and stately avenues stretching off into the island, and, from its position, commanding as a prospect the whole of New York.

He will find noble and beautiful residences, and clusters of churches. With the same characteristic pastors. But, although he stands in the third city of the country, and situated upon the finest commercial shipping-bosom, he will look in vain for a great shipping-house, for a busy Exchange, for a cloud of industrial pippers, for the dust and roar of traffic. He will find well-furnished and quiet shops in the principal streets; but at the hour of high Change, when the American genius of trade is most active, he will see a city strangely silent—children playing and soldiers exercising, but nobody in an inland town. It has no theatre, no opera, no epera-manager, no actress, no singer. It has plenty of sermons and lectures, and is full of flourishing public institutions of charity and education. It has also its full share of young men.

These young men have lately formed an association like the Mercantile Library in New York, and they now propose to establish a Library. The city has just introduced pure water, and now it aims at good books. They belong to Brooklyn, and are the body—pure literature for the mind. A city is really the citizens—not the houses or the ships. If you want a fine city, a great and noble and beautiful city, you must have great-hearted, rich, generous citizens. Then all else will follow—will wish will follow—in science, in letters, in charity, and in art. You will have beautiful buildings for every noble purpose. You will have galleries of pictures, of statues, and casts. You will have lecture-rooms and museums, and every good thing known. You will have the best orators and singers and actors. You will heal the sick, and feed the hungry, and help the unfortunate; and you will have the most unflinching and searching preaching in the churches; and rows of books, so that the scholar can pursue any study with profound thoroughness without crossing an ocean or a river.

Whoever reads good books frequents the best society of all times and countries. Whoever, in fact, never founds a library throws open the doors to a company whose presence is sweet and inspiring. Whoever goes in when the doors are closed, pays and stronger and better. If all the citizens of a town were alive to the great influence of good books, the ministers would wonder what secret power it was in them.

If the young men of Brooklyn will use the Library they are so gallantly establishing—if they will give to the managers no peace until they have commands as they have to put money in their purses—and when they have bought Shakespeare and Milton, will read Shakespeare and Milton—they will leave them upon the shelf as a monument of a large sense of mental and intellectual duty to a city. I should they not read the works they buy?—then the Library will be beautiful both inside and out. And how could the Library of a Mercantile Association be better inaugurated than by recalling that memory of one of the most illustrious men to expend merchant and an English scholar, whose books had been of such service to him, that when commercial disaster overtook him, and he, like so many man, those books, which were his dearest possession, had been sold, with how to part with them, and he wrote in farewell:

"TO MY BOOKS.

"As one who, destined from his friends to part,
Regrets his loss, but hopes again erewhile
To share those pleasures and enjoy their smile,
And tempers as he may affection's dart;
Thus, loved associates, chiefs of elder art,
Teachers of wisdom, counsellors of my toil,
My serious hours, and lighten every toil.
I now resign you, but with fervent prayer
For pure a few short years, or days, or hours,
And hopeful trust that we shall meet again."

And all your sacred fellowship restores,
When, freed from worldly shackles and its power,
Mind shall with mind direct communion hold,
And kindred spirits greet in peace no more."

WHO SHALL BE PUNISHED?

SOME dozen persons have been killed by the falling of a bridge upon the Central Railroad, of which the end was a mass of ruins. It is natural, and a just thought, by intelligent observers, to be mere punishment of the contractor, before the accident. A jury, called to sit upon the dead, have rendered a unanimous verdict that the catastrophe was caused by gross and culpable neglect of management of the road.

Who is to suffer? Of course the Company must pay whatever damages can be proved against them. But who is to suffer in such a way that these accidents will be prevented? It is a murder without malice, improvidence without crime, or should wholesale murders without malice? It is, in a certain sense, the same kind of crime; because, although the guardians of such a road may not always be careless, yet the peculiar method of traveling upon a railroad requires the management of the most careless insensitive, which in ordinary roads and ways might be endurable.

Now it is the duty of the supreme direction to appoint suitable officers for all the varieties of service; and when the public safety is put in jeopardy and carelessly treated, in consequence of the incompetency of any officer, such results as this of the Sunpoint Bridge occur, it is clear that no general charge of neglect is sufficient to satisfy the public conscience. Who is responsible? verdict against individuals? It was somebody's business to see that the Sunpoint Bridge was in order; and there is no question that it was entirely unfit for its purpose—that somebody is guilty of the most wholesale neglect. The contractor or bridge keeper leaves the draw of a bridge open on a dark night, and a train runs into the chasm. Nobody is to be arrested except that the Turnpike Company is careless? But here is not an act of forgetfulness that any man may commit—it is an act for which the wood has become punk—which, if the inspector understood his business, he either knew to be unfit for service, or which he had neglected to examine; two trains meet upon it; the bridge falls; there is the inevitable result.

If that inspector does not deserve the extremest punishment inflicted by the law for manslaughter what offender can? And if he did not understand his business, then the same indictment should lie against the man who appointed him unfit. There is no excuse that he came well recommended, or that they supposed him fit for the place. In appointments involving such risks as those of railroads personality must there must be the most absolute certainty.

Why not, then, circulate and sign petitions to the Legislature that there shall be a more stringent criminal legislation in cases of railroad accidents? Think of the sickening railway disasters during the last dozen years to the destruction, by neglect, of time, the collisions, the breaking and opening of bridges—for all of which some engineer, or conductor, or overseer was directly and personally liable—and how many, when they have escaped, have been criminally punished? Think of all the catastrophes of the same kind in store for us—and then let us ask whether we will do something or nothing; and, when the nearest and dearest are brought to us mangled and dead—or we are brought to them—whether will be the better feeling to know that "somebody" was culpably careless? Let "somebody" be sent to the State Prison.

CHARLES READE.

AMONG the recent young English authors, Charles Reade has made his mark decided and extended reputation. His first stories, Christie Johnstone and It is Never too Late to Mend, published one or six years since, and a peculiarly fresh, sparkling, pungent talent was immediately recognized. There was some delay in their republication in this country; but when they were republished, there was something so sympathetic with the American genius in their pithy, pointed, rollicking, and racy style, that they have re-echoed in our applause back to England, until he is one of the most prolific and popular English writers. In a recent London and Westminster was observed one of the issue of the fifty-fourth thousandth of his Novel, It is Never too Late to Mend, and the twenty-first thousandth of his Christie Johnstone, known to us as White Lies. The first of these books has been published in this country within a year, and the last but a few months.

For England this is extraordinary popularity even in the days of Uncle Tom, of Dickens, and of Macaulay. It is not so great as that of the Spectator, but then considering the difference in cost, unparalleled in literature. There were not a sixth of the readers then in England that there now are. There was no cheap literature for the masses of consequence. But of some numbers of the Spectator—a daily journal—twenty thousand copies were sold by Mr. Macaulay tells us, and the volumes went off by the two thousand. But in this day, when there are such swarms of penny and sixpenny books, that a work should get to its fifty-fourth thousandth in less than two years, is evidence either that its author is a man worth listening to, or that, at least, people think he is.

A NEW SINGER.

THERE is a peculiar theory among illiterate persons that newspapers are wickedest of men; that if you wish to know what is happening in the world, and intercourse with inhabitants of other lands, look into the newspaper. Now the Lounger defies any intelligent being to determine from the reports in the newspapers of the singing of Mademoiselle Titiens, in London, whether she is a great singer, or only a fashionable singer. One paper says that her voice is unsurpassed for richness of tone and quality by any voice of our time." Another says, it is not; that it is about a equal to any Teddy Treffle's. One paper says that she has acquired a most unique method of the delivery of her art. Another says, she has not. One declares that in the part of any great singer—and another that she is not.

Now it would be a dreadful thing to suspect either that things are, that the critics do not know whether she were a really fine singer or not; for then, of course, they could be influenced in the expression of their opinions by any private considerations.

The truth is that critics—the Lounger speaks of theatrical, not of literary, critics—are just the rollicking set that would be, if they can not bear to say an ill word of any body. A manager sends them a ticket to a secured seat. They go and hear horrible screeching, and behold execrable acting. But they say in their hearts:

"Here's a poor man or woman doing the best they can. They have a very sorry profession which compels them to stand before the public, and if we say what we think we shall be hissed as it pleases. They have families, too, dependent upon them.

The children at home may be sick or weary, but the author-mother must be present upon the stage, and feign a sorrow in one way when her heart is in another. Moreover, if we say they get a miserable pittance, and the popularity of most of them is sadly brief. See how they try—see how they exert their energy! Why should we serve up our acrimony upon them to-morrow in print, as if they were our enemies? We do not care for them, and who would do no better in their place? Let let people come and pay their money. These wretched actors deserve it for their dreary toil through the evening. If they fail to please, they have another engagement shortly, or to help them make hay while the sun shines. And then when the dismal truth leaks out—when it is known that they are not worth paying money to see (although by honest work they earn their wages)—when their engagements are not renewed, step by step, the step ladder of poverty, that touches bottom between knees where—when they grow old and withered and powerless, pitched with want and hunger, die forsaken and forgotten in a garret—we shall not have it to say that we hastened their end destiny by a single word."

That is what they say in their hearts, these critics who daily toil at all the theatres last evening. But they are mortal, too, and when the critic favors Medea with his opinion of her acting, he does not look for enthusiastic praises of her performance; and when Judith is called the tragic muse, she must not less our breath, but remember the private possibilities.

It remains a question still, therefore, whether the new singer, Teresa Titiens, is to be ranked with Malibran and Jenny Lind, or with the lesser goddesses.

THAT CHRISTIAN.

SOME weeks since the Lounger spoke of the presence of a Christian in the city of New York—a man of an unusual and primitive kind of Christianity, who was calling in the poor and feeding them, not because they were good or industrious or went to school or were regular at church, but because they were his fellow-creatures and hungry. He has now published a report of last winter's work in this way, from which it appears that he furnished 220,031 "meals," including those sent out to the sick at home. The provisions were of the best quality, beef, pork, fish, beans, soup, with bread and potatoes, and coffee for breakfast and supper. The average cost was seven cents and a fraction per meal. Now did he feed their mouths only with food, but their hands with work, for every kind of employer thronged to his saloon, and 1171 persons thus obtained employment.

Mr. Farmer declares that he is abundantly paid for all he has done in the way of relief for the needy the wants of so many worthy people, who without his aid would have come to him as they were in the one usually adopted, and thus he wishes in every ward during the winter would be of the utmost use, and would be sure to meet with no less a man who would, because his gifts are, in some measure, misapplied, make the greatest error of his whole life by refusing those who need help.

The only practical difficulty seems to us that if eating-houses should be opened in all the wards for all who chose to come, there would be a great deal of waste of time upon the hands of the guests which might not be so needfully and industriously employed as it would be if they depended upon their work for their dinner. Perhaps there are a great many deserving people who are not able to get work, who are really starving, and who are most worthy recipients of such relief. But the very problem of charitable action is how to discover this class. In the case of that class if they fed all who came for food, the city would soon be bankrupt.

Notwithstanding which, we must all be very glad that Mr. Farmer has shown us the happy results of conformity to the simple rule of the gospel. And whatever may be the problems of society, one thing is very certain, that if we were all of the mind of the good Samaritan of No. 47 Ludlow Street, the Millennium would not be very far off.

BROWNING UPON SHELLEY.

"MR. LOWDOWN.—Last week you spoke of Trelawny's book of reminiscences of Shelley and Byron. Can you recall Browning's poem upon Shelley, which seems to me to be one of the best his own admirers did for Keats? I am sure many of your readers would be glad to see it.

"Yours truly, LOVERS OF VERSE."

Here is the poem. It is intensely dramatic, like every thing of Browning's.

MEMORABILIA.

I.

Ah, did you once see Shelley plain?
And did he stop and speak to you?
And did you speak to him again?
How strange it seems, and new!

II.

But you were living before that,
And you are living after,
And the memory I started at—
My starting moves your laughter.

III.

I crossed a moor with a name of its own,
And a use in the world no doubt,
Yet a beauty strange as it abhors alone,
Mid the blank waste counterpane.

IV.

For there I picked up on the heather,
And there I put inside my breast
A moulted feather, an eagle-feather—
Well, I forget the rest.

WHERE ARE YOU?

THE famous question of Mr. Spenlow may well be asked of the Lounger's head of a Book-case. Last week the Lounger spoke of the Viceroy of Lombardy-Venetia declaring that he would not allow the Congress of Paris to discuss the Italian question inevitably advanced. And in France, within a few weeks, young Mr. Hutchinson, of the American Legation, Count Sheer Khan of Persia, Mr. Layard has married the daughter of the Duchess of Montmorenci and the granddaughter of the flower of flowers in the names of the old French noblesse.

Of course there were people to hold up their hands. Even the morning nothing of Archbishop Cheshunt (whose marriage is a matter of public comment), which accepted the invitation to be a true young fellow and very rich, the Lounger reads in his wedding announcement, and in the times. It naturally belongs to a country like this to prove to other countries that nobility is an affair of one's own manhood and womanhood, not of one's great-grandfather. There is a sense of weakness inexpressible from the impression made by every man whose manner seems to refer you to his ancestors for his credentials. "Ah!" you instinctively say, "if you are such a little matter, I will go and look." Let every man stand upon his own feet. If any body has illustrious ancestors, they are only the reverent standards of his own character and conduct. Instead of honoring a timid man because his grandfather was brave, we despise him the more for that very reason.

The only danger in the missionary enterprise implied in an American's marrying a foreigner of rank is, that the missionary himself may be converted! Many Americans think fear is the seat of any cordial, sincere American. Wherever such a man goes, and in whatever position he is placed, he represents, ideally, free institutions and human equality.

TRAVEL NOTES IN BIBLE LANDS.

No. XXXIII.

The Fight at Laodicea concluded.—The Robbers captured.—A Treaty.—Our Sudden Flight.—Return to Philadelphia.—Route to Sardis, and Arrival there.—The Golden Pactolus.—House of Croesus.—Temple of Cybele.—A Memory of the White-robed.

My last closed abruptly in the midst of the battle of Laodicea, for as we call it when we recur to it. I am compelled to begin and end there sketches abruptly; and I can only beg pardon for their extreme rudeness. One whose best writing is done on the smooth side of his saddle when he lies down to it in the evening in his tent, must be content to write crabbed sentences, if he will persist in writing at all.

The field was ours, for the enemy had fled.

We now took a little breath, and looked at each other.

"A pleasant reception in Laodicea, Peter!"

"Rather, John."

"Are any of them dead?"

"Not unless that tall fellow yonder broke his neck. How his horse kicks! Put the poor beast out of misery, John."

Steenburger emptied his revolver into the heart of the animal. At his first shot the two Turks looked up; at the second they stared; at the third they seized each man his turban; and at the fifth they buried their faces in the dust. "Fools to have fought with men who carried the weapons of Satan himself!" doubtless they both said; but again I could not understand them.

By this time our people arrived. They had heard the first shot, and hastened toward us.

Demetri, our interpreter, from Smyrna, soon learned who our friends were; and we were not a little annoyed to know that they were not robbers —at least, not professional gentlemen of the road. They were messengers from the Aga of a neighboring village, sent to demand backsheesh; and they had demanded and got it. Unfortunately for them, they did not ask in the right way.

"Shall we run, or shall we stay and brass it out?" This was the question.

We concluded for the present to stay, and to stay in grand style. To be foremost, we adopted a novel style of Eastern diplomacy. We sent Demetri to the Aga to say that we had captured four of his people; that they were alive and well (barring two headaches); that they had attacked three of the lords of the West, governors of nations toward the sun's setting, who were strong, and powerful, and bold—and a great deal more of the same sort, the gist of which was that, if he didn't come and apologize before sunset, we would, at that time, broil them alive, and eat them without salt.

It was a cool message in such circumstances, but it was worth trying, since the chances seemed very poor in any other way.

Miss Grandison behaved like a soldier's daughter. On my honor I do not think she had a particle of fear about her. She laughed, joked, and even showed a little pistol that she always carried, and I doubt not would have used it.

The Aga came half an hour before the time set. An extra large campdire blazed against a rock; and for a warm evening this looked suspicious. Our negotiation was long, but it was satisfactory. We squared accounts just where we stood, only agreeing that we should keep one of our captives as a hostage, and that we might remain two days at Laodicea. All this completed, we parted, and the Aga retired to his village, an hour distant.

"Miss Grandison, are you inclined for a night ride?"

"I am ready for any thing you think proper."

"Then pleas to gather your strength; for when the moon rises to-night we must be off, bag and baggage. Three hounds will be on us in droves before morning; and I shall try to sleep in Philadelphia to-morrow morning, instead of Laodicea to-night."

It was a fearful ride, especially the crossing of the Meander. But we did it; and at eight o'clock next morning we were descending the slops of Tmolus and re-entering Philadelphia. We had done in twelve hours by night what is usually full sixteen hours' work by day. We amused ourselves by wondering what effect the first volley had on an empty tent which we left standing at Laodicea, and whether the scoundrel we left on the ground outside got the gag out of his mouth in time to save his throat from the fingers of his own kindred. Chatting of this, and in fine spirits at our safe arrival, notwithstanding our fatigue, we rode into the streets of the city, and put up at a khan which we found better than our former quarters. We remained two days in Philadelphia to rest ourselves, and then set out for Smyrna, by way of Sardis.

The latter city is too hours from the place of brotherly love, but the sands of Pactolus are no longer golden.

The evening was sadly beautiful when we came down into the valley and approached the ruins of the city of Croesus.

The dark, muddy stream of the river was for a little while like the metal for which it was once renowned, and flowed slowly along, as if the weight of its wealth was great.

Our tents were pitched near two columns that stood in lonely majesty on the plain, not far from the Pactolus, though at a distance of nearly a mile from the more extensive relics of the city.

Of the remains of Sardis the most stately and imposing are those two Ionic columns, which are the last upright portions of the great temple of Cybele. The temple itself was commenced in the sixth century before Christ. Whether these pillars are of that date may be doubted, but that the temple was founded as early as that the Grecian historians leave us no room to doubt. It stood in the time of Croesus, who, you will remember, was defeated by Cyrus. The Gerrasis, or House of Croesus, as it has been called, is in fair condition for a building of two thousand years old. It is, in fact, one of the best preserved relics of antiquity north of Egypt.

Never was moonlight more beautiful, never were stars more clear, than that night over the Acropolis of Sardis.

As I sat in the tent-door smoking and quietly talking there came over me a vision, or a memory, of exceeding beauty and power. In the solemn atmosphere that seemed to be like the escaped light of heaven, I began to believe I could see around me those who kept their robes unspotted in Sardis.

I had always from boyhood a very strong desire to see Sardis. There was something in that promise of white raiment to those who should be faithful—something in that undique reward, "They shall walk with me in white"—which produced a lasting impression on my mind.

Some time when you go down the Ohio you will perhaps stop at a little town on the bank where there is a church and a belfry near it, and an old parsonage not far off, and a grave-yard also close at hand. Many such villages are there on the Ohio, but to me none such as that. It seemed so strange to sit on a fallen column at Sardis and talk to John Steenburger of the old church and the minister who, twenty years ago, preached one Sunday morning from the text, "And they shall walk with me in white." It seemed so strange to recall that sermon in the moonlight of Sardis. Its words rang in my ears; not rang—that is not the expression —they sounded in my ears like distant music, like the deeper notes of an Æolian.

Long ago the old clergyman put on his white robes forever and forever.

Long ago I saw him laid in the church-yard. And there was one—I may name her here, dear Ellen Layton, fairest and best of women, the pastor's daughter—whose memory is not out of keeping with moonlight on Sardis; who now is one of those that walk in white with brow of radiant purity.

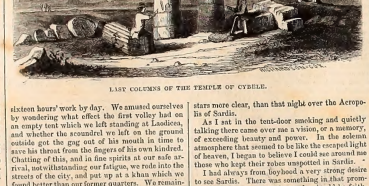
Who knew that did not love her? Who remembers that does not weep to think of her? She was a slight, fair, fairy child, with light blue eyes and golden hair, and a voice full of the very melody of heaven.

Lo I, a wanderer on the plain of Sardis, sitting in my tent-door, low down my head and honor her pure and perfect loveliness with the tears of a strong man.

Ten years ago, the very evening that I was at Sardis, she left us on the banks of the Ohio. Ten years ago she went from this world of ruined cities and a ruined race to the company of the White-robed of Sardis.

"And she shall walk in pure white light
With Jesus and princes abroad;
And she shall summer high in bliss
Upon the hills of God!"

"Hey, Peter—what's that? Poetry? Are you muttering rhyme to yourself, and giving us none of it?"



"Ah! John, I was thinking of Ellen Layton."

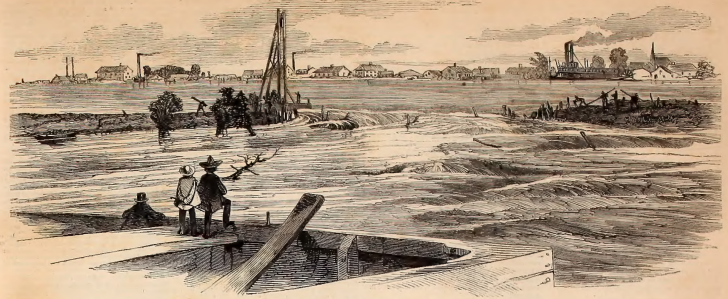
"Who is Ellen Layton, Peter? One of John's friends? It is time I learned more of his former attachments since he professes so much devotion to me. Who is the lady?"

"Lady no longer, dear Miss Kate. She once was a lady, but she is now a saint."

Perhaps my voice impressed her. She, too, was silent, and leaned her head on her father's shoulder. John lay on the pile of carpets just outside the tent. The light of the rising moon poured in on us all as we sat together silent, thoughtful, and sad.

Thus passed the evening at Sardis, and the Pactolus rolled its yellow sands seaward, nor staid to look on the wandering Americans.

LAST COLUMNS OF THE TEMPLE OF CYBELE.



PLAIN AND RUINS OF SARDIS.

THE GREAT BELL CREVASSE.

OUR NEW ORLEANS correspondent furnishes us three interesting illustrations, on the opposite page, of the great crevasse on the plantation of J. M. Bell, Esq., one mile above the city of New Orleans, and on the opposite side of the river.

The surface of the valley through which flows the Lower Mississippi is in many places several feet lower than the usual surface of the river. This is kept in its proper bed by means of an immense embankment of earth, strengthened in places by piles and planks, and called a levee; which levee extends along what is called the Acadian coast, for many miles above New Orleans. That city and the many fair villages and rich cotton and sugar estates along the river bank, have only this levee between them and destruction; and the annual rising of the waters is, therefore, to many thousands a reasonable cause of anxiety. The State keeps the levees in proper repair; a State engineer is appointed, who has this department of the public works under his charge; and we believe the State Government is held to a certain degree responsible for damage done to private property by the destroying with it, whatever of loose timber, trees, and common drift-wood it meets or washes from the shelving banks. If the river were straight but little harm would be done. It is in the short curves, which so abound on the lower river, that the mass of water and drift-wood is dashed with tremendous force against that part of the levee which protects the lower part of the curve. This is the especial point of resistance. Here, when news is brought from above of a freshet, the engineer gathers his forces, and endeavors to strengthen the embankment with buckings of rows of piles, heaps of sand-bags, and whatever is calculated to aid in keeping back the roaring flood.

Our correspondent writes: "This crevasse occurred a few feet below the house of J. M. Bell, Esq., on his plantation. The breach is over two hundred feet wide, and fifteen feet deep, while the water pours through the opening at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and the surrounding country, for fifteen miles back, is navigable for boats. They began to repair the break by driving three rows of piles across; but had got only about half the distance from each side when the mighty waters swept away piles, pile-driver, flat-boats, and every thing connected with the works. The strongest piles were bent back from their erect position to an angle of forty-five degrees, and the raging flood swept over and submerged them, thus rendering the repairs utterly useless." Our first illustration of the levee, and consequent overflow of the adjoining lands.

tration shows the break or crevasse, as viewed from a flat-boat in front of Mr. Bell's sugar-house. Beyond the break is the river, whose raging flood is pouring in upon the submerged land. On the point to the left is seen a pile-driving machine in a flat-boat. In the second illustration the crevasse is seen from the side, Mr. Bell's residence being in the back-ground. The third is a sketch of the submerged tract, viewed from the levee. The three will give our readers a proper idea of the manner and force of a crevasse.

One who visited the crevasse says: "We took passage from Algiers (opposite New Orleans) on one of a regular line of skiffs—proceeded along the track of the Opelousas Railroad, which is submerged, to Gretna, and then dodged about for openings in the fences through which our boats could pass, until we reached the break in the levee."

The great and long-continued rise in the Mississippi has endangered the levee at various points. The waters had, at latest accounts, risen to within about nine inches of the high-water mark of 1850—which year saw one of the most destructive floods known to the inhabitants of Louisiana. The crevasse which occurred in that year a few miles from New Orleans fairly submerged the city, to within two or three blocks of the levee. For several weeks all business was carried on in boats. Fears have been entertained that a similar disaster would be the consequence of the recent rise in the river; but so far the levee works on the New Orleans side of the river remain intact, and it is to be hoped that they will be kept so until the subsidence of the waters, which must happen shortly.

LITERARY.

Fred Markham in Russia (Harper & Brothers) is the title of a capital book for the young, by W. H. G. Kingston, who is already well known to them. In this he takes them with him to the land of the Czar, tells them all sorts of stories about the men and the curiosities there to be met with, gives them an occasional ride in a drosky or a sledge, or down an artificial ice-hill on a sled, shows them the serfs and the lords, takes them out hunting, and visits imperial palaces; in short, makes Russia familiar to his young readers by the pleasantest incidents and anecdotes, and by fine illustrations which ornament the pages. We can promise the young one who gets this book a delightful companion in Fred Markham.

Douglas Jerrold's Wit is not so fresh and sparkling on paper as it was from his lips. Still this book, which Ticknor & Fields reprint, is a most amusing companion, and will be hereafter the standard jest-book. Higher position can not be hoped for it. Wit, so called, is not wit technically. Sharp repartee, sarcasm, irony, satire, all these may exist in great perfection where there is little or no true wit; and this volume reduces the estimate we have been accustomed to place on Jerrold's wit in conversation. Many of his reported sayings are flat, many are rude, many were old and threadbare before Jerrold was born. On the other hand, some are choice and delicious, and there are enough of these to make the volume a desirable book for a reader, though it must be regretted, for Jerrold's reputation, that it has been collected.

Sheldon & Blakeman publish an excellent translation of Dr. Adolphe Monod's treatise on Woman, her Mission and Life, with a biographical sketch of the author, whose name is now so well known in this country.

The Course of True Love never did run Smooth (Rudd & Carlton), is a dainty little volume of verse, by T. B. Aldrich, the execution of which reflects great credit on all concerned. Mr. Aldrich has done his part toward making it a charming poem, and the publishers have done theirs by clothing it in a suitable garb. It is printed in antique type, on heavy yellow paper, and adorned with many quaint devices in the shape of head and tail pieces in Arabic. The subject of the poem—the Marriage of Giaffar the Barmecide with the sister of Haroun al Raschid—is peculiarly fitted to the caste of Mr. Aldrich's mind, and he has steeped it through and through with the rich light of poetry. It has faults, of course (for what young poet is without faults; nay, what old one either? if you come to that); but its spirit and tone are excellent. Mr. Aldrich's descriptions of Eastern life, manners, and scenery are remarkable for their depth and brilliancy of coloring, and, what is better still, they are perfectly in keeping with his theme. The wedding fête of Giaffar will bear reading after the Arabian Nights, which is the highest praise we can give it.

A fourth volume of the strong Sermons of Mr. Spurgeon appears from the press of Sheldon & Blakeman. The young Englishman grows more serious, and, if possible, more powerful, in these. We note a greater sense of responsibility, and perhaps more of consequent humility; while there is none the less of frank, bold, hearty, outspoken truth. The same publishers issue a little book, by W. P. Balfern, Glimpses of Jesus, which is popular in England. It consists of lessons derived from the example of Christ in various circumstances of His life given us by His biographers.

The Rambles of a Rat is an amusing little book, published by Carter & Brothers, in which there is much quiet humor and satire on men, brought out by the adventures of some of the family of Mus.

Another book for the younger folks, published by Carter & Brothers, is Flora, or Self-Deception, by A. L. O. E., who is popular with children as the author of "The Giant Killer," and some other safe and good books.

The Quaker Soldier is the title of a new American novel, published by Peterson—author unknown. It is much above the ordinary run of novels. Portions of the book are not excelled by Cooper; and many chapters remind us so forcibly of Simms's best works, that we should attribute the book to him but for some other portions which we do not think so practiced a novelist as Mr. Simms would have written. There is too much of the book, and history is too willingly sacrificed for the story; but the book is readable, and will make a mark. Peterson also publishes The Belle of Washington, a novel, wherein men, women, and things at the Capital are made to reappear on paper. Some of the actors are said to be sketched from life.

Ticknor & Fields publish another of Mayne Reid's stories, Ran Away to Sea, which is the history (told by himself) of a boy who ran away from home and shipped on a vessel which turned out to be a slaver. After numerous adventures on the coast of Africa, she ships a load of slaves and, escaping a cruiser, puts to sea, but takes fire and is destroyed, the hero being rescued on a raft, where he comes within an ace of being devoured by his hungry companions, and is finally glad enough to get back to the home he ran from.

Some time since we noticed the publication, by Ticknor & Fields, of a volume of the Sermons of the late Rev. F. W. Robertson, the eloquent rector at Brighton, whose death was so mourned that strangers in the place imagined one of the royal family dead. They now publish a second series of his sermons, characterized by the same boldness of speech and compactness of thought. One of the sermons, on the doctrine of Baptism, is a remarkable effort, worth the price of the volume to read.

Rudd & Carleton have republished Miss Mulock's new book, A Woman's Thoughts about Women. Although it is essentially English in its chief characteristics, it is, nevertheless, worth every woman's reading, and we are glad to see it printed in America.

Dick & Fitzgerald have done the boys a service by issuing The Magician's own Book, with the assistance of which, it can not be doubted that ingenious youngsters will be able to astonish one another, scare their sisters and mothers, and with a reasonable amount of application, outdo Adrian and Blitz themselves. The book is abundantly illustrated, and promises stores of fun for evenings at home.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

In the Senate, on Monday, a resolution for the protection of American vessels against British aggression was introduced by Senator Seward, and passed. After some unimportant business, the various appropriation bills were taken up and passed as reported.——In the House, the case of the door-keeper, Hackney, occupied no little attention. He was dismissed by a vote of 141 against 34. The House refused to suspend the rules in order that General Quitman might introduce his resolution regulating the admission of future States. Mr. Chappel tried, unsuccessfully, to bring the House to agree to hold evening sessions. The House refused to consider a resolution by Mr. Morris, of Pennsylvania, for a revision of the tariff so as to produce more revenue. Mr. Barksdale, of Mississippi, offered a resolution, which was adopted, in reference to outrages upon our vessels in the West Indies by British ships-of-war.

The proceedings in the Senate on Tuesday were important. On motion of Mr. Douglas, the Oregon bill was taken up by the casting vote of the Vice-President. A long and interesting debate ensued, in the course of which Mr. Gwin and Mr. Douglas insisted upon the right of Oregon to exclude Chinamen and free negroes. A vote being reached, upon Mr. Trumbull's motion to postpone till December, it was lost; ayes, 16; nays, 38. The bill then passed; ayes, 37; nays, 17. So Oregon is admitted as far as the action of the Senate is concerned. A bill was passed for surveying the Texan boundary. Mr. Green introduced a resolution to settle our difficulties with New Granada, Nicaragua, and Mexico. It was referred.——In the House, Joseph L. Wright, of New Jersey, the Democratic candidate, was elected door-keeper, in the place of Hackney, dismissed. The Civil Appropriation Bill was then considered in Committee of the Whole. The amounts in the bill foot up $3,819,000. Some amendments were effected, among which were appropriations to the amount of $10,000 for life-boats on the coast of New Jersey and light-boats on Long Island Sound. The House refused to hold an evening session, and adjourned.

On Wednesday, in the Senate, on motion of Mr. Seward, a vote was taken on the bill to improve the harbor of Chicago. It was lost, 22 to 34. This vote was understood to be a test on harbor bills generally. A resolution was offered by Mr. Pugh in relation to the Tehuantepec route. The bill to repeal the Fishery Bounties came up, and the amendments being rejected, the bill passed by a final vote of 30 to 25—the repeal to take effect a year from the 31st of December next. The Homestead Bill was next taken up, but the Senate adjourned without a vote thereon.——In the House, the case of Brooks, who contested the seat of Davis, of Maryland, was dismissed. Mr. Davis, therefore, keeps his seat. The Civil Appropriation Bill was then taken up, and was subsequently reported to the House from the Committee of the Whole.

In the Senate, on Thursday, Mr. Hayne, the new Senator from South Carolina, appeared and took his seat. Private bills and propositions for pensions occupied the morning, and the rest of the day was devoted to hearing a lengthened speech from Mr. Johnson, of Tennessee, in favor of his Homestead Bill. There was an Executive Session, and after that the adjournment.——In the House Mr. Fenton, of New York, made an unsuccessful effort to introduce a resolution looking to the payment of claims to the amount of ten millions, and to a modification of the Tariff. Mr. Harris, of Illinois, reported in favor of Messrs. Phelps and Kavanagh, the members from Minnesota; whereupon a discussion arose, which lasted two hours—the Democrats striving to come to a vote, and the Opposition interposing parliamentary delays. Without any decisive action the House adjourned.

In the Senate, on Friday, an unusually large number of private bills were disposed of, and the private calendar was nearly cleared—a thing which seldom happens in Congress. Little business of public interest, and none of special note, was performed.——In the House almost the whole day was occupied in discussing whether the two members from Minnesota should be sworn in. The subject was postponed to Saturday.

No important business was transacted by Congress on Saturday. In the Senate Mr. Mason offered a resolution calling for information about Mexican and British outrages on our commerce. Mr. Wilson offered a resolution, which was agreed to, looking to retrenchments in the public expenditures. A discussion then ensued on the Homestead Bill.——In the House the topic of the day was the Minnesota election case; and Messrs. Phelps and Kavanagh, the members from the new State, were admitted to their seats by a vote of 135 to 63.

THE BRITISH AGGRESSIONS UPON AMERICAN COMMERCE.

On the 19th inst. the President sent a brief Message to the Senate transmitting divers documents in reply to the resolution on the late British outrages. Among these documents is a letter, dated May 4, to Lord Napier, from Secretary Cass, in which the latter refers to the act of the British war steamer Styx in overhauling and firing into the American merchant vessel N. B. Borden, off the coast of Cuba. The Secretary transmits to his Lordship a copy of a letter from the Collector of the Customs at Savannah, inclosing a statement of the captain of the N. B. Borden, by which it appears that an unjustifiable act of violence has been committed against a merchant vessel of the United States, to which the attention of her Britannic Majesty's Government is requested, in the confident expectation that the act will be disavowed, and such measures adopted as are called for by the circumstances, and as will tend to prevent the recurrence of similar proceedings hereafter.

Lord Napier replies, May 16, that he had the honor to receive Secretary Cass's letter, conveying an account of the circumstances which are alleged to have attended the boarding of the American vessel, N. B. Borden, by Her Majesty's steamer Styx. He says he has transmitted copies of General Cass's communication to Her Majesty's Government and to the Commander-in-Chief of Her Majesty's forces on the West India station.

THE INSTRUCTIONS TO MR. DALLAS.

In a letter dated the 12th inst. General Cass informs Mr. Dallas of the outrage committed by the British war steamer Styx. The Secretary says: "I beg you would communicate to Lord Malmesbury the earnest desire of the President that this practice, which seems to become more prevalent, of detaining and searching American vessels, should be discontinued, and that the most peremptory order for that purpose should be given and enforced. Such a measure is called for by important considerations, which will readily occur to you. While the Government is determined to use all proper exertions for the suppression of the slave-trade, it is not less desirous that the just immunities of vessels of the United States upon the ocean should be preserved, whatever may have been the true object of it."

In another letter to Mr. Dallas, dated the 18th, Secretary Cass mentions other cases of forcible detentions and searches of American vessels by British armed ships-of-war in the Gulf of Mexico and adjoining seas. After stating that every particular case will be made the subject of reclamation upon the British Government, the Secretary goes on to say: "In addition to these aggressions on the high seas, an indefensible act of violence against several of our merchant vessels, said to be eleven in number, a forcible entry and examination has been committed by a British armed steamer in the harbor of Sagua la Grande in the Island of Cuba. No authentic report has reached the Department with the exception of a letter from our Consul-General at Havana, and of which a copy is transmitted. Proper measures have been taken to procure all the necessary information, which will be forwarded you. When all the facts have been ascertained, proper representations will be made without delay to the Government of Her Catholic Majesty, against this search of American vessels by the naval force of another power, within the territorial jurisdiction of Spain. The Government of the United States is satisfied that the Government of that country will adopt the most efficient measures to protect their vessels resorting to Spanish ports from lawless violence. Such protection they are entitled to; and if it is not secured elsewhere it must be found in the power of our own country."

The Secretary adds: "These flagrant violations of the rights of the United States have excited deep feeling through the country, and have attracted the attention of both Houses of Congress. Their continuance can not fail to produce the most serious effect upon the relations of the countries. The President confidently believes that the British naval officers, in the adoption of these high-handed measures, have acted without the authority, and have mistaken the views of their Government. But it is not less due to the United States that their conduct shall be disavowed, and peremptory orders issued to prevent the recurrence of similar proceedings."

NAVAL INSTRUCTIONS.

In a letter to Secretary Toucey, dated May 13, General Cass says, that in view of the outrages committed on our commerce, it is proper that a war-vessel should be dispatched to the Gulf, with instructions to give protection to all American vessels that need it.

The Secretary of the Navy, in a letter to the President dated the 19th of May, says that the United States steamer Fulton, Captain Almy, had been ordered to cruise actively on the northern coast of Cuba, and take such measures as may be deemed necessary to protect all vessels of the United States on the high seas from search or detention from vessels of war of any other nation. Orders have been also given for the preparation of the razee Savannah and brig Dolphin to join the home squadron for the purpose of cruising in the neighborhood of Cuba, and that the steam-frigate Wabash, now fitting out in New York as the flag-ship of the Mediterranean squadron, has been directed to show her flag in those waters, and protect at all times the persons and property of American citizens.

THE REPORTED MORMON SUBMISSION.

Various reports have reached us affirming that the Mormons have submitted to Federal authority. The reports certainly need confirmation before they can be received as true, and we give them without indorsement. The first news of the kind, representing that Brigham Young himself was anxious for peace and had invited Governor Cumming to assume his official duties, was undoubtedly an exaggeration. It is mentioned, however, as a fact, of which there can be no doubt, that Governor Cumming had received assurances of protection if he would visit the Salt Lake City, and that he had consented to do so. This information was communicated to the St. Louis Republican by a gentleman who left Camp Scott on the 10th of April. The Republican says on the subject: "In order to account for this change in the aspect of affairs, it may be well to premise that Colonel Thomas L. Kane, who was sent out as a Peace Commissioner, by way of California, arrived in Great Salt Lake City on the 25th of February; that he remained there eight days; that after that time he proceeded to Camp Scott; that, while there, he frequently passed from the camp to a place of conference with the leading Mormons, outside of the city; that in pursuance of negotiations then entered into, Governor Cumming left Camp Scott for Great Salt Lake City on the 5th, and was met by a gentleman on the 9th, on Weber River, two days' travel from the city. He was accompanied by Colonel Kane, and escorted by Porter Rockwell, H. Egan, and other Mormons. His arrival was anticipated on the 11th, and handsome apartments were provided and preparations made to receive him in good style. A gentleman who knows all about the Mormon people, and was just from Salt Lake City, told our informant that the general feeling was in favor of peace, only a portion of the leaders, perhaps those who had offended against the laws, advocating resistance."

Later intelligence announces the arrival of Colonel Kane at Leavenworth. Colonel Kane is reported to have stated that Brigham Young had abdicated, and that Governor Cumming, at last dates, was thirty miles from Salt Lake City, accompanied by a deputation of fifty Mormons sent to meet him.

OFFICIAL DOUBTS ABOUT THE UTAH NEWS.

The Washington Union says: "It is hardly necessary to say that we distrust the telegraphic news which announces the capitulation of the Mormons and the establishment of peace in Utah. It is not improbable that Mr. Kane, who is but a private person, having no commission of any sort from the Government, has succeeded, through his mysterious personal relations with the Mormons, in inducing that people to invite Governor Cumming to Salt Lake City, and to recognize his official authority. If this be so, and Governor Cumming has actually proceeded to the Mormon city, some armistice or truce may hereafter result from his presence in the city; but it is altogether improbable that the war has come to the sudden and abrupt termination announced by the telegraph. These advices, through private channels, it must be remembered, are unaccompanied, as usual, by concurrent advices through official channels; for no confirmation has been received of them by the Government."

MORMON DUPLICITY.

A writer in the Washington Union, who has lived among the Mormons for a year, and knows the habits of the people, assures us that they will never submit to the Federal Government. He says: "The recent news from Utah is precisely what might have been expected. It all originates from Mormon sources. Colonel Rich, through whom the intelligence comes to the St. Louis Republican, is one of the Twelve Apostles of the so-called Mormon Church, and was, till called home last fall by Brigham Young, the apostolic head of the Mormon settlement at San Bernardino, California. Deception is the great lever by which they hope to overthrow the republic. They deceived Mr. Fillmore and his Cabinet, who appointed Brigham Young Governor of Utah. They deceived Mr. Pierce and his Cabinet, and led them into the same inactive policy that so unfortunately characterized Mr. Fillmore's Administration. They hoped and relied on their agents, 'not known as Mormons,' to deceive and mislead Mr. Buchanan and his Cabinet; hence the prophecies of Brigham to his followers, that there would be 'no fighting'—'the Lord would fight their battles for them'—'they would live in Utah to make and gather many crops unmolested,' etc., etc.; on these prophecies the people relied with religious faith, as did Brigham and his coadjutors, till it was discovered that Mr. Buchanan and his Cabinet could not be deceived and misled by them. Now we are assured that Mr. Kane has succeeded in his mission, that the Mormons have laid down their arms and invited Governor Cumming into Great Salt Lake City."

THE SUPPOSED MORMON RETREAT.

The White River Mountains, to which it has been said the Mormons propose to retreat when they leave the Salt Lake, are thus described by the same writer: "This district of country is situated in the southwestern portion of the Territory of Utah, bounded on the west by the Sierra Nevada Mountains, on the north by the Humboldt River Mountains, on the east by the Desert and the southern spurs of the Goose Creek Mountains, on the south by the Sierra Nevada and the intervening spurs of the great Sierra Madre Mountains. This throws them about six hundred miles further into the mountain fastenings of the continent, in the midst of the richest gold district on the Pacific coast. By this movement they hope to allay the apprehensions of the Government and the public at large, while they will push forward with redoubled force and energy their schemes of immigration, colonization, and accumulation of native wealth and munitions of war."

SUICIDE OF "FRANK FORRESTER."

Henry William Herbert, familiarly known by his nom de plume of "Frank Forrester," committed suicide at the Stephens House in this city at about two o'clock A.M. on the 17th inst. During Sunday the 16th he was in the company of his friend, Mr. Phillip Hone Anthon, and was very much depressed in spirits. He had frequently threatened that he would put an end to his life. Mr. Anthon sat up with him on the night of the suicide, with the view of preventing the unfortunate man from laying violent hands on himself, and of bringing him, if possible, back to reason. The two were conversing together when Mr. Herbert retired, apparently for a moment, to the bedroom adjoining. A few seconds after he disappeared Mr. Anthon heard the report of a pistol, and Herbert came staggering back, exclaiming, "I told you I would do it." The blood was pouring from a wound in his chest, which he himself had inflicted. He must have torn his shirt aside and presented the muzzle of the weapon against his bare body. The servants of the house were quickly summoned, but Henry William Herbert was beyond the reach of medical aid. He lay on the floor, groaned a few times, and then died.

THE LAST WISHES OF THE DECEASED.

Mr. Herbert left two extraordinary letters, one directed "To the Coroner," and the other "To the Press of the United States." In the former he says: "To avoid all trouble, and simplify your duty, I have to state that I have taken my own life by a pistol-shot, no one being privy to my doing it, or to my design. My reason for this act consists in no remorse for what I have done, or left undone; from no pecuniary pressure, from no inability, or fear of inability to support myself, from no weak fear of public opinion, least of all of the public opinion of Newark, which I do now, as I always have done, utterly disregard and despise, from no embarrassment arising from any indebtedness. The reason for this act, then, is simple. My life, long, sad, solitary, and weary, and without an object, has become utterly hopeless, hateful, and unendurable. A hope had been kindled in my heart again; my home had got a light in it brighter than sunshine; my life had a purpose; I loved her unutterably. I was immeasurably happy—all this has been dashed down—all is lost forever. Home—hope—sunshine, she—let life go likewise, since, henceforth, it is only another word for torture."

In his letter to the Press Mr. Herbert said: "Of my private history few men know any thing—fewer, still, know much—no one knows the whole; it can not concern the public to know any thing. As a writer, let me be judged—as a man, let my God judge me.

"I implore not praise, not a favorable construction—I implore silence. For what I have to account with God let me account with God, and not with man, who may uncertainly perceive and distinguish facts, but certainly can not perceive causes, and divine motives and intentions.

"I do not even ask charity; I only implore silence. Let the good that I have done, if any, be interred with my bones; let the evil also. For the evil, I can say positively, is such as can do no evil after me. I have taught, I have inculcated, I have put forth nothing which I did not believe to be good and true. In all my life I have written no line of which I am ashamed—no word which I desire to blot.

"I have done many things wrongly, many things of which I am ashamed, many things of which I have sincerely repented, many things under the pressure of poverty and necessity, to which I am not accustomed by my education, which, I hope, I should not do again under any temptation.

"I am very sorry. I have been weak at times, and have fallen—who has not done so?

"For justice' sake, for charity's sake, for God's sake, let me rest. I bear an honorable name; I have striven hard, in great trial, in great temptation, in a foreign country, in a false position, among men who did not, perhaps could not, sympathize with me, to keep it honorable. As you would have your own name honored, and your sons preserve them to you, I charge you, do not dishonor mine.

"I leave the means, I believe, if they be carefully managed, to pay every thing that I owe, and perhaps to leave a small surplus. I never shrank, while I was alive, from meeting the consequences of my deeds face to face. I never said a word to a man's back which I would not or did not say to his face.

"Remember now, all you that would assail me, that my back is turned forever—that henceforth, forever, I can disprove no slander that is spoken of me: that with me no witness can be ever more confronted; that from no accusation, how false soever, can I prove myself not guilty. Of all cowardice, the most base and cruel is to strike the dead, who can make no defense or answer.

"Remember, also, when you judge me, that of all lives mine has been, almost, the most unhappy. No counselor, no friend, no country, have been mine, for six-and-twenty years. Every hope has broken down under my foot, as soon as it has touched it. Every spark of happiness has been quenched as soon as it had been kindled. If I have sinned much, and sorrowed much, I have also loved much—more, perhaps, than I have either sinned or sorrowed. It is the last drop that overflows the golden bowl, the last tension that breaks the silver cord. My hope is gone—my last love and my life go together, and so good-night to Henry Herbert.

"May 17, 1858."

MR. HERBERT'S LIFE AND WRITINGS.

Mr. Herbert, who was in his 52d year, belonged to a noble English family. He was the son of the Reverend William Herbert—formerly Dean of Manchester, and eminent for his poetical and scientific writings—and grandson of the Earl of Pembroke. Henry Herbert was educated at Eton and Cambridge, and took his degree in 1829. Reverse of fortune brought him to this country in 1831. For some years afterward he was engaged as teacher of Greek in the school of the Rev. Mr. Huddart, and at the same time he edited the American Monthly Magazine. In 1835 he published a historical romance entitled "The Brothers, a Tale of the Fronde;" in 1837, a novel entitled "Cromwell;" and in 1839 another historical tale, entitled "Marmaduke Wyvil, or the Maid's Revenge." In 1846 appeared the "Roman Traitor," a romance founded on the conspiracy of Cataline. In 1848 he published a metrical translation of the Prometheus and the Agamemna of Æschylus. In 1851 he published "The Captains of the Old World;" and since then the "Cavaliers of England," the "Knights of England, Scotland and France," and the "Chevaliers of France." But the works by which he is best known, and will be longest remembered, are those on the game of America. His first works of this class were his "Field Sports" and "Fish and Fishing" of North America. His last published volume was on the "American Horse." Mr. Herbert was twice married. He was only wedded to his second wife in February of this year, and the manner in which he was introduced to her was, of itself, quite a romantic incident. Last November, as the story goes, he stood talking with a friend in Fifth Avenue, and saw a lady pass, who attracted his attention. The "Bread or Work" excitement was at this time at its height; suddenly two cadaverous ruffians rushed by, and one of them struck the lady in the face, saying, "What right have you got to wear fine clothes?" She screamed—Herbert rushed to the rescue, demolished the ruffians, accompanied the lady to the Brevoort House, where she resided, gave her his card, received her thanks, and learned that her name was Miss Adele R. Budlong, and that she lived in Rhode Island. This adventure led to a correspondence and a courtship, and on the 16th of February following Herbert married Miss Budlong. The bridegroom was 51 years of age, and the bride had not seen twenty summers. Herbert was of an extremely passionate disposition, and of irregular and eccentric habits. His young wife, probably, did not understand the strange character to which she was mated; and being unable to agree, the bride and bridegroom of six weeks' standing parted forever. Grief at this event, and at the refusal of his wife to see him again, were declared by Herbert himself to be the cause which prompted him to commit suicide. Mr. Herbert had lived for several years past at his residence called "The Cedars," near Newark, New Jersey. Thence he was carried to the Cemetery and buried; but no sacred words were said over his grave, for it was the grave of a suicide. It was his own wish that the word infelicissimus should only be engraved on his tomb, and, perhaps, it would be his most appropriate epitaph.

PERSONAL.

General Persifer F. Smith, Commander of the Utah forces, died at Fort Leavenworth at half past twelve o'clock on Monday morning the 17th instant. The General had been for a long time seriously ill with chronic diarrhea. His remains left Fort Leavenworth for the East on the 19th. General Smith was born in Philadelphia in November 1798. He followed the profession of the law in New Orleans until the breaking out of the Florida war in 1836, in which he commanded the Louisiana volunteers. He did not enter the regular army until 1846. He served with great distinction during the Mexican war, and in 1847 was promoted to the rank of Major-General for his gallant conduct and valuable services at Contreras. At the conclusion of the war General Smith was ordered to California, where he held command of the Military Department. He afterward held a similar command in Texas, and lastly at St. Louis.

On the night of the 18th instant Anson G. Phelps, Esq., died very suddenly at his residence in this city. Mr. Phelps was distinguished among New York merchants for his philanthropy, public spirit, and wealth.

The celebrated Dr. Robert Hare died in Philadelphia on the 15th instant at the advanced age of 77. For many years Dr. Hare has been regarded as an unimpeachable authority in chemical science. His discoveries have been valuable and numerous; and, for this reason, his fallacies, of late years, should be charitably passed over. During a considerable period previous to his death Dr. Hare was a practical believer in the absurdities of "Spiritualism," and much of his time was taken up with the fantastic delusion that he could convert baser metals into gold.

Mr. Robert Purviance, Sen., died, recently, in Baltimore, of which city he was an old and prominent resident. He saw service at the battle of North Point.

The Albany Knickerbocker revives the story of the "last Bourbon." A lot of old cash books belonging to the Albany firm of B. & J. R. Bleecker, extending from the years 1799 to 1802, have recently been examined, from which it appears that firm were the bankers of a French gentleman, named De Jourdin, who arrived in Albany in 1799. De Jourdin was an attaché of the French Court, and arrived here with a lad whom he announced as the son of the King of France. The venerable Mrs. Blandina Dudley, founder of the Albany Observatory, is the principal witness to prove the identity of this youth. She claims to have a perfect recollection of the arrival of the parties in Albany. The Rev. Eleazer Williams, professes to be able to prove that he is the boy who was with De Jourdin, first at Albany, then at Whitehall and Fort Edward.

Governor Trousdale, American Minister in Brazil for five years past, has returned to his home in Tennessee.

The Turkish Admiral and suite visited the Navy Yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, on the 19th, where they were received by a salute. They partook of a collation at the house of the commandant, and afterward dined at Rockingham House, the Mayor presiding. The Turks expressed themselves greatly pleased with the yard, especially with the three-decker Franklin, which they examined throughout. The Admiral was to remain a few days at Boston, whence he would proceed to Niagara Falls and to other places of interest in the country.

Inkpadata, the terrible Indian chief, whose band committed so many murders in southern Minnesota, last summer, has been captured.

Captain Phillips, the leader of the New Orleans "Thugs," was brutally murdered in that city on the night of the 20th.

Sir Henry Bulwer, formerly British Minister to the United States and one of the negotiators of the famous Clayton-Bulwer treaty, has been appointed British Embassador at Constantinople.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

THE Parliamentary proceedings for the week ending the 12th inst. have been interesting. In the House of Commons the bill abolishing property qualification for members of Parliament had been debated, and was passed to a second reading amidst some cheering. The question is regarded as a significant test on the subject of Parliamentary reform, and meets with Government support.

On the 10th, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Shaftesbury gave notice that on the 14th he should move a resolution condemning the conduct of the Government in publishing their dispatch to the Governor-General of India.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Cardwell gave notice that, on the 13th inst., he should move the following resolution: "That this House, while it abstains from expressing any opinion upon the policy of any proclamation issued by the Governor-General of India in relation to Oude, has seen with regret and serious apprehension that her Majesty's Government has addressed to the Governor-General of India, through the Secret Committee of the India House, a dispatch condemning in strong terms the conduct of the Governor-General of India; and that they are of opinion such a course on the part of Government must tend, under the present circumstances of India, to produce a most prejudicial effect, by weakening the authority of the Governor-General, and by encouraging further resistance on the part of those who are still in arms against us."

THE BRITISH PRESS ADVOCATING AMERICAN EXPANSION.

The London Times, in a late number, published an article, which has attracted attention, on American expansion southward. The Times says, in effect, that absorption of the weaker republics of Central and South America by the United States can not be long delayed should America now pursue the course that seems imminent. The change as regards the English interest, assuming that the Americans will honestly provide for the existing debts of the various States in question, can not but be a great improvement upon their present position. The writer thinks that far more opposition will be shown to the extension at home than abroad.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

All the wire of the Atlantic Telegraph has been removed from the tanks at Keyham, excepting about 200 miles, which are in the course of removal, at the rate of about two miles per hour, to the Niagara. Up to 9 o'clock of the 1st of May she had received 1070 miles, viz.: ward-room coil, 312; hold, 338; lower deck, 170; and main-deck, 250. The last-named will receive from thirty to forty more; the after-tank, on deck, 200 miles; and a second deck forward 150 miles. The balance of the wire is daily expected from the manufactory by the Adonis and another steamship. The total length shipped last year was 1255 miles; this year the Niagara will take 1468. Across the after-tank there is a stage, on which is fitted, right over the cone in the centre, a horizontal flanged wheel, with the spindle fore-and-aft; from this wheel the wire runs once round a vertical revolving barrel, and is then guided by a horizontal roller to the paying machine over the stern. This coil will be discharged first, and will be followed by the main-deck coil, then the lower deck and hold, and finally the ward-room. The Agamemnon has received all her portion of the wire from Keyham, and, like the Niagara, is expecting some from the Adonis. She has in her upper deck 233 miles; orlop, 95; and main-hold 932. Here, then, is space for 210 additional miles, which will complete her lading to 1470 miles, about the same quantity as that on board the frigate, and, like her, 200 miles more than last year. The measurement is by statute miles.

PORTRAIT OF SIR COLIN CAMPBELL.

A writer in the London News thus describes Sir Colin Campbell, who, by-the-way, will be immediately raised to the peerage for his eminent services in India. He says: "Sir Colin's is a most remarkable countenance. Beneath a solid brow expressive of comprehensive combination, and above a mouth bespeaking immovable firmness, his eyes look out with what at first appears a dreamy heaviness, but which impresses us, when longer looked into, with the conviction that they see every thing. The turbulent close-curling hair is in keeping with the features, and adds to the unique expression. The whole bespeaks a man who can bide his time, but who, as soon as the moment for action comes, strikes home with the resistless rapidity of the lightning."

ALLSOP'S VOYAGE TO AMERICA.

A correspondent of the Yorkshire Gazette writes: "I ascertained yesterday that some friends of mine, a gentleman and his wife, who have recently gone to New York, made the voyage in the same packet with Allsop. He was particularly attentive, rendering them many little services, such as an old voyager can perform for young travelers. He became a general favorite on board, and great surprise, as well as regret, was experienced when it was found that a reward was offered for his apprehension as an accomplice in the horrible attempt of Orsini and Pierri, in the Rue Lepellitier."

CHARLES DICKENS ON LITERATURE.

A grand dinner was recently given in London in honor of the inauguration of the new exhibition of pictures and sculpture at the Royal Academy. Sir Charles Eastlake occupied the Chair, and a brilliant assemblage of guests sat down to table, including some of the first nobility and first statesmen of the land. In answer to a toast to literature, coupled with the names of Dickens and Thackeray, the former said: "Following the order of your toast, I have to take first part in the duet to be performed in acknowledgment of the compliment you have paid to literature. In this home of art I feel it to be too much an interchange of compliments, as it were between near relations, to enter into any lengthened expression of our thanks for the honor you have done us. I feel that it would be changing this splendid assembly into a sort of family party.—[A laugh.] I may, however, take leave to say that your sister, whom I represent, is strong and healthy—[A laugh]—she has a very great affection for, and an undying interest in you; and it is always a very great gratification to her to see herself so well remembered within these walls, and to know that she is an honored guest at your hospitable board."—[Cheers and laughter.]

THACKERAY'S SPEECH.

Mr. Thackeray then said: "My Lords, Mr. Chairman, and Gentlemen,—Permit me to say that had it not been for the direct act of my friend who has just sat down, I should most likely never have been included in the toast which you have been pleased to drink; and I should have tried to be not a writer but a painter, or designer of pictures. That was the object of my early ambition, and I can remember when Mr. Dickens was a very young man, and had commenced delighting the world with some charming humorous works of which I can not mention the name—[Laughter]—but which were colored light green, and came out once a month.—[A laugh.] This young man wanted an artist to illustrate his writings, and I recollect walking up to his chambers with two or three drawings in my hand, which, strange to say, he did not find suitable.—[Laughter.] But for that unfortunate blight which came over my artistical existence, it would have been my pride and my pleasure to have endeavored one day to find a place on these walls for one of my performances. This disappointment caused me to direct my attention to a different walk of art, and now I can only hope to be 'translated' on these walls, as I have been, thanks to my talented friend Mr. Egg—[Hear, hear.] I shall, however, ever think with pride and pleasure of my name having been mentioned from that chair, always connecting it with the person who first sat in it. You, Sir, know whence he came, and we, gentlemen, are all aware that the knight of Plymouth has not left the knight of Plympton behind him.—[Cheers.] Sir Joshua Reynolds was one of the most delightful of men, and to have been well spoken of from his chair is one of the greatest gratifications I could experience.—[Hear, hear.] The men of my profession have long been connected with painters. I myself have had the happiness to number several among the dearest friends of my life. You yourself, Sir, have mentioned that Goldsmith always attended these anniversaries; and I understand that Johnson too was present in the very last year of his life. Despite the shortness of his breath, he delighted to walk up the stairs of the Royal Academy, and sit at the feast of the good Sir Joshua. And we who have no asthma, nor any long steps to get up—[A laugh]—shall always be happy to receive your welcome and partake of your hospitality." [Cheers.]

FRANCE.

SUING FOR AN IDEA.

The Paris correspondent of the London Globe writes: "Talking of les braves Belges, we were treated to a most laughable trial before the civil tribunal, between a celebrated Belgian painter, Mr. Stevens, and a Mr. Vandenhall, his compatriot, keeper of a beer-shop and Belgian cookery, in the Faubourg St. Antoine. Finding few customers, the cook applied to the artist, who suggested a bold plan to placard the neighborhood with 'Splendid sausages served at three sous, all hot! two gold Napoleons inserted in each hundred!' Crowds came, there was luck about the house, till it was remarked that the nuggets were generally found on the plates of a select set of customers. Fair play is a jewel, a general row was the result, the kitchen was gutted, and the splendid sign-board, 'Saucisson d'or!' dragged down ignominiously. Stevens sued for 15,000 francs, the value of his 'idea:' Vandenhall held a bill of Stevens; both were laughed out of Court, lotteries being illegal in France, except for clerical purposes."

RACHEL'S GUITAR AND LABLACHE'S SNUFF-BOXES.

The sale of Rachel's effects has been going on for some days in Paris. The famous guitar was put up, but the auctioneer was fairly shamed into the admission that it was equally authentic with the various apocryphal articles brought from Palestine at the time of the Crusades, and the fall of the Byzantine Empire, now scattered through Spanish, Italian, French, and German churches. In point of fact, it never was played on in coffee-houses by young Eliza Felix at all; and accordingly it fetched its intrinsic value, six francs. It is said that Sarah Felix has caused a sheriff's officer to seize the copy a French lady artist made of her sister Rachel's photograph, she claiming copyright in that painful effigy. It was taken after death, which occurred, as often described in the Old Testament, with her "face to the wall;" that wall had to be broken through for the purpose.

Lablache's snuff-boxes are going for enormous prices; 6000 francs is not an uncommon bid for some. The Garrick enamel miniature was thought cheap at 3000 francs.

RUSSIAN GALLANTRY.

A celebrated cantatrice, now "starring" it in Paris, lately received from a Muscovite prince a handsome brooch in diamonds, in acknowledgment of admiration; but not wishing to accept a gift, the motive of which might be misconstrued, she returned it with warm thanks. Next day she received a letter from the prince, approving highly of her decision, but the writing in this letter had a singularly glistening appearance, and it was afterward found that the magnate, not to be outdone in generosity, had reduced the returned diamonds to fine powder, with which he had besprinkled the wet ink, and had thus insured the acceptance of his homage!

INDIA.

INTERIOR OF THE KAISERBAGH.

The special correspondence of the Times, from the seat of war in India, received here by the last mail, completes the series of graphic accounts given by Mr. Russell of the Fall of Lucknow. We quote from his last letter, dated March 20: "The Kaiserbagh can not be described. The place is a series of palaces, kiosks, mosques, all of fanciful Oriental architecture—some light and graceful, others merely fantastic and curious, connected generally by long corridors arched and open in the front, or by extensive wings, which inclose the courts and gardens contained within the outer walls. In every room throughout the endless series there was a profusion of mirrors in ponderous gilt frames. A universal gilding of cornices, furniture, and every thing that would bear the process, seemed the prevailing taste in the Royal Court. From every ceiling hung glass chandeliers of every age, form, color, and design. As to the furniture, in many instances it looked like collections from the lumber-rooms of all the old palaces in Europe—Louis Quatorze clocks and cabinets, renaissance mirrors and chairs, buhl-worked ebony chests, marqueterie tables, solid lumpy old German state-chairs, gilt all over; but these were relieved by the richest carpets, by sumptuous divans, by cushions covered with golden embroidery, by rich screens of Cashmere shawls, and by table-covers ponderous with pearls and gold. In some of the rooms there were a few good pictures, said to be by Sir Joshua Reynolds, Lawrence, Zoffany, and Beechey, but I did not see any traces of Sir Joshua on the walls when I entered, and there was only one picture which looked at all like a Lawrence. There were numerous portraits of the present and former kings of Oude, and oil copies of the portraits of Governors-General, of Wellington, Nelson, George IV., and Bonaparte, many Chinese drawings, French crayons, and English engravings of all sorts—even those from 'Williamson's Wild Sports of the East,' an old, and almost forgotten book on tiger-hunting—in gorgeous frames; but the hand of the spoiler was heavy among them all. Those hung out of the reach of the musket-stock or bayonet were scarcely safe from a bullet or the leg of a table. Down came chandeliers in a tinkling, clattering rain of glass—crash! crash! crash! door and window, and mirror and pendule! Sikh and soldier were reveling in destruction, and delirious with plunder and mischief. Those who could not get in at once to carry on the work searched the corridors, battered off the noses, legs, and arms of the statues in the gardens, or, diving into cellars, either made their fortunes by the discovery of unsuspected treasure, or lost their lives at the hands of concealed fanatics. There was no time to guard against indiscriminate plunder, inasmuch as it never was expected that the Kaiserbagh and all its treasures would have fallen that day into our hands. It was stormed at once, but it could scarcely be said that any great resistance was offered by the enemy.

PILLAGE OF THE KAISERBAGH.

"Our men were in high delight with the gay dresses of the eunuchs which they found in some of the rooms, and it was with difficulty they were induced to take off the crowns of lace and peacock's plumes, and bird of paradise feathers, and the sword-belts they stuck over their heads and shoulders. In the next court, which was sheltered from fire by the walls around it, our men had made a great seizure of rich plunder. They had burst into some of the state apartments, and they were engaged in dividing the spoil of shawls and lace and embroidery of gold and silver and pearls. In a nook of this court where there was a little shade, we retired to rest ourselves, as there were no means of approaching the front, part of the buildings being on fire, and explosions of mines feared every moment. Two men of the 90th were in before us, and, assisted later by some of the 38th, we saw them appropriate money's worth enough to make them independent for life. The rooms off this nook had been used as stores by the King or some wealthy member of his household, and each moment these men went in only to emerge with a richer trophy. In one box they found diamond bracelets, emeralds, rubies, pearls, and opals, all so large and bright and badly set, that we believed at the time they were glass. In another was a pair of gold-mounted and jeweled dueling pistols, of English make, and the bill, stating that his Majesty the King of Oude owed the maker £280; then out they came with bundles of swords, gold-mounted and jeweled, which they at once knocked to pieces for the sake of the mountings, leaving the blades behind them. Next came out a huge chemical laboratory, then a gold saddlecloth, studded with pearls; then gold-handled riding canes; then cups of agate and jade, gold-mounted and jeweled; then—but I must really stop this broker's inventory. The happy possessors of these riches were quite mad with excitement. 'Is this gold, Sir?' 'Is that a diamond?' 'Is your honor shure that's raal goold?' 'Is this string of little white stones (pearls) worth any thing, gintlemen?' It was a great drawback to have a conscience under such circumstances—a greater not to have a penny in one's pockets, for in this country no one except an old stager on the look-out for loot carries a farthing about him, and, as one of the soldiers observed, 'These here concerns only carries on ready-money transactions?' He was an experienced operator, that gentleman. If a native soldier came in and walked off with any thing which he found in a dark corner, out pounced our friend upon him, rifle in hand, 'Leave that there, I tell you. I put that there myself!' and there was something in his eye which explained his meaning so clearly that the article was at once abandoned, and if found to be valuable was retained; if not, was 'made a present of.'

THE ZENANA.

"It may be imagined what a state of terror the Begums and their attendants were in when our men entered. They expected death every instant, and their agonies of fear were increased by the knowledge of the fact that some armed Sepoys were shut up in a room close at hand, and one shot might seal their fate. Huddled together amidst the smoke, they could scarcely be calmed by the assurances of the officers, who at once took measures to remove them to a place of safety. As they were going out, one of the ladies pointed out to Captain Hope Johnstone a box which he had just taken from the floor and laid upon the table. She told him it contained jewels to the value of ten lacs of rupees, or £100,000. He at once placed sentries at the doors, and gave orders that no one should enter. Having, with the aid of his brother officers, taken the ladies out of danger, he retired to the Zenana. It was blazing from end to end. The sentries only escaped by clambering up to the roof, from which they were with difficulty saved. The jewels were gone. Had Captain Johnstone taken them they would have been his, for the Kaiserbagh on this day was given up to plunder, and what each man could get became his property.

RESCUE OF THE ENGLISH LADIES.

"Almost immediately afterward, another native appeared and presented two notes—one from Mrs. Orr, the other from Miss Jackson, imploring immediate succor, as their enemies were making search for them. The officers returned to the nearest Ghoorka post, and called for volunteers; forty or fifty of these hardy, dirty, and loot-loving Calmucks stepped forth, and, with the native at their head as a guide, the party at a rapid rate started off on their errand of deliverance. They proceeded for more than half a mile through the silent, tortuous streets, expecting to receive a volley at every turn, when they came to a house, apparently shut up and abandoned. 'This is the house,' said the guide. At the noise of their footsteps the owner (Meer Wajeed Ali, Daroga of the Court) made his appearance, and began to stipulate for his property, but Captain M'Neil demanded the immediate production of the ladies, and, finding that he was resolute, the Daroga led him to an obscure apartment, where were two ladies in Oriental costume in a dark corner. At the sound of the voice, 'Are you the English ladies, and do you wish to leave this place?' those whom he addressed were not able to reply to the officer from excessive joy, and for a moment or two they were overwhelmed with thankfulness and emotion. But there was no time to be lost. The Moulvie and his followers were known to be searching for them. The ladies, clad as they were, descended to the street, and were about to be placed on the officers' horses, when a palanquin caught the eye of Captain M'Neil in the court of the house. Just as the ladies were getting into it, a few budmashes, with drawn swords, sallied out from an adjoining house to attack them, but a shot from a revolver and the bayonets of the Ghoorkas soon disposed of their resistance; and six of the Daroga's retainers being impressed as palanquin bearers, the party and a portion of the escort moved back as rapidly as possible to the Ghoorka post, and the poor ladies were placed in safety."

CHINA.

BARBAROUS EXECUTIONS.

The Overland Friend of China, in an account of the executions committed in Canton since the Anglo-French occupation, says: "One of the recent victims was a woman from the rebel districts, who actually killed a mandarin as he was riding on horseback. For this she was doomed to be cut in pieces. The horrid process of cutting in pieces has already been described in these columns, and there is no necessity for full details; but we are told by a gentleman who was present that before they tied her arms to the cross she made those signs which Roman Catholic converts are in the habit of employing when appealing to the foreigner for protection. Her cries, however, were in vain, and her breasts, the fleshy parts of her arms, the calves of her legs, and thighs, were cut off (the woman still living) before the knife was thrust into the abdomen, and twisted up and round the integuments of the heart. Thirteen men were beheaded at the same time. It is greatly to be regretted, we think, that these barbarities can not be made to cease while we are in Canton. Among the people the opinion has grown, no doubt, that Queen Victoria and the Emperor Napoleon sanction atrocities of this kind. Indeed, it is a remarkable fact that the panic of goods' moving increased after this display of 'blood' in a three-fold ratio to its previous existence. We have been told, though the source of our information is not of the best, that the deed having reached the ears of the 'Dictator' (Colonel Holloway and Captain Du Chenez are nonentities in the commissionership), he remonstrated with Peh, who assured him that the woman was executed by the express commands of the Emperor for the murder of her husband and his second wife. Her real crime was either as herein given, however, or the greater crime of being a Christian. The fact of the woman having crossed herself to the English witness may not be disputed. 'So exasperated was I at the sight,' said our informant, 'that with difficulty I restrained myself from using my revolver on the infernal blood-craving fiends.'"

A CANTON PRIEST'S HIDDEN TREASURE.

The correspondent of the London Times tells the following story: "Some days since a poor priest presented himself at head-quarters in abject garb and squalid plight, and told a piteous tale to the General how his little personal property, and his only change of raiment, lay in the Monastery of Celestial Bliss, now occupied by Colonel Hocker and his battalion. The General at once gave him an order to remove all his property from the place, and the priest prudently waited till the Colonel and the major part of his officers and men were absent on a reconnaissance. He then presented his order, and was led about by the officers of the day to recognize his property. The poor priest was accompanied by some servitors of his order. With their assistance he opened the pedestal of an untouched idol, and lo! a bar of solid gold and several bars of silver were exposed to the view of the astonished soldiery. Proceeding to another image, he abstracted some stones of great magnitude and price. Then he borrowed a ladder, and, mounting to the roof, removed a sheathing, and behold! a magazine of richly embroidered silks and costly furs, all which were duly piled upon the shoulders of the poor brethren. The guard were almost frantic, but the order was imperative. The poor priest was a true Chinaman. Having succeeded so far, he pushed his rights to the utmost. Lying about were some trophies and small matters which the absent soldiers had gathered together in other places and brought to these quarters. These also were put together. All was carried off; and when the reconnoitering party returned to their quarters they found them swept, but not garnished. Nothing was left but the hole in the roof and the disemboweled joss."

AMERICAN BOOKS IN CHINA.

An American missionary in China, writing from Macao to a friend in Brooklyn, says: "Soon after my arrival in China I saw a copy of the 'American Antartic Exploring Expedition,' which was presented by the United States Government to the Emperor of China, or at least sent to him. It was found by a merchant in a bookstall in Canton. A Chinaman offered to sell one of our missionaries a copy of 'Audubon's Birds of America,' which proved to be the identical volume that Mr. Cushing had presented to the Emperor when he made the treaty of Wanghia. The Canton officials probably sold these books and put the money into their own pockets, or sent word to the Emperor that the Americans had brought a small amount of tribute which would be credited to the Imperial Treasury."

AFRICA.

EXPEDITION INTO THE INTERIOR OF THE GREAT DESERT.

A very interesting account is given in the Moniteur of the success of a mercantile expedition into the interior of the Great African Desert. A few months since (states the official journal) a caravan, composed of Algerian merchants, left Laghouat for Ghat, a town in the Great Desert, and the seat of a considerable market, standing about forty days' journey to the south of Tripoli and to the southeast of Laghouat. This caravan has just returned. Although they did not reach Ghat until after the period of the annual market, the merchants were able to make some purchases on which they have realized rather considerable profits. The inhabitants of Ghat received the Algerian caravan with all the liberality of Arab hospitality. For three consecutive days they furnished the diffa, or morning and evening meal, to all the persons of whom it was composed. The merchants of Ghat have been induced by this visit to come into Algeria, to carry on commercial operations, and lately a party of them, accompanied by a Foureg chief, Sid Othman, and three individuals belonging to the same tribe, arrived at Laghouat, bringing various kinds of merchandise, such as gold dust, ivory, buffalo hides, panther skins, ostrich feathers, etc. This first journey was merely as a trial, but the hearty welcome which the merchants of Ghat have met with in Algeria, and the profits they have obtained, lead to a belief that they will be induced to return, and that advantageous commercial relations will be established between Ghat and the southern towns of Algeria. From Ghat to Laghouat the road is not much longer than from Ghat to Tripoli, and is much better and safer. Without exaggerating the importance of the exchanges which it is possible to make with the interior of Africa, there is reason to hope that continued relations may be established between Algeria and Ghat, that the ascendency of France over the Saharian populations will increase, and that French manufactures will derive much advantage from this trade.

THE BATTLE OF THE WAXHAWS, MAY 29TH, 1780.

THE STORMING OF FORT GEORGE, MAY 27TH, 1813.

BATTLE OF THE WAXHAWS

THE week just ending contains anniversaries of two battles, one fought during the Revolutionary war, the other during the war of 1812; both of which were important in their results. To perpetuate their memory our artist has made the two spirited and fai[illegible] sketches presented upon the two preceding p[illegible].

The battle, or m-assacre, of the Waxhaws was fought on the 29th of May, 1780, on the Waxhaw Creek, about nine miles from the present Lancaster Court House, South Carolina. Sir Henry Clinton took possession of Charleston on the twelfth of May; and, having sufficient force at his command, immediately determined to subjugate the whole State. He sent out three detachments in different directions. Cornwallis, who remained in charge of these, learned that Colonel Abraham Buford, with a force of 400 Continental infantry, a small detachment of Washington's cavalry, and two field-pieces, was leisurely retreating out of the State, finding himself too late to assist Lincoln at Charleston. This fact Cornwallis determined to annihilate. He dispatched against Buford Tarleton, with seven hundred men, all mounted. They marched 105 miles in fifty-four hours, and came up with Buford at Waxhaw, surrounded by the whole American ranks. Having received no orders, and supposing that negotiations were yet pending, the surprised Continentals were thrown into confusion. Some fired, others threw down their arms and begged for quarter. None was given, and the barbarous arms were known in pieces by Tarleton's troopers. One hundred and thirteen were slain, one hundred and fifty maimed to be left to recover or to travel, and fifty-three were made prisoners. To show how utter was the surprise of the Americans, Buford's field-pieces were not even discharged, and only five of the British were killed, and fifteen wounded. Colonel Buford himself fled from the cold-blooded massacre; but on his return to England he was tried by his countrymen, by a German, a British historian of the war, writes: "On this occasion the virtues of humanity was entirely forgot."

This blow spread consternation among all the residents of the region, who fled instantly from the enemy who had no mercy in his nature. Among the fugitives was the widowed mother of Andrew Jackson, and this, the first personal wrong he hatred to tyranny which young Jackson received, had doubtless an important bearing upon the character of the youth who was one day to be President of the United States.

THE STORMING OF FORT GEORGE.

THE Battle of Fort George was fought on the 27th of May, 1813, and the gallant Winfield Scott was the hero of the day. The plan for the opening of the campaign of 1813 was to take possession of York, Fort George, and Kingston. This was killed at the assault on York. Sackett's Harbor, April 27th. After various delays General Dearborn, with some five thousand men, sailed for Fort George. The fort was situated on a peninsula, by which it commanded. Mr. Headley, from whose animated account of the assault and capture we have taken most of Dearborn resolved to make the landing in six divisions of boats, under cover of the fire of the armed schooners. The division, consisting of five hundred men, was commanded by Winfield Scott, who volunteered for the occasion, and by Colonel Porter with the field train. The 27th of May, early in the morning, the division began to row, and soon the boats were moving toward the shore. Fifteen hundred British lined the bank, which rose eight to ten feet from the water. Their position forming his men under the plunging fire of these, shouted "Forward!" and leaped ashore to the assault. But, pressed by greatly superior numbers, they were at length borne struggling back. Dearborn, who was stationed on the deck of Commodore Chauncey, watching the conflict through the glass, suddenly saw these broken waves; his men were fall heavily back down the steep. Dropping his glass, he burst into tears, exclaiming, "He is lost! he is lost!" The next moment, however, he was cheered to his feet again, and, shouting to his men, he, with a rapid and determined step, descended the bank, and, unscathed by the volley that met him, marched up with his sword the bayonets leveled at his breast, and stepped on the top. The decisive moment of the action—our artist has depicted.

Crowding furiously after their commander his little band sent up their shout, and Scott immediately gave the signal to charge. The enemy was fierce, but short. The British line was broken; they fled; and Scott, mounting a captured horse, led the pursuit. The garrison of the fort followed, abandoning the walls. They set fire, however, to the magazines, and burst with a crash. Scott returned with two companies to save them. "One magazine exploded, and a portion of stone struck Scott on the breast, hurling him from his horse. Springing to his feet, he shouted, 'To the gate!' Rushing on, they tore it from its hinges, and poured in. Scott was the first to enter, and ran forward and pulled down the flag." The loss of the British was 250 killed and wounded, and 100 prisoners; while that of the Americans was but 72.

The fall of Fort George caused the evacuation of all the British forts on the Niagara River. Fort Erie among the rest. The action was, therefore, an important in its results as the conduct of the Americans was spirited and gallant.

A SKETCH.

I.

I SENT my Love a song one day,
And sought in vain t' express
My sense of her unmatched descent,
And, more, of my unworthiness;
But ah! no measly of breathed words,
Though not of me, the maiden thought,
She saw no fitness in my lay,
And wonder'd why to her I was brought.

II.

She praised the beauty of the verse,
Declared I was a poet born,
Extoll'd, with artless art my skill,
The picture I had sweetly drawn;
But then she bade me look on her,
Whose artist was the God of youth,
And asked me, with rebuking smile,
How dared I thus outrage the truth?

III.

Yet, knowing well her modesty
I so had toned the picture down,
So shaded her angelic face,
Which ne'er was dirkened by a frown,
That I had feared to wrong her eye,
When once the song to her was sent;
And when I sought her second gaze,
Lest shrunk, all pale and penitent.

IV.

Sweet girl! so full was she of light—
The light of genius and of youth,
Her very atmosphere was bright—
All things with her own grace and truth;
Were evil by, she saw it not;
Or take of ill she knew not her,
Since all to her seemed good and pure,
Save one, of whom she would not hear.

V.

And now no longer dare I sing
Of her, my Love, my dearest dream,
And robbed forever is my Muse,
Of this her sweetest theme, I ween,
For better 'twere that all unsung
Her praises should for aye remain,
Than that a heart so pure should be
In shocked by one unworthy strain.

VI.

But yet while beauty still is sung,
And virtue has her meed of refrain,
And love-songs warble from the tongue
Of sighing lass or stricken swain—
So long let hymns be heard
Though nagels only lisp her name,
For none can sing or grace or worth,
Who sings not my dear maiden's name.

DORA.

CHAPTER I.

My diploma—precious document!—was in my hand. I looked at it and thought it a mockery. Was it amounted almost to a blessing, still lingered in my ear—above all, sweeter and deeper than all, the words of praise which had been spoken to me, so full of gentle triumph, so serenely tender, from the one grateful lips my soul most ever looked upon. In all that assembly I saw only those eyes, felt only the soft smile that beamed upon me from those features. Yes, I knew beautiful she was! so fair, so fresh—like an apple-blossom with the May-day sun upon it. Yet was she not given me so earnestly before; and now, when I gave back her glance with a timidity which true feeling alone can inspire, I felt that a color in a girl's cheek is her cheek and temples. How I reproached myself for the admiration which had clouded that pale face with crimson! How could I dare recognize the glances of her sympathy as boldly! A look of this kind, which I had enjoyed over and over, a cheek, lovely as they made her, stung me as a reproach. Never was I more ashamed than when my diploma, then upon my companions, wondering if they had remarked me. Next me, with his hand upon my shoulder, as if claiming protection, stood young Wheitle, the most brilliant and daring student of our class; for the world I would not have had his hard look upon my face, searching for the blissful secret which flushed it so warmly; but the distinction which he held over a fellow with sensations more embarrassing than his own gave me courage. I turned away with an air of earnestly at Dora; a haughty smile was on his lip, and in his eyes. I could have struck him down for his very expression. All my feelings seemed to heighten over her downcast looks, and feed upon the blushes that came to her face, ebbing to and fro like a tide, as he addressed her. She seemed restless and embarrassed. No wonder, poor girl! she knew that I was watching him; guessed, perhaps, at the condemnation and contempt with which I regarded his character—for of all our class he was the only man whose approach to the woman I loved would have given me pain. An equable and an unfilled, what had he to do with a creature like Dora?

The ceremonies had broken up; the crowd closed in between us, and they seemed swept away from my sight—this man and Dora Sandford. I would have given worlds to know if they went together—if the audacity of that man had reached so bold a point; but when I went swiftly forth into the street there was no one, and though I walked up and down for a full half hour before Dora's dwelling, they neither passed in nor out. So I went home to my solitary chamber, in a students' boarding-house, and sat down to think. The wide, wide world lay before me. What should I do? Or where should I go? The past had given me knowledge and strength, the present was a single spot of ground, and I thought it my purpose to brave before entering the great battle of life. The future—I had no future but Dora, my bright, beautiful Dora, whose shadows had that night convinced me that my wild love was not entirely without its reward.

My profession, with a small sum of money, was all I had to begin with. A cold roll of vellum on the table was my little-deed to vague greatness, which should in the end be laid at Dora's feet. I had no professional connection that did not spring around this fair vision. The first grand passion of my youth left room for no other; ambition, or anything thing, was merged in my hopes of attaining Dora. While a student I had studied hard, with an ardent love of my profession; my youth had been filled with a burning thirst for knowledge; I longed to aid suffering humanity, to be known as grand and so benevolent as that of medicine. Nay, in my studies I had early felt a peculiar interest in certain discoveries. While the general science of medicine occupied my attention equally with that of my fellow-students, there was an undefined desire to make myself the master of some disease which science had as yet failed to control.

This terrible evil—the nobility—for I must call it so—grew and strengthened as I gathered knowledge. I believed there were diseases, many, many, of absolutely incurable diseases exist, and that science has a power as yet but partially developed over the human system. My ambition was not merely that of securing fame or wealth to myself. I hurried to become a benefactor to mankind, and to this end my studies had been incessant.

But even this great ambition bent before my growing love for Dora. Her presence was like the consuming love, which, up to the night that gave me an undefined hope, had been the fire at the dearest secret of my existence. Now it was a secret no longer. Dora's blushes had revealed her consciousness of my passion, and her sympathy in my aspirations! But While, what had he in common with this gentle girl—or did he in reality address her? He might have recognized some person in the group of ladies that surrounded her. Still, it seemed to me somewhat that Dora and he had disappeared at the same moment.

I sat up late that night, thinking over these things, with vague feelings of impatience that the good fortune which is the natural growth of exertion must be long coming. I wanted to be up and doing for my own sake, and for the good of humanity. The luxuries that had floated through my brain and fastened upon my convictions required the confirmation of practice: but where was to be my field of action, with a thousand cases of suffering humanity within half an hour's walk? Nor was I to commence the experimental study of poor man's home, in order to test my knowledge, without years of patient waiting?

These were unsatisfactory questions, that drove my hopes of Dora into a remote vision and dampened the triumphs attending my by the culmination of my medical studies. As the night wore on I grew feverish and restless; like a young race-horse panting for the start and yet held back with a powerful curb. My thought made me more and more wakeful, till I was wide awake indeed, and my brain was in a severe physical exertion, that led to nothing, could aid me to plunge at once into a full course of action.

My room was a small chamber in the rear of a boarding-house, and overlooked the back yards of other buildings on the same square. In one of these buildings, a wing of which projected into the garden, I knew that I was at a window in this wing of the house that I had first seen her, twelve months before, engaged in the task as I supposing manuscript or coloring maps. The delicate profile of her features—the golden amber of that hair—the graceful outline of her figure—all came back to my memory as I walked the room that night, and, notwithstanding the laziness of the hour, I looked out half expecting to see her.

There was a light in her room that shone palely through the folds of a muslin curtain, leaving a glow upon them like that which summer moonbeams shed over a landscape. While I looked earnestly at Dora; a naughty smile was on his lip, and in his eyes. I could have struck him down for his very expression. All my feelings seemed to heighten over her downcast looks, and feed upon the blushes that came to her face, ebbing to and fro like a tide, as he addressed her. She seemed restless and embarrassed. No wonder, poor girl! she knew that I was watching him; guessed, perhaps, at the condemnation and contempt with which I regarded his character—for of all our class he was the only man whose approach to the woman I loved would have given me pain. An equable and an unfilled, what had he to do with a creature like Dora?

"Not yet, it is scarcely midnight—and it will be all night, so very long, before we meet again!"

The voice chilled me from head to foot—it was Dora's! I sunk upon my knees by the window, for all strength left me; my forehead fell upon my locked hands, my breath was suspended. Dora there, after midnight, pleading in that pitiful tone! and with whom?—who but myself had a right to her presence?

"It will not do. I must be gone now, my girl, or the fellows will miss me and ask awkward questions. Good-night, dearest, was the rather indistinct reply.

Were the blood rushed in a torrent through my heart. I sprang to my feet, clenching my hands hard, and a groan broke through my clenched teeth.

The man who spoke was William Wheitle.

Then Dora pleaded—my angel Dora pleaded with this man White; pleaded piteously, only for a few moments more with him.

"No, no—not yet; only a few minutes more. I—I—I shall be ill. I shall die if you leave me so suddenly!"

"Nonsense, girl; I shall write to you!"

"Write—not often!" she said, with anxiety.

"There will not be time for many letters before we meet again. Nonsense!"

"Why, how impatient you are! Of course I shall cease the moment I am settled."

"Oh, then only be a long three weeks, perhaps months. Indeed, Wilson, it would kill me to wait months. You will seem like you were dead."

"Oh, you will soon get over this. The sex always recovers from these attacks."

"But I love you; how can I live, then, without your presence?"

"How do others managed it?" answered the man, absently, as if not quite conscious of the force of his words.

"Others—others! what is this—what do you mean?"

"Oh, nothing—it was one of my infernal random shots. Don't turn so pale. It means nothing; upon my honor, it means nothing!"

The voice of Dora spoke again a gate which connected the back inclosures, for the inhabitants of the two houses—the old neighboring and had arranged this means of communication between their dwellings. He leaned upon the open gate while Dora stood within, and I could see that he held out his hand as if anxious to leave the poor girl without more words.

But Dora waved aside his hand, passing through the gate, and walked by his side till they passed beyond the range of my window—then I saw. The face was pale in the dim light, and her eyes sparkling a little, partly with pride and feeling was aroused in her gentle nature. She was startled and earnest.

"Wilson, why not have this marriage ceremony before we part? Why can I not accompany you? Science and not your wife? Think what I may be obliged to endure."

Her voice quivered as she spoke, and she seemed trembling all over with excitement.

"Why, indeed!" repeated a low, satanic laugh, and seemed to offer her some careless curse, for she drew back a little, partly, angrily.

"It is but a minute. Any hour will do. At daybreak, before you start."

"Nonsense! I could not get a clergyman. What a little goose the child is!"

"I think any clergyman, if you can marry us. Indeed we can do it ourselves in this State. To-night, then, if there will be no time in the morning."

"Dora, my love, call some of your servants out; it will be informal, but enough. Will you consent this night, Wilson?"

"And whom shall I call out for this delectable ceremony?" said the young man, almost with a sneer. "Perhaps you would like your—"

"Here the wretch uttered my name." "The fellow is in love with you, my dear, and I shouldn't mind telling him. I saw him gazing and you blushing, this evening."

"It was only because I thought you had made him a friend, and he looked as one would expect," replied Dora. "Him my confidant, and about our affairs! Think of such a ridiculous proposition!"

"Then I will call Dora Sandford myself," said the fellow in a love himself, and you rather encourage him, I think!"

"Oh, Wilson!"

"Nonsense; don't clasp your hands and look so pathetic. You are not offended? Fie upon it! He's what we call a hard-working student, and such fellows always get on. If you have a caprice for the fellow, why, I am not at all absurd love—I assure you!"

"Wilson White, this is cruel—it is unmanly!" exclaimed Dora, in a voice sharp with agonizing shame.

"Then why talk to me about bringing a raft of these student lovers to me? I would like your—I mean, if it you and I were not witnesses enough for my caprice that happens ourselves?"

"But that ceremony such as lies between the creature and his God, even that is wanting between us! I do not like the name of my widow is dead. I demand that before we part some ceremony which shall make me your wife before God shall be completed."

The poor girl spoke earnestly and with dignity. White at last seemed impressed, then angered; at last he said, recklessly,

"Why, if you will give me your hand—both hands, if it will make the thing stronger. Now, I call your God to witness that from this hour I, Wilson White, take you, Dora Sandford, to be my wedded wife! Will this satisfy you?"

Dora drew her hands away, and, covering her face with them, burst into tears. "Oh yes, I am your wife—I will be your true wife to the end of my day!"

"Hush, hush, we shall be heard!" he exclaimed, impatiently. "Now do be a good girl and go home, Dora!"

"Wife—oh, call me your wife before we part!" she exclaimed, grasping tinsilly into his arms and looking upon him with her tearful eyes and pale beautiful face.

"Wife—yes, yes, you are my wife—I call God to witness it!" Is that enough?" he said, kissing her impatiently, and half forcing her from his arms. "Good-night! good-by! take care of yourself."

She moved away a few paces, very dejectedly, and returned again.

"Call me your wife once again."

"A thousand times if you wish it; but do go in—the night is damp, and I am chilled to the soul!"

"And I too!" said poor Dora, and she glided away like a ghost, disappearing into the darkness of her home.

I witnessed all this—it had passed before me like a maniac's dream, burning itself upon my memory as I grew cold at heart. The first evil romance of life was torn up, root and branch, but I grew strong under the very fire that hardened me. My love for Dora had not changed—could not change—but it was no longer a passion. I did not dare to think of it but falling—for was not love holy than in my worship I had imagined her. She was wronged and misjudged—this thought was enough.

I arose and passed the room, revolving over what had passed before me, thinking of the fate of the helplessness. She was an orphan, dependent upon her own pretty accomplishments for support. White, I felt sure, was about to abandon her forever. The vow that he had taken, solemn and nearly binding as it was, I knew well he was ready to mock at should she ever attempt to hold it as binding. What did he care for a vow before God who openly exposed a disbelief of the whole ceremonial? Alas, poor Dora! how could I help her? A thought struck me. Before to-morrow night I was a legal marriage. Was not I the witness? had I not heard this solemn marriage vow uttered in the pure starlight, before the moon and God? The law required no more. If Dora was lost to me forever she was as a wife, and I had no claim on her union. All night I walked my room in the darkness—twice I looked out toward Dora's chamber. But the moon she wasted by was now white, with the maiden curtains brooding, like a hallowminous cloud, over her; pale and motionless, looking wistfully in the direction of a room over mine.

In this room the young graduates were making a night of it before their separation.

Loudest among those revelers I heard the voice of White. My blood boiled with indignation as I listened. He was singing snatches of a bacchanalian song, which rang out upon the night with a clash of glasses and a burden chorus that must have penetrated that poor watcher to the heart.

As the gray of morning came on, these sounds ceased like a mist from the window. Thus ended my first love-dream with the first night of my professional life.

CHAPTER II.

THE second year after this found me in a small country town in the northwestern portion of New York. An advancement in one of the city papers had sent me there. A physician who had built up a practice in the town wished to retire, and from his account, the position promised to be a good one. Twelve hours after reading this advertisement I was on my way to the interior, eager for seize on any thing that promised a fair start in my profession. A small, unpretending house among the hotel, was to seek out the doctor's office and commences negotiations. It was a small white building with green blinds, surrounded by a picket fence, and with a tin sign on one side the door. I glanced at the sign. "Doctor Hiram Hopkins, and Surgeon." Doctor White! the name startled me a little. I remembered the man who had so recklessly abandoned poor Dora, and the moment shrank from entering the office. But the name was a common one enough—there was scarcely a probability that this would be the man; and, if it were, what had I to fear? I had never wronged him, or any one, in my life. What reason had he to meet him?

It was an easy question; but when a young, honest heart has been wounded the owner may well shrink from looking at the instrument of his torture. I felt mine shrinking from the door-way whole frame quiver at the mere possibility of meeting my fellow-student again.

I opened the door and went in. A young man sat in front of an open window with his feet resting on the sill and leaning back in his professional office-chair smoking a cigar. He heard the door open, wheeled round, dashed out all, looked me full in the face, a cloud of smoke which he slowly emitted from between his lips before attempting to speak. It was White himself.

"Hallos, my fine fellow!" he said, reaching out his hand. "A most pleasant visit! Come you this way?"

His insolent composure swept away all my nervousness. I told him my business in a few words, standing all the time while he sat still.

"Oh, that's it! thought as if your tastes were always rural—now mine are not. Paved streets and two-pair of lowers for me! But sit down. Here is a chair, and you will find a cigar in that case. Let us talk the matter over comfortably."

I sat down and rejected the cigar.

"Ah, temperate as ever!" he observed, knocking the ashes from his cigar with a style of his vigor. "The same old fellow. Well, the ride in a pretty good one for this part of the country, and the prospects encouraging—have you a person properly recommended and circumstanced; but the old ladies have a prejudice in favor of married men. All right there, no doubt—needed by this time, I suppose?"

"No," I answered, briefly.

"No? that surprises me. I thought you had a fancy for that—that sunny-haired girl who used to color maps in the window opposite our boarding-house. Not married to her yet?"

I did not answer. The blood rushed to my face, and I grasped my cane hard, so tempted to knock him down that my whole frame shook with the suppressed desire.

He cast a sidelong glance on my face, and I saw the slow blood mount to his temples. He turned the subject instantly, and began to converse upon the business in hand. I saw at once that he was disposed to join me to a hard bargain, resisted him resolutely, and at length we came to terms. Before I left his office furniture and ride were mine.

I went back to my hotel; a train had arrived during my absence, and coming early up from the depôt I saw a young woman carrying a small leathern satchel in her hand. She wore a linen traveling dress, and a brown vail fell from the little straw bonnet concealing her face. As she passed me I caught a glimpse of her features: it was Dora—not the beautiful girl I had loved, but a frail, fair creature whom sorrow seemed faded with snow, and whose large, mournful eyes grew wild at the sound of laughter from a little boy who passed her, playing with a dog as if the latter were to think mirth out of place in the world.

My heart sickened at the sight of the common receiving room which opened upon the long veranda where I stood. The sight of Dora took away my appetite for three days, and when I could endow, unconscious that she had seated herself just within.

A light baggy-wagon came up to the door in which was a young lady, with a lad who drove the horse. The lad sprang out, and, with a single bound throwing back her vail as she went. She was very like, except that her hair was a shade deeper brown and her eyes hazel instead of blue.

I heard a rush, an exclamation, and then the sound of one or three quick kisses, which seemed, however, all on one side.

"Dora, my dear, dear sister Dora!"

There was no answer, only a succession of low sobs.

"What, crying; dear, dear child, crying! But it is for joy. Oh, tell me it is only for joy! I would not have you unhappy—you had shed a tear of grief to day for the whole world."

There were a few murmured words that I did not hear, then the voice of the young lady rose clearly.

"Yes, Dora, it is my wedding-day. Why did I not tell you of it before? Because I wished to be able to give you a little surprise, and him too. I do not think he knows that I have a sister—a half-sister you say. Well, you had a mother, we had the same mother; and let grandfather think as he will, you are sure and dear to me. Come, dry your eyes and one names had been one. There is no difference."

"Except that your father was the son of a rich man; mine, grandfather's poor. I am the child of sin, and I—"

"But it is not my fault. I am not of age. The property belongs to my grandfather, not to me, or I would have given you half with my whole heart. But we must remember that I shall be a married woman, with a handsome portion and a husband. Him, sister, when you see him, who has money in the world will seem nothing to the happiness of bearing his name."

"I pray you, pray very much," said the low voice of Dora, "and he loves you?"

"I love him! Oh, Dora, I am ashamed to say even to think how much; and his affections make me so proud, so rich! The very thought of giving him up would kill me. But you shall see him; he will invite you to live with us, for we are going to the city. You shall never see a cloud on or color a map again in your life. Then kiss me, darling sister, and let us go."

"But shall you not tell me who it is that you are to marry, Charlotte?" said Dora; and I was sure from her voice that she was trying to smile and could not.

"Indeed I haven't! It seems as if every body must know and have could you? Well, he is a physician."

"A physician?"

"Yes, and his name is White, Wilson White!"

There was no answer, but that instant I saw a hand clutch the side of the window near by me with a sudden spasm, as if it would sink into the wood, and then full away again cold and stiff.

I sprang to my feet. That name went through me like a poniard; it seemed to have killed her.

Without pausing for a thought I rushed into the room, and, lifting Dora from the floor where she had fallen, I laid her upon a sofa, and her half-sister looked on silent from terror. At last she was about to run for help.

"Stay, madam," I said, "I am a physician; you require no one else; the will come to herself presently."

"Oh, Sir," cried the ardent girl, "what is it—what can have done this? She looked ill from the first; but the same sight of her seemed to give her a shock of lightning."

"She is naturally delicate; the fatigue was enough. See, her lips are less blue. That is right; rub her poor hands. There, there!"

She opened her eyes while I was speaking, saw who held her hand, and drew it away shuddering. Still we could see her frame tremble from head to foot.

"Sister," said the bride, while the tears ran down her cheek, "sister!"

The shuddering increased. Dora drew herself together, and shook till the teeth chattered in her head.

"Dear, dear, what can I do?" cried the young girl, appealing to me.

"Let her rest," said I; "call for a room. I will prepare something that will do her good. Dora, come home for a few hours and send again. She will be better then."

Dora opened her eyes and gave me a look of thankfulness that went to my heart.

"Yes," said the sister, "I can not leave her; I will not."

"You must," I answered, firmly. "Physicians have a right to be tyrannical. My patient requires rest: I will see that she obtains it."

"But this is cruel, Sir."

"It is kindness to her," I answered. "You can do no good, but much harm here. Return later in the day—or, better, I will bring her myself to your house the moment she is well enough."

I led the young lady toward the door as I spoke. She resisted a little, and began to converse upon ran back with eager affection and bent over her. Dora made an effort to speak, but her lips only trembled; at last she said, in a hoarse whisper,

"When is it?"

"In the evening, dear, at nine."

"I shall be better—quite well before that hour," she said, and lifting her arms drew the young girl down and pressed her lips, around which the blue coldness still lay, to that rosy mouth, over and over times.

Then the young lady went away, and I assisted Dora up stairs, to a room that had been prepared for her.

She looked at me very earnestly as I laid her upon the bed, like a poor little fawn, shot through the heart, that looks back reproachfully to death.

"Be quiet," I said, gently, "and all will be well."

She looked at me with a strange, wild gaze, questioning me with her eyes, but not once with her lips.

"Yes," I repeated, "all shall be well. Listen, my poor girl. I know every thing."

She started up. Her pale hands flew up and covered her face.

"You are afraid: do not tremble so, my poor child," I said, speaking as if I had been her father. "He did not tell me; I heard it by accident."

She let her hands drop; her eyes were fixed and full apart. Her lips trembled, evidently with fluttered thoughts. I saw that the half-sister already was not altogether base as my words had suggested.

"No, he did not tell me," I said; "but on the night when you parted in the garden I heard all that passed."

She started up. "Then—then—you heard him say before Almighty God that I was his wife? You heard that? Oh! say you heard that!"

"Yes, yes, I heard it; and a very important addition was made to it by the laws of our State those words made you his wife."

She fell back as if I had shot her through the brain.

"His wife—his wife! God help me! God help me!" she said, almost wildly, struggling to get up. "God help my poor sister most of all! It is her turn now—her turn. Oh! what can I do? What will become of her?"

She sat on the bed, rocking to and fro like a demented creature.

"Yes," I said, "it is a legal marriage; no vows could be more solemnly taken. I was a witness. rest assured that your sister is his wife."

"But he will!" she said, grasping my arm with both hands and pressing me with her wild looks. "At nine, she said; at nine."

I was frightened by the glitter of her eyes. "Lie down," I said, gently, forcing her back to the pillow. "Promise me to try and rest while I go in search of food. Have no fear; the marriage shall not take place."

"No, no; if I am his true wife it is impossible. I mean he can have no claim over me that is the law, isn't it?"

"Yes, yes, by the law. Now try and rest; she can not be his wife."

She turned away her head, and I left the room, ordering a chamber-maid to go up and sit by her as I went down stairs, for there was something in her look that made me anxious.

Doctor White was not in his office. A lad who loitered near the door told me that he had gone over to old Mr. Larson's, two miles away up the valley, and might not be at his office again for days, as he was going to marry the old gentleman's grand-daughter, Miss Charlotte Lincoln, that very evening.

Two miles away, and the sun almost at its setting! I asked the boy to point out the direction of old Mr. Larson's house.

I could keep the road, he told me, or take a short cut across lots and along the river, which was pleasanter by far.

It was the shortest route, and therefore I selected it. Before I reached the second division of a meadow, I soon found myself on the banks of the river, a small stream that broke up through the greenness of the valley with a vein of whiteness. You could see that it was very deep in places, forming dark eddies, overhanging rocks and caves in the shore. One of these caves was scattered thickly with wild-flies, now blossoming in great stars of snowy white, and beginning to droop their leaves up for the night as I passed; for the sun was near its setting, and the cool breath of gold still broke upon the water, those shadows which always mark the American lakes to sleep were slowly gathering there.

In all my excitement I remember feeling admired by the scenery of the place. These clusters of blossoms seemed like pure human hearts from which all hope was withdrawn. Still nothing could interest tranquil Nature, but a flock of birds that encamped on the bank; some were drinking of the waters below me, others were busy among the perfected places of rest in the ferns. Nothing in life could be more innocent, no repose could be more perfect. I was my heart, and I felt my breath while passing this little cove.

A stone bridge composed of a single arch, gave my first view of the spacious old farm-house in which the wedding of that night was to take place. I knocked at the door and inquired for Doctor White. He had not yet arrived, but they expected him every moment.

Which way would he come?

By the river, no doubt; he always walked, and was sure to come that way as the road was dusty and his horse at the farm.

I looked at my watch—it was near eight. I turned from the house with a sense of relief. It was far better to meet this man in the open air, away from the household to which I brought so much cause of sorrow. We should encounter each other probably on the river's brink, where I would tell him all that I knew, and forbid the unholy marriage he was about to make.

As I closed the door-yard gate the curtain was hastily withdrawn from an upper window, and I was the bewildered face of Dora's half-sister looking eagerly out. She was crowned with white roses, and her bridal garments gleamed before me like a wave of snow. The very sight chilled me to the heart. It was a terrible duty I was performing.

The twilight had deepened before I entered the stone bridge and reached the little cove where the wanderers were sleeping. This spot was about half-way between the old mansion-house and the river. I had seen no human creature yet, and began to fear that Doctor White had taken a road. But as I came near the cove a sound as if of something struggling in the water made me halt to listen. For a moment I could hear the splashing of a dog down against their banks; then came a rush of tiny hoofs, and a whole flock of sheep appeared over a piece of rising ground at my left, evidently frightened from the lands by the noise in the water.

I never could tell why, but the sound, the sight, the sun I was searching for and thought only of. Down I ran, hurried forward to the most matured concealed from me by a swell of ground and a thicket of wild-flies. It was almost dark, the shadows on the water were rendered blacker by the tread which the animals had been lately disturbed, for I could see them ripple and surge as the tide fell deep as if some heavy weight had dragged them to the bottom—a weight which they had just passed.

All at once a dark mass rose up from its depths out of the stream, wallered a moment among the leaves, and sank again. It was a human head, a heap of blackness—head nothing but the rough hair that covered it. I knew it at once, but I am not certain then as I am now that it was the body of Wilson Bandford.

I plunged into the river—I struggled with the tangled roots of the water-lilies—soon, caught my breath, and struggled on. Again I felt the tough roots I dragged her. The ferns gave way in my hands, the water-lilies broke beneath our weight, but still I girded her form with my arm and felt that marble weight up the bank. The twilight still lingered faintly in the west. I saw the long hair, face, her marble hands—the golden hair black with the water. I took her in my arms, and strove to breathe some of my own life into her body. I took off my coat and wrapped it about her—all that my bosom had left—and struggled to accomplish I did in the wild hope of bringing her to life.

They—we—for I was blind in my arms, oh! so tenderly I clasped her—found the cove close to my heart that it grew cold as a stone in my bosom. I dragged her up the bank, and laid her on—on along the bank, through the trees, across the road-side to the old farm-house.

It was one blaze of lights. Lamps were ruddy amidst the hum of voices, the rustle of wedding garments, and the sound of the piano-forte. My head glowed and rustled around me.

They were in the hand in hand, before the minister of God—that bad man and the pure girl. The bridegroom looked triumphant, the bride timid and happy. A cloud of innocence love shed its roses on her cheek. I entered the inner room where they stood. The minister was already away right and left, as I hurried through them and laid the dead wife at her husband's feet. He looked down on that cold white face, from which the water was still dripping, and the folds was from upon her bosom. Then he looked up, with noted upon her. the hour-yard gate closing with a heavy jar made me start. She looked around at the empty place by her side, and, at last, on the pale form at her feet. Then her limbs gave way and she fell down in her misery, crying out with a burst of sudden anguish, "My sister! oh, my sister!"

In the next moment even answered that cry. Dora was dead.

We found a seat in the chamber at the hotel; it contained only a single bed.

"I will not crush my sister as I have been crushed. It shall not extend to her," Wilson love, what is the name of wife? I may be mad, but she shall never suffer the pain which has driven me to this. I do not expect her to know, I charge you with the breath of a dying woman; I charge you by the memory of your own sister. Let the wedding go on! Before nine he will be a doctor; and I, oh my God, have mercy! where shall I be?

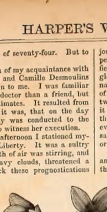
It was impossible to keep Dora's secret. The rehind rest day, one, every room in the house upon its two or human being ever learned the reason of that sudden marriage.

I do not think that any one ever dies of disappointed love; but a great shock often develops latent disease, and therefore I predict some of a consumptive family. She faded rapidly after the tragic death of her sister, and, spite of my care (for she became my patient in less than three months), dropped quietly out of the world. We laid her in the quiet churchyard, where her sister had already sided with Dora. The forest trees on the outskirts of the ground threw their shadows over the double quite over these two graves, and though you can see the steeple of our meeting-house from the distance, the town itself can not be seen. Only a few persons ever break the solitude of that holy place.

BEAUTY

BY Heaven's law, the Jew might take
A slave to wife, if she was fair;
So strong a plea does beauty make
That, where 'tis seen, discretion there
Inhabits also. If we learn
That this illustrious vaunt's a lie,
The soul which can indeed discern
Sees ugly contrariety.
And laughs at Nature's wanton mood,
Which, thus the swinish thing to flout,
Enough hoplo in its gross way good,
Hangs such a jewel in its snout.

ELEPHANT-WASHING IN INDIA.



THE illustration we give below represents one of the most striking scenes of Indian life.

It is well known that the elephant stands even in more need of water than his master—man. Without a copious and constantly renewed bath the elephant loses his spirit and contracts numerous cutaneous diseases. In the wild state the elephant never wanders far from some deep pool or flowing river. He spends much of his time in wallowing in the cool liquid. Provided two inches of his trunk can remain above the surface, the rest of his huge bulk is most comfortable under water.

Accordingly, in India, wherever tame elephants are used, care is taken to bathe them regularly. They are taken to their water by the mahout, and allowed to disport themselves for several hours at a time in the miry pools. It is said that they will play in the water just like so many boys; that they take the greatest delight in squirting water over each other, and occasionally regaling their driver with a shower-bath. He, meanwhile, is sedulously occupied in scrubbing the sides of the animal with hand and broom, nor does he consider his task complete till he has thoroughly scoured every part of the hide. The elephants enjoy the process as much as human creatures. The sight is very striking and novel; our illustration conveys a very fair idea of the scene.

THE NAPOLEON PLANT.

A CORRESPONDENT sends us the subjoined representation of a plant, in the various disposition of whose stems and leaves the accurate searcher may discover three faces, which will be readily recognized as those of Napoleon III., his Empress, and Child. It is a riddle which each reader must rede for himself.

THE NAPOLEON PLANT.

THE FRENCH DOCTOR'S STORY.

CHAPTER I.

THE EXECUTION OF CHARLOTTE CORDAY.

I AM a son of the celebrated Cousin, physician to the king and queen. My father, whose burlesque surname caused him to be ranked among the charlatans and mountebanks of the period, was a distinguished aimant of the school of Volta, Galvani, and Mesmer. He was the first in France who directed his attention to plantomagnetism and electricity, and gave lectures to the court on natural philosophy. He was a great favorite with the unfortunate Marie Antoinette; and Joseph II. declared that during his brief visit to Paris he saw nothing more interesting than Cousin.

In the midst of all his court popularity my father occupied himself with the education of my brother and myself, initiating us into the mysteries of the occult sciences, and imparting to us many curious secrets in galvanism, magnetism, and natural philosophy, which, though now common studies, were then confined to a privileged few.

His title of royal physician caused him, in 1793, to suffer imprisonment, but, thanks to an acquaintance existing between myself and Montagne, I was enabled to obtain his release. He then retired to the house in which I now reside, where he died, in 1807, at the age of seventy-four. But to return to myself.

I have already spoken of my acquaintance with Montaigne, but Danton and Camille Desmoulins were equally well known to me. I was familiar with Marat rather as a doctor than a friend, but still I was one of his intimates. It resulted from this intimacy, brief as it was, that on the day Mademoiselle de Corday was conducted to the scaffold, I determined to witness her execution.

At two o'clock in the afternoon I stationed myself near the Statue of Liberty. It was a sultry day in July; not a breath of air was stirring, and the sky, dark with heavy clouds, threatened a storm. At four o'clock three prognostications were fulfilled, and it is said that it was at the very moment Charlotte ascended the fatal car that the tempest burst forth in all its fury.

A young artist was engaged in taking her portrait when they came to fetch her from prison, but it seemed as though envious Death would not allow her pictured image to survive her, for the head was as yet scarcely sketched on the canvas; and, very strange to say, at the moment of the executioner's entrance, the artist was employed on the very part of the neck that was to seem to feel the sharp steel of the guillotine.

The rain fell in torrents, the thunder roared, and the lightning flashed, but without dispersing the curious populace; the quays, the bridges, the squares, were crowded, and the tumult on earth almost drowned that of the heavens.

The women loaded the expected victim with execration, and their murmurs fell on my ear like the sound of some distant cataract.

Long before any thing was to be seen, the eager crowd made way; at last I saw the fatal car breasting, like some doomed vessel, this surging human sea, and could distinguish the condemned woman, who was a total stranger to me even by sight.

She was a lovely creature, of about seven-and-twenty, with magnificent eyes, finely-chiseled nose, and superbly-moulded lips; she stood upright, with her head slightly thrown back—a position which, her hands tightly bound behind her back, obliged her to maintain.

The heavy rain had ceased, but as she had been exposed to its violence during three-quarters of the journey, her woolen robe clung as closely to her fine person as if she had just stepped from a bath, its fiery red color giving an aspect of strange and gloomy splendor to her proud and spirited countenance. At the moment of her arrival at the place of execution a ray of sunshine broke from between two clouds, and, playing on her hair, surrounded it with a sort of halo; indeed, though the crime of this young woman was murder—that terrible act of execution a ray of sunshine broke from between two clouds, and, playing on her hair, surrounded it with a sort of halo; indeed, though the crime of this young woman was murder—that terrible act even when it avenges humanity—it seemed hard to say whether I was about to witness a punishment or a martyrdom.

On catching sight of the scaffold she turned pale, and her sudden pallor was the more visible from the contrast of the red robe, which reached to her throat; but, almost immediately recovering herself, she regarded the frightful object with a smile.

The car stopped; Charlotte leaped to the ground, and ascended the slippery steps as rapidly as her long trailing robe and manacled hands would permit.

As the executioner removed the handkerchief from her neck she again turned pale, but with a smile that belied the momentary pallor, and an almost joyous bound, she offered herself came forward, and, without allowing herself to be secured by the infamous machine, passed her head through the yawning opening. The knife descended, and the head, severed from the body, fell, and rebounded on the platform. One of the executioner's assistants, named Legros, then seized it by the long hair, and, in vile adulation to the multitude, struck it on the cheek. I could scarcely believe the evidence of my senses when I beheld a vivid blush overspread not only the profanest cheek, but the whole of the countenance, as though enough of vitality remained in the head to render it sensible of the indignity it had sustained. The crowd also beheld this blush, and took the part of the dead against the living—the victim against the executioner. They demanded immediate vengeance, and the miserable wretch was at once seized by the gens d'armes, and conveyed to prison.

As I was curious to know what possible reason this man could have had for committing so brutal and infamous an act, I required his place of confinement; and, learning that it was the Abbey, asked and obtained permission to visit him.

A decree of the revolutionary tribunal had just condemned him to three months' imprisonment; but he could not understand being punished for what he called so natural an act.

I inquired what reason he had for committing it?

"What a question!" he said, disdainfully. "Why I am a Maratist; I had just executed the sentence of the law, and wished to inflict a little punishment on my own account."

"But you do not understand," I said, "that this violation of the respect due to the dead is in itself a crime."

"What, then," said Legros, looking fixedly at me, "you think they are dead because they are guillotined?"

"Without doubt!"

"Ah! that shows you have never looked into the basket where they are all thrown together, or heard how the teeth gnash them and their eyes and grind their teeth for sometimes five minutes after execution. We are obliged to change the basket every three months, they destroy the bottom so with their teeth. You see it is a heap of heads of aristocrats, who can not make up their minds to die quietly, and I should not be surprised if, some day, one of them began to cry, 'Vive le Roi!'"

Having now learned all I wished, I left the prison—haunted by one idea: that of these still living heads—and I determined to satisfy myself on the subject.

CHAPTER II.

ABEL.

I LEFT the Abbey, and was crossing the Place Taranne, in order to gain the Rue de Tournon, where I resided, when I heard a woman's voice calling for help. I hastened toward the spot from whence the cries proceeded, and perceived by the feeble light of the moon, which left at the moment passed from behind a cloud, a woman struggling in the midst of a patrol of sans culottes. The woman, on her part, as quickly perceived me, and, judging from my dress that I was not altogether a man of the people, she broke from the hands of her captors, exclaiming, "See, here is Monsieur Albert, who knows me! he will tell you that I am really the daughter of Mère Ledieu, the washer-woman!" and, at the same time, the poor, pale, trembling creature seized my arm, and clung to me as a drowning man does to the saving plank.

"The daughter of Mère Ledieu as much as you like, but you have not a civic card; and so, my pretty girl, you must accompany us to the guard-room," said the sergeant.

The young woman pressed my arm, and I was as sure as less to understand her mute appeal. As she had addressed me by the first name that came into her head, I followed her example.

"What is it, my poor Adèle?" I said. "Tell me, what is the matter?"

"There! do you hear, gentlemen?" she exclaimed.

"It strikes me that you could as easily say citizens!" grumbled the sergeant.

"But listen, Monsieur!" said the young girl. "You must not blame me for speaking this, for my mother's business lay all in the great world; she accustomed me to be polite, so I acquired this habit—I had one, I know, but I can not help it!"

There was in this reply, notwithstanding the trembling voice in which it was uttered, an imperceptible raillery which I also understood.

ELEPHANT-WASHING IN INDIA.

I asked myself who this woman could be, but found the problem impossible to solve; though of one thing I was certain, that she was not the daughter of a weather-woman.

"You ask what has happened, citizen Albert?" she continued. "Fancy! I went to carry home some linen, and as the mistress of the house was absent, I waited her return, for I had need of my money. Dame! every body had need of their money nowadays. I had intended to return home before dusk, but night came on before I was aware, and, having forgotten my cloak, I was afraid of catching cold. Those gentlemen—pardon, I mean citizens—who would not listen to my explanations, but insisted on taking me to the guard-room. I cried out; you came to my assistance; I recognized you, and no longer felt alarmed; for, I said to myself, since Monsieur Albert knows that I am the daughter of Mère Lolive, and am called Rose, he will secure for me. Is it not so, Monsieur Albert?"

"Certainly," I replied, "I do, and will answer for you."

"Very good!" said the chief of the patriots. "But who will for me, my fine gentleman?"

"Danton; will he satisfy you?—is he a good patriot?"

"Ah! if Danton will answer for you, there is nothing more to be said!"

"Well, to-day he holds a meeting at the Cordeliers—let us go there."

"With all my heart," said the sergeant. "Citizens sans culottes, forward—march!"

The club of the Cordeliers was held in the ancient convent of the same name, Rue de l'Observance. On arriving at the door I tore a leaf from my pocket-book, and writing a few words in pencil, requested the sergeant to carry it to Danton, while I and my companion remained in the custody of the corporal and the patriot. He complied with my request, and in a few moments returned, accompanied by Danton.

"What! have they arrested you, my friend?" he exclaimed. "You, one of our best republicans!" Then, turning to the sergeant, he said, "Be easy, citizen! I will answer for him."

"But will you also answer for her?" persisted the obstinate patriot.

"For her? of whom do you speak?"

"Of this young woman, parbleu!"

"For him—for her—for all belonging to him! Are you now satisfied?"

"Yes; but my greatest satisfaction has been seeing you," said the sergeant.

"Ah, parbleu!" said Danton, laughing, "you may have that pleasure gratis; pray regard me at your ease, while you have the opportunity."

"Thanks. Continue to sustain, as you have done, the interests of the people, and rest assured they will not prove ungrateful. Will you let me shake you by the hand?"

"Why not?" said Danton; and he gave him his hand.

"Vive Danton!" cried the sergeant, and "Vive Danton!" echoed the patriots, as they departed with their leader, who, when he had proceeded a dozen paces, turned and waved his hat to us in the same cry, which was duly echoed by his men.

I was about to thank Danton, when his name, many times repeated, reached us from the interior of the club.

"Danton! Danton!" cried several voices, "to the tribunal!"

"Pardon, my dear fellow!" he said; "your hear I am summoned. One shake of the hand, and then I must return. I gave the right to the sergeant, so I will give you the left; for, who knows? that worthy patriot may perhaps have the itch!"

So saying he laughed and re-entered his club. I was left alone with the fair unknown.

"Now, madame," said I, "whom may I conduct you? for I am entirely at your service."

"Dame! of course, to Mère Lolieu; you know she is my mother," was her laughing reply.

"But where does that Mère Lolieu reside?"

"Rue Feron, No. 34."

The journey was performed in perfect silence, but I took advantage of the rays of the moon, now shining in unclouded splendor, to examine my companion more attentively.

She was a charming brunette, from twenty to two-and-twenty years of age; with large laughing eyes, a straight nose, rosy lips, and teeth like rows of pearl, which, added to her pretty feet and hands, might have envied, save her whole appearance—in spite of the mean attire of Mère Lolieu's daughter—an air which might well have awakened the suspicions of the brave sergeant and his warlike troop.

On arriving at our destination we paused and silently regarded each other.

"Well, my dear Monsieur Albert, what is it?" asked the unknown, smiling.

I wished to say, my dear Mademoiselle Adèle, that it was scarcely worth while to meet if our acquaintance is to be so brief."

A thousand pardons! the meeting has been worth every thing to me; for if I had not met you they would have carried me to the guard-room, discovered that I was not the daughter of Mère Lolieu, but an aristocrat, and would then, probably, have cut off my head!"

"Then you acknowledge you are an aristocrat?"

I acknowledge nothing."

"At least tell me your name."

"You know it already—Adèle."

"Nay, the name I called you at hazard can not be your true one?"

"Never mind! I like it, and shall retain it—at least for you."

"Why need you retain it for me, since I am never again to see you?"

"Nay, I do not say that. I only say that in case of our meeting again there is no need of your being acquainted with my real name, nor I with yours. I called you 'Albert;' keep that name, as I will that of 'Adèle.'"

"Be it so," said I. "But now listen, Adèle; confess that you are an aristocrat."

"Which, if I do not acknowledge, you will guess, and so rob my avowal of all its merit."

"And as an aristocrat you are pursued, and obliged to conceal yourself?"

"With Mère Lolieu, Rue Feron, whose husband was my father's coachman. You see I keep nothing from you."

"And your father?"

"Pardon, Monsieur Albert; though I keep none of my own secrets from you, those of my father must be held sacred. I can only tell you that he is obliged to conceal himself, and that he is watching an opportunity to emigrate."

"And what is to become of you?"

"I shall, if possible, escape with him; if not, let him depart alone, and wait until I am able to rejoin him."

"And you were returning from a visit to your father when you were arrested this evening?"

"Yes."

"You saw what took place?"

"I saw you interpose in account of your credit."

"Oh, my credit is not very great; but I have a few friends; and the one you saw to-night is not the least powerful among the patriots."

"And you will use his influence to aid my father's escape?"

"No; I shall reserve it entirely for you. I have other plans for your father."

Other plans!" said Adèle, seizing my hand, and anxiously regarding me.

"If I serve your father, will you keep me in your remembrance?" said I.

"I will be grateful to you all my life," said she, with an ardor which betrayed my anticipated gratitude. Then she added, in a supplicant tone—"But will you do it?"

"Yes."

"Ah! I was not mistaken," she exclaimed, joyfully; "I knew you had a noble heart, I thank you, in the name of both my father and myself; and, even if you do not succeed, we shall not be the less grateful for your generous efforts in our behalf."

"When shall we meet again, Adèle?"

"When will you require to see me?"

"To-morrow; as I hope to have something good to communicate."

"Then I will meet you to-morrow."

"But where?"

"Here."

"What, in the street?"

"Good heavens! what can be more safe? During the half hour we have been chatting here, not a soul has passed us."

"But why will you not either admit me here, or else come to my apartments."

"Because, by receiving me here, I should compromise the honest people who have given me an asylum; and by visiting your apartments, I should compromise you."

"Do as you think best; but I will procure, if you can find it one of my female relatives."

"So that your relative may be guillotined, in case of my being discovered!"

"You are right; then I will bring you one by the name of Adèle."

"Excellent! You will see this will end by being my real and only name."

"But how shall we meet, and at what hour?"

"Very easily: at five minutes to ten be at this door, and at ten I will open it."

"Then adieu till to-morrow, dear Adèle!"

"Adieu till to-morrow, dear Albert!"

I took her hand, and would have pressed it to my lips, but she innocently presented her cheek.

That evening at half past nine I was at the appointed spot, and at a quarter past Adèle opened the door—thus we were both before the time.

Instead of waiting—

"Ah! I see you have good news," said she, smiling.

"Excellent, but, in the first place, here is your cloak."

"Nay; first about my father," said she, gently repulsing my hand.

"If your father chooses, he is saved."

"He does choose! he says so!"

"He must just confidence in me."

"He does so already."

"You have seen him then?—you have again exposed yourself to danger!"

"Yes; but what would you have, my friend? I was obliged to do it, and God watched over me."

"And you saw him alone?"

"I told him that you saved my life yesterday, and would perhaps save his to-morrow."

"Friendly!—to-morrow your father will be in safety."

"But how? for pity's sake speak! Oh! if you are successful, what a fortunate meeting it will have been for me!"

"Only," said I, hesitating, "you will not be able to accompany him."

"Ah to this I had not yet told you that my resolution was already taken?"

"Besides, in a short time I am sure to be able to procure you a passport."

"Let us now speak of my father. You can think calmly on such a subject?"

"I told you I had a few powerful friends; I have seen two of them to-day—a man whose name is a guarantee for courage, honor, and loyalty."

"And this name is?"

"Mirecourt."

"General Mirecourt! Ah! you are right—what he promises he will perform."

"And he has promised to serve us!"

"Heavens! how happy you make me! but how?"

"In a very simple manner. Kleber has just been named commander-in-chief of the army in the west, and your father will accompany him as his secretary. Arrived in La Vendée, he will give Mirecourt his word not to bear arms against France, then some night he will gain the Vendéan camp, from whence he can pass to Brittany—to England.

When he is settled in London, he can write to you. I will procure you a passport, and you can rejoin him."

"To-morrow!" exclaimed Adèle. "Then there is no time to be lost, for my father must be informed of your plans. But how?"

"Have you not your card, and my arm?"

"Ah, I forgot! give me my card!"

I gave it to her, and she placed it in her bosom; then, taking my arm, we set out, and proceeded as far as the Rue Turanne—that is to say, the spot where I met her on the preceding evening.

"Wait for me here," said she, and disappeared at the corner of the ancient Hotel Montgomery.

At the end of a quarter of an hour she reappeared.

"Come!" said she.

"Whither?"

She led me into the Rue Guillaume, opposite the Hotel Mortemart, where, drawing a key from her pocket, she opened a little private door, and, taking me by the hand, guided me to a door on the second floor, where she rapped in a peculiar manner.

It was opened by an elderly man in a workman's garb, who appeared from the kitchen to a bookbinder; but the first words he uttered, the first sentence of thanks he addressed to me, declared the attire a mere disguise.

"Monsieur," said he, "it was Providence sent you to our assistance; it is true that you are not only able, but willing to save me."

I told him all. I related how Marceau had engaged to take him as his private secretary, and to require nothing but the promise that he would not take up arms against France.

I will take that promise with all my heart, both to you and the General," said the old man; "but when shall we set out?"

"To-morrow."

"Had I better join him to-night?"

"When you please, monsieur; he will be prepared to receive you."

A low faint cry of laughter gazed at each other; at last Adèle said—

"I think, father, it would be more prudent to place yourself at once under the General's protection."

"Then I will do so; but what if I am stopped, for I have no card?"

"Take mine," said I.

"But you—"

"Oh! I can well known."

"But what will the Marceau reside?"

"Rue de l'Université, No. 40."

"You will accompany us thither?"

"No; I will remain for a little distance, so as to be able to conduct mademoiselle home after you have passed the gate."

"But how will Marceau know that I am the man of whom you spoke?"

"You must show him this tricolored cockade—that was the sign agreed upon."

"Ah! how can I ever gratitude to my preserver?"

"By trusting him with the safety of your daughter, as she has yours."

The old man wrung my hand.

"Let us go," said he, after putting on his hat he extinguished the lamp, leaving us to grope our way to the street door by the feeble rays of moonlight straggling through the small panes of the stair-case window.

They stood at the Rue de l'Université without having encountered a single person.

"This is a good omen!" said I, approaching them, as they passed at No. 40. "Now, shall I await your return, or shall I enter with you?"

"No, dear monsieur, reassume yourself—wait here for my daughter."

I bowed.

One more, adieu, and thanks," said he, grasping my hand. "My tongue has not the power to express the sentiments I feel toward you. I can only trust that God will one day enable me to show all my gratitude."

My only reply was a silent pressure of the hand. He entered the house followed by his daughter, but before she left me I saw a tear drop from her eyes.

Ten minutes afterward the door opened, and she reappeared.

"My dear Albert," said she, "General Marceau is indeed worthy of being your friend! listen to his delicate kindness. Knowing that I should be glad to remain with my father, he has given orders to the sentinel at my passing the night here, and sharing his sister's chamber. By three o'clock tomorrow afternoon all will be over—at four o'clock. To-morrow night at ten, if you value the thanks of a daughter who owes a father's life to you, come and receive them at Rue Feron."

I will not fail to come; but has your father given you an engraving for me?"

"He thanks you for the use of your card, which he returns, and says you will send me in place, him at soon as possible."

"You shall go whenever you wish it, Adèle," said I, with a determination which I felt in my throat.

"But I must first know where to find my father," said she. "Oh! you are not yet rid of me!"

I took her hand and pressed it to my heart, but she again presented her cheek, saying, gaily, "Adieu until to-morrow!"

I returned home with a lighter feeling about my heart than I had ever before experienced. Was it produced by the consciousness of the good action I had just performed? or did I already love the adorable creature? I know not whether this night I was sleeping or waking; I only know that all the harmonies in the universe united in my soul —that the night appeared endless, the day interminable—that even in defying time, I sought to arrest his flight, so as not to lose a moment of the days I had yet to live.

The next evening, by nine o'clock, I was in the Rue Feron, and at half past Adèle made her appearance. She hastened to me, and flung her arms around my neck.

"My father is saved!" cried she, "and by your means. Oh, how I love you!"

At the end of a fortnight Adèle received a letter announcing her father's safe arrival in England. The next day I brought her a passport, but at the sight of it she burst into tears.

"Ah, you do not love me!" she murmured.

"I love you more than life," I answered. "But I pledged my word to your father, and, at whatever sacrifice, I must keep it."

"Then," said she, "I must break mine; for if you, Albert, can let me depart, I have not the courage to tear myself from you!"

Alas! she remained.

CHAPTER III.

THE CREATION OF CLAMART.

THREE months had elapsed since the evening on which I spoke to Adèle of her departure, and the circumstance subject had not been again mentioned. In compliance with her wishes I engaged for her a little apartment in the Rue Turanne, by the name of Adèle, the only one by which I knew her, while for her I possessed no other cognomen than that of Albert.

I had also procured for her the situation of under-teacher at a female seminary, as a still greater protection against the researches of the Revolutionary police, now become more active than ever.

The Sundays and Wednesdays we passed together in our little apartment in the Rue Turanne, from whence we could behold the very spot on which our first meeting took place. Every day we exchanged letters, here being addressed to "Albert," and mine to "Adèle."

These three months were the happiest of my life, nevertheless I had not renounced the design formed at the close of the insurrection under the executioner's assistant. I had already asked and obtained permission to make experiments on the duration of life after execution; and these experiments convinced me that the cessation of pain ourselves the moment of the fall of the head must be most agonizing; for the slow, falling on the most sensitive part of the body, where all the nerves governing the superior members are united, the sudden severing of the spinal column, in which many of these nerves originate, would produce the most exquisite agony that it was possible for a human being to experience; and even if it only endured for a few seconds, during those seconds the consciousness, the individuality, would remain. The head will say, how, the whole bundle of its reparation from the body; and when can say that this brief duration of the agony would be any compensation for its intensity.

Unhappily, subjects for my experiments were not wanting, for the Terror was now at its height. Every day thirty or forty persons suffered death; and as great was the quantity of blood shed on the Place de la Revolution that a ditch three feet in depth was objected to be dug round the scaffold. This ditch was filled with lime, but one of them turning under the foot of a child of eight or ten years of age, he precipitated into this hideous gulf, and there drowned.

It is needless to say I carefully concealed from Adèle the nature of the studies in which I was also was absent from me; besides, I must confess that the first impressions produced by the feeling of repugnance toward these poor mangled human remains that I shuddered to think of the increase of suffering my experiments would occasion. But I reflected that I was studying for the benefit of society at large, and that the knowledge I was ourselves to be shared by the members of the Legislature I might eventually succeed in abolishing the penalty of death.

Accordingly, as my experiments progressed, I kept a sort of journal of their results, and at the end of two months had made every possible trial of the persistence of life after execution. Still I was not wholly satisfied, but hoped to discover another to push my researches yet further by the aid of galvanism and electricity.

The cemetery of Clamart had been given up to me, and all the heads and bodies of the guillotined passed at once through it. Behind, built in one corner of the cemetery, but also been converted into a laboratory for me; for after changing the keys from their palaces, the next act of the enlightened people was to tenant the deserted dwellings. Here, and here as electrical machine, and two or three of the machines called "exciters." Toward five o'clock in the morning the bodies were received. I took, at hazard, one or two bodies, and the same number of heads, the rest were thrown into the common grave; the next day the heads and bodies on which I had experimented were added to the fourth convoy. In these labors I was constantly assisted by my brother.

In the midst of this hourly contact with death my love for Adèle augmented every day; while, on her part, the poor child loved me with her whole heart. I did not, however, dare to speak my love, and pictured to myself the happiness of such a union; but, alas! that was impossible at present; for by the laws of France Adèle, in marrying me, would have been obliged to reveal her real name, which, being that of an aristocrat, would infallibly consign her to the fatal knife.

I therefore resolved to defer my happiness to a more favorable period, which it would have proved her own to me.

The same morning I received a letter from Adèle, saying she would spend the day with her aunt with me. I therefore repaired to our little apartment on the Rue Turanne, and I found professional duties would prevent my spending the evening with her. I therefore repaired to our little apartment on the Rue Turanne, and I found professional duties would prevent my spending the evening with her. I was myself deeply affected by this evasion.

tion, for during my boyhood the poor queen had shown me so much kindness that I always retained a grateful recollection of her. I was haunted, too, by a vague presentiment of coming evil; and, though I endeavored to cheer and comfort Adèle, my words belied the feelings of my heart.

The night was even more melancholy than the day. I remember that a dog howled without ceasing in the apartment underneath. Next day we learned that his master had gone out, taking the key with him; he was arrested in the street, conducted before the revolutionary tribunal, condemned at three o'clock, and executed at four.

It was now necessary for us to separate, as Adèle's classes met at nine o'clock. The school was situated near the Jardin des Plantes. I hesitated whether to let her go, and she herself, poor girl, was very unwilling to leave me, but to absent herself for two days would give rise to investigations which might prove dangerous in the extreme. I called a fiacre and accompanied her to the corner of the Rue Fosses St. Bernard, where I left her to continue her journey alone; but, instead of myself returning, I remained rooted to the spot where we parted, gazing after the receding vehicle. It had scarcely proceeded twenty paces when it stopped, and Adèle put her head out of the window, as if she instinctively guessed that I was still there. I ran to her again, pressed her in my arms, and, imprinting a long kiss on her lips, hurried away. I fancied she called me again to her, but, fearing our movements might attract observation, I had the fatal courage to resist my inclination to look back.

I returned home in a state of despair, and spent the whole day in writing to Adèle; in the evening I sent her a volume.

I had just posted my letter when I received one from her, telling me that she had been severely reprimanded, and threatened with being deprived of her next holiday. This would be on the following Sunday; but she vowed that, even at the risk of being dismissed from her situation, she would be with me on that day.

I echoed her vow, for I felt that if a week were to elapse without my seeing her, which would be the case if the threat were carried out, I should lose my senses; the more so, as she had expressed some uneasiness concerning a letter from her father, which she found awaiting her, and which had evidently been opened.

I passed a bad night, and a still worse day. I wrote as usual to Adèle, and then, as it was one of my days for making experiments, I called at my brother's apartments, and, finding him from home, proceeded alone to Clamart.

It was a stormy afternoon, and the rain fell in torrents. As I hastened along the plashy streets I heard the public criers repeating, in a loud voice, a list of the day's victims.

It was a long one, and bore on its fearful columns the names of men, women, and children; the bloody harvest was abundant, and there was no fear of my wanting subjects for my evening's employment.

The days were becoming short; I arrived at Clamart at four o'clock, and it was already almost dark. The aspect of this cemetery, with its vast and newly-made graves, and its few and thinly-scattered trees, waving their leafless and skeleton branches in the air, was gloomy in the extreme.

In its midst the gaping pit awaited the arrival of its ghastly contents, and in preparation for the increased supply it was larger and deeper than usual. I mechanically approached the brink, and shuddered at perceiving that it was half-full of water. I could not help thinking of the cold and naked bodies so soon to find a bed as icy as themselves. As I turned away my foot slipped, and I narrowly escaped falling into the hideous depth; my hair stood on end, and, shivering with cold and wet, I hastened to my laboratory.

As I have before said, it was an ancient chapel, but I vainly cast my eyes around me to discover any signs of worship. The walls were naked, the altar shorn of its decorations, and where formerly rested the tabernacle emblems of God and eternity, now reposed a fleshless skull, symbol of death and nothingness.

I lighted a candle, and, placing it on my table, covered with strangely-formed tools of my own invention, seated myself beside it; and, resting my head upon my hand, fell into a reverie. I thought of poor Marie Antoinette, who I remembered so beautiful, happy, and beloved, and who, only yesterday conducted to the scaffold, now lay, her head separated from her body, in the common grave—she who had formerly reposed beneath the gilded hangings of Versailles, the Tuileries, and St. Cloud.

While I was indulging in these gloomy reflections, the storm redoubled its violence. The wind came in heavy gusts, making the trees bend beneath its fury, like fragile blades of grass.

To the noise of the elements was now added a sound like distant thunder; it was the red tumbril returning from the Place de la Revolution to Clamart.

The door of the little chapel opened, and two men entered, streaming with water, and bearing between them a huge sack.

One of them was the same Legros whom I had visited in prison; the other was a grave-digger.

"Here, Monsieur Ledru," said the executioner's assistant; "here are your affairs. You need not hurry yourself to-night, for we will leave you the whole batch: we will bury them to-morrow when it will be daylight, for there is no fear of their taking cold from passing a night in the open air!" And, with a hideous laugh, these stipendiaries of death placed their burden in the angle near the ancient altar, and quitted the chapel without closing the door after them, which began to swing backward and forward on its hinges, admitting gusts of cold air, which made my candle flicker, and almost extinguished the flame already burning pale and dim around the blackened and neglected wick.

I heard them unharness the horse, fasten the gate of the cemetery, and depart, leaving the tumbril laden with headless bodies behind them.

I felt almost tempted to follow their example, but something—I knew not what—kept me shuddering in my seat.

I was certainly not afraid, but yet the noise of the wind, the beating of the rain, the rustling of the trees, swayed to and fro by the blast, which made my light flicker and tremble as it whistled through the crevice of the half open door, thrilled my every nerve with a sensation of vague and nameless terror, that I vainly tried to subdue.

All at once I fancied I heard a sweet and melancholy voice, which seemed to proceed from some part of the little chapel, pronounce the name of Albert. For a moment I trembled. "Albert"—there was but one person on earth who called me thus.

My eyes wandered slowly over the little building which, small as it was, my feeble candle did not wholly illumine, and rested on the sack placed in the angle by the altar, the bloody stains on which told too plainly what were its ghastly contents. At the same moment I heard the name of "Albert," repeated in the same soft, melancholy tones, but fainter than before. I sprang from my seat, cold with horror, for the voice seemed to proceed from the interior of the sack.

I passed my hand over my eyes—was I asleep or dreaming?

At last, rigid with terror, I approached the sack and opened it. As I did so I plainly felt the pressure of yet warm lips upon my hand!

My terror was such that its very excess gave me courage. I seized the head, and, returning to my fauteuil, in which I sank more dead than alive, I placed it on the table beside me.

Then I uttered a piercing cry, for this head—the lips of which were yet warm, and the lovely eyes but half closed—was that of Adèle!

I cried three times—"Adèle! Adèle! Adèle!" and the third time the eyes opened, gazed at me, two tears fell from them, and then, a momentary gleam lighting them up, as if at that moment the spirit took wing, they closed forever.

I rose from my chair, mad with grief and rage, and half believing myself the victim of some horrible delusion.

I was rushing from the chapel, when the lappet of my coat caught the corner of the table, and it fell to the ground, dragging me with it. In the fall the light was extinguished; but, as I lay extended on the pavement, I fancied I saw the head roll near to mine, and felt the pressure of its icy lips upon my own. A shudder passed through my veins. I uttered a deep groan, and fainted. The next morning I was discovered by the two grave-diggers, extended on the pavement of the chapel, as cold, and almost as lifeless, as the stones on which I lay.

Adèle, recognized through her father's letter, had been arrested, condemned, and executed the same day. Thus the head that had spoken, the eyes that had gazed on me, the lips that had pressed mine, were the eyes, the lips, the head of Adèle!

Miscellany.

—Thus speaks Sir Thomas Overbury of

A Good Wife:

"She is a world of happiness, that brings with it a kingdom in conceit, and makes a perfect adjunct in societie; shee's such a comfort as exceeds content, and proues so precious as canot be paralleld, yea more inestimable than may be valued. Shee's any good man's better second selfe, the very mirror of true constant modesty, the carefull huswife of frugalitie, and dearest object of man's heart's felicitie. She commands with mildnesse, rules with discretion, lives in repute, and ordereth all things that are good or necessarie. Shee's her husband's solace, her house's ornament, her children's succor, and her servant's comfort. Shee's (to be briefe) the eye of warinesse, the tongue of silence, the hand of labour, and the heart of loue. Her voice is musicke, her countenance meeknesse; her mind vertuous, and her soule gratious. Shee's a blessing giuen from God to man, a sweet companion in his affliction, and ioynt co-partner upon all occasions. Shee's (to conclude) earth's chiefest paragon, and will bee, when she dyes, heaven's dearest creature."

—French homes are not famous—although those who know them best speak most highly of the home arrangements of the French. But here is a description of

A French Woman at Home:

She helps to cook the dinner she has bought—for servants are wasteful with charcoal, and she knows to an inch how little she can use. In that marvelous place, a French kitchen—where two or three little holes in a stove cook such delicate dishes, and perform such culinary feats as our great roaring giants of coal fires have no conception of—she flits about like a fairy, creating magical messes out of raw material of the most ordinary description. Yes, though a lady born and bred, refined, elegant, and agreeable in society, a belle in her way, yet she does not think it beneath her dignity to lighten the household expenses by practical economy and activity. The dinner of a French family is cheap and simple. There is always soup, the meat of the stew-pan—sometimes, if not strict in expenditure, another plate of meat—generally two vegetables, dressed and eaten separately; and sometimes, not always, a sweet dish; if not that, a little fruit, such as may be the cheapest and the ripest in season. But there is very little of each thing, and it is rather in arrangement than in material that they appear rich. The idea that the French are gourmands in private life is incorrect. They spend little in eating, and they eat inferior things; though their cookery is rather a science than a mere accident of civilization. At home the great aim of the French is to save; and any self-sacrifice that will lead to this result is cheerfully undertaken, more especially in eating and in the luxury of mere idleness. No French woman will spend a shilling to save herself trouble. She would rather work like a dray-horse to buy an extra yard of ribbon, or a new pair of gloves, than lie on the softest sofa in the world in placid fine-ladyism with crumpled gauze or bare hands.

—The mind needs exercise as well as the body; and intellectual idleness needs to be as much striven against as physical listlessness. Dr. Combe speaks thus of the importance of

Regular Mental Exercise:

The nervous system, like all other parts, is most directly strengthened by exercise of its own functions. It is, therefore, of much consequence to keep the mind and feelings as fully employed, and as regularly exercised, as possible, and never to yield to the dislike for mental exertion which nervous debility generally brings along with it. And in that state, the best thing we can do is to invite and encourage others to stir us up even against our will at the time, particularly as the feeling of inability is always much greater than the reality; and if we act upon the feeling, we are apt to allow our whole faculties of mind and body to become weakened from a mistaken belief of their unfitness for exercise. So sensible of this am I in my own experience, that scarcely a day passes in which I do not feel positively grateful for being obliged to exert myself, and to do many things, and to see many people, that, were I left to inclination, I fear I should often neglect; and the consequence is, that the more I have to do, and the greater exertion I am making, the more I am able to do, and the happier I become. Your system obeys the same laws; and therefore the more you force yourself to active communication with others, and the more you exercise your mind and encourage your friends to rouse you up, the more certainly and speedily will you acquire strength of mind and health of body.

—Move on is the motto of this age. He who stands still will be run over, trampled down, and buried beneath the feet of those who obey the age's law of Progress. Call it brass, audacity, recklessness, or what else you please, the one quality which most strongly tends to success, to progress, as to action, is Courage.

A great deal of talent is lost to the world, says Sydney Smith, for the want of a little courage. Every day sends to their grave a number of obscure men who have only remained obscure because their timidity has prevented them from making a first effort, and who, if they could only have been induced to begin, would, in all probability, have gone great lengths in the career of fame. The fact is, that in order to do any thing in this world worth doing, we must not stand shivering on the bank, and thinking of the cold and the danger, but jump in and scramble through as well as we can. It will not do to be perpetually calculating risks, and adjusting nice chances; it did all very well before the flood, when a man could consult his friends upon an intended publication for a hundred and fifty years, and then live to see its success for six or seven centuries afterward; but at present a man waits, and doubts, and hesitates, and consults his brother, and his uncle, and his first cousins, and his particular friends, till one fine day he finds that he is sixty-five years of age—that he has lost so much time in consulting first cousins and particular friends, that he has no more time left to follow their advice. There is such little time for over-squeamishness at present, the opportunity so easily slips away, the very period of life at which a man chooses to venture, if ever, is so confined, that it is no bad rule to preach up the necessity, in such instances, of a little violence done to the feelings, and of efforts made in defiance of strict and sober calculation. With respect to that fastidiousness which disturbs the right conduct of the understanding, it must be observed that there are two modes of judging of any thing: one, by the test of what has actually been done in the same way before; the other, by what we can conceive may be done in that way. Now this latter method of mere imaginary excellence can hardly be a just criterion, because it may be in fact impossible to reduce to practice what it is perfectly easy to conceive; no man, before he has tried, can tell how difficult it is to manage prejudice, jealousy, and delicacy, and to overcome all that friction which the world opposes to speculation. Therefore, the fair, practical rule seems to be, to compare any exertion with all similar exertions which have preceded it, and to allow merit to any one who has improved, or at least who has not deteriorated the standard of excellence in his own department of knowledge. Fastidious men are always judging by the other standard; and, as the rest of the understanding can not fill up in a century what the imagination can sketch out in a moment, they are always in a state of perpetual disappointment, and their conversation one uniform tenor of blame. At the same time that I say this, I beg leave to lift up both my hands against that pernicious facility of temper in the estimation of which every thing is charming and delightful.

—What an injured race are the Cabmen!

They are the sailors of great cities; sailors in the uniformity of their reckless attire, and their countenances reddened and hardened by weather exposure, and in the peculiar slang with which, using professional terms, they speak of all mundane affairs. They are sailors in republican contempt for worldly dignities and dignitaries. As sailors have deep contempt for all who do not understand ships, cabmen depise every intellect unconcerned with horses. They are sailors in their intense acuteness and decided inclination to swindle. Yet sailors—dirty, improvident, dishonest—have a poetical position among men, and, except among ship-owners and captains, Jack has the merit of a jolly dog, innocent as a puppy, prettily playful. Jarvy has no novelists and no defenders; for the street is not the sea, and we miss the sixpences extracted from ourselves. When we sit in the cab and look at the statue-like heap of old clothes on the box, steering us through the traffic of the city, we feel toward him as if he were the inevitable foe—as Cape soldiers regard a Caffre—as Christians once regarded the Jews. His affecting devotion to his horse, whom he drives slowly in conviction of the risks of a rapider pace, meets with no sympathy from us: we consider the quadruped as in league with the driver.

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

At the Jefferson County circuit, held at Watertown last month, a fair young lady had impleaded a faithless swain for breaking his promise to make her his bride. The action was being tried, the court-room was crowded, and some damaging proof against the plaintiff had been given. "Crier, call Mr. Gunn," said the counsel for the defense—his attention just then being withdrawn for a moment by his client whispering in his ear. "What's his Christian name?" asked the crier, a simple-minded pensioner of the court. "Shot Gunn," answered the counsel, soto voce. "Shot Gunn!" shouted the crier in perfect simplicity at the top of his voice. The laughter of the audience was not allayed by a stentorian response of "Here!" from the midst of the crowd. The witness was sworn. His evidence elicited nothing in favor of the defendant, but it supplied an important link that was wanting in the plaintiff's case. "Mr. Gunn," said Sam, at the close of his examination, "you are discharged; you can go off. Brother C.," he continued, turning to the opposing counsel, "your Gun kicked!"

Along the line of the Illinois Central Railroad are mile-stones painted white, denoting the distance from Detroit or Chicago. In the cars one day a young lady, seeing the white stones, wanted to know "why there were so many grave-stones along the line of the railroad?" She shuddered when told they were by the graves of people that had been killed on the road!

Albert Smith once wrote an article in Blackwood, signed "A. S." "Tut," said Jerrold, on reading the initials, "what a pity Smith will tell only two-thirds of the truth!"

Prosy was boring Jerrold with a long story, and wound up with, "I thought I should have died with laughter." "I wish to Heaven you had," said Jerrold.

"That cat has got a cold," said a friend to Jerrold, pointing to a domestic favorite. "Yes," Jerrold replied, "the poor thing is subject to cat-arrh."

Some years ago, as Captain B——, of steamer Water-Witch, was passing down the Arkansas River, they had pressing need of an axe, and not having one on board, at the first landing the boat rounded to Captain B—— dispatched an Irishman to the nearest cabin in quest of one. Pretty soon Patrick returned with an axe; but when, after having used it, the Captain ordered him to return it, he refused point-blank. "Shure and I'd spake to the baste no more." "But what is the reason?" urged Captain B——. "Shure then an' I'll till ye. Whin I wint up to the cabin I saw a white woman fornenst, an' I axed her perlitely for the loan of an axe, and she telled me to ax her husband in the corn-field. So, yer honor, I wint up to the corn-field, and I saw a big black nager a standing there, and I ses to him, ses I, 'an' where's yer masther?' Ses he, 'I'm the masther;' an' ses I, 'I'm afther having the loan of an axe for a few minutes.' Ses he, 'Go down to the house and get it.' Well, I got the axe, Capting, an' as I wint by the door ses I to mesilf, 'Be jabers but I'll give her a shmall bit of my mind.' So I poked me head in the door, and ses I, 'Ain't ye ashamed of yersilf to be having a black nager for a husband?' An' ses she, 'Law, no! I had a sisther done worse than that;' an' ses I, 'What was that shure?' an' ses she, 'She married an Irishman.' An' bedad, I'll be afther spaking no more to the baste, Capting, biggin' yer honor's pardon." The "Capting" laughingly excused him from so unpleasant a duty.

"I was employed in my present occupation," writes a correspondent, "several years ago in a house of this city as book-keeper, and not an uncommon occasion is it to bring suit upon sundry individuals in these parts for a failure of a 'promise to pay.' It so chanced that a certain constable, who rejoiced in the plain cognomen of 'Walker,' and a curious old genius was he—peace to his ashes!—managed to get in debt to our house several dollars. After 'letting it run' some time after due, I proposed putting it in suit, when the proprietor said it would hardly be of use, for the man made it a part of his conscience not to pay. However I ruled, and, having got out 'the papers,' I handed them to the identical constable himself, thinking it might induce him to pay without further trouble. He read over the summons, etc., and put it in his pocket, and, after keeping the same about a week, returned the execution, plainly indorsed upon the same, 'No property found; and,' added he, 'I never tried harder to make a small debt in all my constableship—or, if I did, I have forgot the day and generation!' Honest, don't you think?"

A critic one day talked to Jerrold about the humor of a certain novelist, who was certainly no humorist. "Humor!" exclaimed Jerrold, "why, he sweats at a joke like a Titan at a thunder-bolt!"

It seems to be so easy to be good-natured, I wonder any body takes the trouble to be any thing else.

In olden times there were "five foolish virgins." We are afraid that there are fully as many as that number at this present day. Some of them were born foolish; some of them were made foolish by the examples of their weak-minded mothers; and some of them have made themselves foolish.

An editor acknowledges the receipt of a bottle of brandy forty-eight years old; and says, "This brandy is so old that we very much fear it can not live much longer."

What gentleman can, with any propriety, ask a fat woman to lean on his arm?

A ROLAND FOR AN OLIVER.

In a small town on the Susquehanna River there is a church in which the singing had "run completely down." It had been led for many years by one of the deacons, whose voice and musical power had been gradually failing.

One evening the clergyman gave out the hymn, which was in metrical measure rather harder than usual, and the deacon led off. Upon its conclusion the minister arose and said:

"Brother B—— will please repeat the hymn, as I can not conscientiously pray after such singing!"

The deacon very composedly pitched it to another tune, with a manifest improvement upon the first effort, and the clergyman proceeded with his prayer. Having finished, he took up a book to give the second hymn, when he was interrupted by the deacon gravely getting up and saying, in a voice audible to the whole congregation:

"Will Mr. —— please make another prayer? It will be impossible for me to sing after such praying as that!"

There was recently a concert on the skirts of Newcastle, and the audience comprised some amateurs from a mine. In the course of the evening the Paganini of the orchestra stepped forward to play "a solo on the violin." His ambitious selection was the famous "Carnival," through which he struggled with exemplary courage, and at the end he dropped his bow and fiddle by his side, right and left, and made obeisance, expecting a burst of applause; instead of which his ears were astounded by an exclamation from the back seats: "Aw say, fiddler, are ye gaun to be all neet tunin' that fiddle o' yourn, or are ye gaun to give us a tune?"

A gentleman, on taking an edition of Gibbon's Rome to a book-store in Boston to be bound, was asked whether he would have it bound in Russia? "Oh no," he replied, "Russia is too far off. I will have it done here."

Let no repugnance to the single state
Lead to a union with a worthless mate.
Although 'tis true you'll find full many a fool
Who'd make old maids the butt of ridicule,
A single lady, though advanced in life,
Is much more happy than an ill-matched wife.

Whoever felt the pain of a pun so poor as this:
"The youth, with joy unfeigned,
Regain'd the felt, and felt what he regain'd."

During the two rival Democratic State Conventions that have recently been held in Illinois, a little weasel-faced man came up to Jake Newsome, a comparative giant in weight and height, and inquired of Jake, "Sir, which wing do you belong to?"

"Wing!" replied Jake, in a voice of thunder.

"Yes, Sir, which wing of the Democracy?" asked the little fellow.

"Wing! We belong to no wing. We're the whole bird, Sir!"

The art of phonographic reporting is the best ever invented, but nevertheless sometimes leads to mistakes. Not long since a member of Congress made a speech, quoting Latin, "Amicus Socrates, amicus Plato est, sed major veritas" (Socrates is my friend, Plato is my friend, but truth is much more my friend). This appeared next day in the report as follows; "I may cuss Socrates, I may cuss Plato, said Major Veritas!"

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

New York, Monday, May 24, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets have been well supplied with the leading kinds of Flour, at generally reduced prices, yet the demand has not improved, either for home use or for shipment. Wheat was received and sold freely, buyers having had any existing advantage. Corn was scarce and in request. It closed higher. A livelier inquiry prevailed for Rye and Barley, while Oats continued depressed....Cotton has been in moderate demand, at, however, easier prices....Teas and Sugars have attracted more attention, and have improved a shade, while other kinds of Groceries have been in rather limited request at drooping rates....Provisions have been moderately sought after, and Hog products have advanced slightly....Hay has been in good supply and fair demand at uniform prices....More activity was discernible in Tobacco and Wool....Naval Stores declined considerably, and closed heavily....The Spring trade in Dry Goods has nearly terminated. Some small orders for desirable goods, however, continue to reach jobbers. Prices of Cottons and Silks are generally well supported, while Woolens and Linens, in the main, tend in favor of purchasers. The auction sales are diminishing in number, and are unimportant. The week's imports of Dry Goods amounted to $762,144 against $657,732 the corresponding week in 1857. The imports since the 1st of January have been $18,718,876 against $40,368,845 same time in 1857. The movements in other commodities were moderate, and unproductive of any remarkable alterations....We append a revised list of the closing quotations for the leading articles:

Freights were inactive, yet rates were maintained. For Liverpool—Cotton, 3-16d. @ 7-32d. per pound; Flour, 2s. 3d. @ 2s. 6d. per barrel; Grain, 9d. to 9½d. per bushel; Rosin, 2s. 6d. per barrel; Beef, 5s. @ 5s. 6d. per tierce; and Heavy Goods, 20s. @ 25s. per ton. For other ports proportionate rates. The total number of vessels of all classes in port on Saturday was 752.

The Live Stock Markets last Wednesday were less freely supplied with Beeves, which were in fair demand, and closed a shade lighter....Milch Cows were sparingly sought after, though much better animals were obtainable than could be had the previous week at our quotations. Dealers say that the excitement raised against Swill Milk has cheapened the price of Cows $5 @ $10 per head. With the clearing out of the Distillery Stables, the Cows' lives will be lengthened, consequently fewer animals will be required to meet the demand ....Receipts and sales of Veal Calves were very moderate....Sheep and Lambs were less abundant, and were in request at improved prices....Swine continued plenty and heavy....The reported receipts of Live Stock during each of the last two weeks compare thus:

The Country Produce Markets have been very tame. New Potatoes from Bermuda, with New Potatoes, New Turnips, Green Peas, and some Strawberries from the South, were the chief novelties. The demand was restricted. Long Island and New Jersey furnished large supplies of Radishes, Rhubarb, Asparagus, Lettuce, Parsley, Spinach, &c., for which a moderate inquiry prevailed. Butter and Cheese were inactive. Eggs were less abundant, and were a trifle dearer. Poultry (with the exception of Geese) was in fair supply. Game was quite scarce.

LONG ISLAND POTTERY, Depot No. 82 Nassau Street, New York.

SCENE IN THE BRANDRETH HOUSE, May 14.—(Six gentlemen seated around a table.)

First Gentleman—This house is owned by the maker of the celebrated Brandreth's Pills, which have great merit. I have a brother who lives in New Hampshire, and who was for a long time sick. The doctors around did not seem to help him; his courage and energy failed; his step was feeble, and his countenance and eyes indicated constant physical debility. Finally he was prevailed upon to take Brandreth's Pills, and, strange as it may appear to you, the first box put him right on his feet, and their use for a few months restored him entirely to perfect health. He thinks that Dr. Brandreth is superior to all living men.

Second Gentleman—I am from Buenos Ayres. The brother of Rosas was for many years a bed-ridden paralytic. No idea was entertained that he would ever recover the use of his limbs. His case was supposed hopeless; but an enlightened Jesuit said "Try a few doses of Brandreth's Pills; they may possibly benefit you." He used a few doses, and was helped. He continued them daily; he increased to ten pills, night and morning; he began to feel the circulation in the remote extremities. The use of the pills was further judiciously persevered in; suffice it to say, that in less than six months he was perfectly cured, having recovered the use of his limbs completely. He immediately had a picture of Dr. Brandreth painted, as his tutelary saint, and to this day he has burning before it two large candles, which he designs to continue, in proof of his veneration for the man whose Pills restored him to health. Mr. Graham, United States Consul at Buenos Ayres, narrated to me the above facts, and I know them to be true.

Third Gentleman—Brandreth's Pills have made some cures here. A friend of mine, of large fortune and high social position, was afflicted with a dropsy. His physicians gave him no hope, advised him to settle his worldly affairs, for his time on earth was to be of brief duration. He was directed by a special Providence to Brandreth's Pills; he read over a pamphlet relating to them; he took a first dose; he followed the plan of purgation right onward; his largest dose was fifteen pills in a single day. The absorbents were aroused to action—the excess of watery deposits were removed, and in the very prime of his manhood and usefulness, he was restored to vigorous health. Dr. Brandreth's Pills have not begun to be half known yet.

Fourth Gentleman—I know Brandreth's Pills are a wonderful remedy. In Jagrao, Rio Grande, Brazil, they were administered to a man who had been sick for five years, confined to his bed with inflammatory rheumatism. His limbs were contracted and drawn up, his hands closed and stiffened. He took the pills—four in the morning and four in the evening—and drank freely of beef soup, which was his only diet. In six weeks he was entirely cured, and rode six miles to see me on horseback. This cure, effected by Brandreth's Pills, after many medicines and physicians had failed, caused the son of Dr. Brandreth to sell, at retail, $1700 worth of his pills in that little town in two weeks.

Fifth Gentleman—A Mr. Underhill, of Westchester County, who fought in the War of 1812, is a great admirer of Dr. Brandreth, because, he said, his pills saved his life. He was suffering from a cancerous affection in his left breast, and had been under treatment three years without any benefit. He finally commenced to try the different patent medicines, but got no better until he began with Brandreth's Pills. These taken every night, in doses varying from five to ten, cured him entirely in two months. Some time after he was badly hurt by a tree falling upon his back, but still he took Brandreth's Pills every day. His surgeon told him they could do no good for a local injury, and that it would be at least a year before he could walk. In three weeks he was restored to health, and ascribes his recovery to them. He swears he will vote for Brandreth as long as he lives.

Sixth Gentleman—And these Pills are sold at No. 294 Canal Street, Brandreth Building.

First Gentleman—They are, at 25 cents a box.

CAUTION.

LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA.

The attention of Messrs. Harper & Brothers has been called to several spurious Works put forth as the "NARRATIVE OF DR. LIVINGSTONE'S TRAVELS IN AFRICA." One of these is a gross forgery throughout. It does not contain a single line written or furnished by Dr. Livingstone, bears no resemblance whatever to his genuine Narrative, but is altogether the invention of the fabricator. Another book professes to give, "in the language of Dr. Livingstone," a "complete account of his various journeys, omitting only incidental details and scientific matter." These "incidental details" which are omitted form more than one half of the matter in the genuine edition, embracing the most valuable part of the book, nearly all of the characteristic Illustrations, and the elaborate Maps, which are essential to a full understanding of the explorations and travels of the Author. The place of the genuine Illustrations has been supplied by coarse second-hand cuts, bearing no relation whatever to Dr. Livingstone's Book. This mutilated edition is designed mainly for circulation through the "Gift-Book" scheme of the publisher, although it is understood that reputable members of the Trade have purchased it, supposing it to be a genuine, unmutilated edition.

Messrs. Harper & Brothers respectfully caution the Trade and the Public against being imposed upon by these forged and mutilated Works.

The only genuine unmutilated American edition of Dr. Livingstone's Work is that published by Messrs. Harper & Brothers, printed from an early copy purchased for a large sum from the Author. It contains 754 pages, large octavo, with a Portrait of the Author engraved upon Steel; two elaborate Steel Plate Maps, with Livingstone's Routes colored, and Forty-five large Wood-cuts, engraved in the highest style of the Art. The volume is beautifully printed and substantially bound. Price Three Dollars.

CATARRH!

I am fully aware, that credulity has been taxed to its utmost, and public confidence nearly annihilated, by impositions and fraudulent pretences, in the shape of "cure alls" and specifics for every malady. As a physician of many years practice, I have witnessed with abhorrence and disgust such mercenary frauds. But I claim exemption from the charge of such duplicity from the fact—long since established—that my discovery of the nature, origin, and character, or, in other words, my pathology of Catarrh is true, and, that my treatment proves a positive and radical cure.

Applicants by letter must faithfully describe their symptoms.

WYOMING. Its History, Stirring Incidents, and Romantic Adventures. By George Peck, D.D. With Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25.

The Valley of Wyoming, which is no less celebrated in English poetry than in American history, has been made the scene of terrible as well as romantic legends, which are now, for the first time, sifted in the light of critical research. For more than forty years the author has enjoyed special advantages for the study of its local traditions, and has assiduously devoted himself to the collection and exposition of facts. His work consists mainly of a succession of historic scenes, each narrative being complete in itself, and at the same time forming a portion of a general description on a larger scale.

THE GIFT BOOK SYSTEM.—A KEY TO THE MYSTERY.—It is generally conceded that every good cause requires, at its inauguration, an exemplary martyrdom, while the entire history of reformation demonstrates that evil is often incidentally inflicted upon unoffending innocents. The late proceedings of our worthy mayor, in his laudable zeal at purgation of impositions, assailing both citizens and country folk, from fraudulent lottery and gift-prize systems, while crowned with success at the point towards which they were aimed, have unfortunately been productive of some antagonism to one of the most reputable and extensive book firms extant in this metropolis. It is due to the character and reputation of Messrs. Evans & Co., the universally popular publishers and booksellers, of 677 Broadway, that the public pass exert every influence in their power to eradicate any erroneous impressions which may be excited as regards the legality and uprightness of their dealing.

We, citizens and neighbors of Messrs. Evans & Co., possess an advantage of discrimination unfortunately denied readers at a distance; for, while we personally are cognizant of the honorable position they occupy in our local trade, many beyond that circle may be debarred into an idea that their operations come beneath the repressive action of our municipal authorities. With the sole view of making reparation to an enterprising and flourishing establishment, should any damage have accrued to their reputation from ignorance or misapprehension, we now cheerfully bear testimony that no precaution of Messrs. Evans & Co. has been attempted or contemplated by either the energetic mayor or learned district attorney of our city. We regret to learn that malicious individuals have endeavored to misapply the official acts of our magistracy to the detriment of these gentlemen, whose dealings are not only satisfactory to an immense majority of our community, but are endorsed by flattering testimonials from the leading publishers of this and the neighboring cities.

As we understand the system pursued by Messrs. Evans & Co. in the award of their gifts of jewelry, it resolves itself into an abatement of dividends derived from profits. They give to every purchaser a book at the customary retail price, and a gift, paid for by themselves out of the profits, which otherwise would legitimately be consigned to their money-drawer. There is nothing either disreputable or illegal in the transaction; it is simply an ingenious method of advertising.

HON. WILLIAM BIGLER, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

THE Democratic Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. William Bigler, was born at Shermansburg, Cumberland County, Pennsylvania, in December, 1814. His parents were of German descent, and were educated, like most of that class known as "Pennsylvania-Germans," in the German language. While the subject of this memoir was very young his parents removed to Mercer County, in what proved to be a disastrous attempt to build up their fortunes; for the elder Bigler had been induced to purchase a large tract of wild land, the title to which was defective, and in a short time he found himself bereft of every thing but a small farm.

The sustenance of his large family depending upon the products of a new farm in a wilderness country, the father, aided as he was by the labors of his children, was obliged to exert himself too severely; and before he had succeeded in placing his family upon a fair footing in the world his frame succumbed to disease, and he passed away, leaving his widow and children to wrestle with the difficulties of a backwoods life. If his dying vision could have looked forward a very few years, he would have beheld two of the children, about whom he must have had great concern, filling the gubernatorial chairs of two of the most important States in the Union—John Bigler, the eldest brother, Governor of California, and William Bigler Governor of Pennsylvania; and, very shortly afterward, one representing his country in an important foreign mission, and the other occupying the highly honorable position of the confidential friend and adviser of the President in the United States Senate.

Busily occupied with the labors necessary for the support of the family, William Bigler received but a moderate school education, but he graduated in what we believe to be the best college for the practical development of the talents of a bright boy—the printing-office. From 1829 to 1833 he was employed by his brother John (since Governor of California) in the printing-office of the Centre Democrat, published at Bellefonte.

In August, 1833, just twenty-five years ago, he felt that the time had arrived when he ought to commence the edifice of his own fortune; and, his preparations being made, he started for Clearfield (his present residence) with an old hand-press, a set of sheepskin balls, a font of second-hand long primer and bewier type, and twenty dollars of borrowed money, intending to publish a newspaper in Clarion. With all deference to the present dignity of the amiable Senator from Pennsylvania, we can not help running a mental parallel between his venture and that of another distinguished gentleman, whose faith in the prophecy of Bow-bells was originally not properly rewarded by the thrice-conferred dignity of "Lord Mayor of London." Indeed, so perilous was the enterprise that one of his friends, a prominent Judge residing in Bellefonte, felt it to be his duty to utter the "well-meant warning, "Young man, don't go there; you'll starve!" But Mr. Bigler did not think so, and he started with a brave heart, which, however, lost some of its confidence as he neared his destination; for it is related, as one of the most painful of his experiences, that as he approached his journey's end, and reflected upon his utter friendlessness—knowing only two individuals in the whole county of Clearfield—his soul was overcome by the blank, cheerless prospect, and he sought to bribe his teamster with his borrowed twenty dollars into concealing the object of his journey, and to return the goods to their owners in Bellefonte, while he would push on, penniless and afoot, to the far West. Fortunately for him, his design was frustrated; for he was received by the people of Clearfield with such a frank and generous hospitality, that now, a quarter of a century after the event, when surrounded by dignity and wealth, any reference to their kindness to him in that trying time kindles in him the strongest emotion. His press was soon set up and his type distributed; and in a few days he issued the first number of the Clearfield Democrat, which he continued to publish until 1836, performing the various functions of compositer, pressman, editor, proof-reader, and publisher; managing his affairs with so much sagacity and prudence that he was speedily enabled to pay for his printing material. He was soon immersed in politics, and very rapidly gained a reputation for energy and shrewdness; nor was his editorial and political fame lessened by his great skill as a marksman, for he hunting friends asserted very confidently that he "never missed a buck, even if it were on the full jump when he fired!"—an accomplishment of considerable weight with the early settlers of Pennsylvania.

In 1836 he disposed of the Clearfield Democrat, and entered into a mercantile partnership with Mr. A. B. Reed, with whom daughter he had formed another and more sacred partnership in the previous March. His editorial career, however, had brought his abilities so prominently before the notice of the people, that he was repeatedly urged to accept a nomination as candidate for the Legislature. About the period of his marriage and retirement from editorial life, the question of a reform of the State Constitution was agitated with great excitement. On one side it was asserted that, under the old Constitution, the prerogatives of the Governor were almost regal; while, on the opposite side, opposed to every change, were large numbers of office-holders, and many of the wealthiest citizens. Into this contest Mr. Bigler threw his whole energies, and did much toward gaining the victory by which a Convention was obtained for changing the Constitution. As an acknowledgment of his services, he was urged by his friends to serve in the important Convention, but again refused an election.

In 1841, however, his admirers, availing themselves of his absence from the State, nominated him as a candidate for the State Convention; and the best evidence of his personal popularity is afforded by the fact that, with an opposition candidate in the field, only one vote was cast against him in the county of Clearfield, in which he resided. He was twice elected Speaker of the State Senate, and was continued in the Senate up to 1847. During his terms of service some of the most important events in the history of Pennsylvania transpired, and the activity and ability manifested in the leading part which he took in measures which most vitally affected the interests of that great commonwealth laid the foundation for his subsequent honors. It was during his first term of service that the credit of Pennsylvania was injured by her failure to pay the interest on her debt. While the United States Bank was failing, commerce was paralyzed, and consternation and dismay were prompting dishonest measures of relief, an attempt was made to induce the State Legislature to repudiate the public debt. To this Mr. Bigler, as Chairman of the Committee of Finance, opposed a most determined resistance, insisting upon maintaining inviolate the honor of Pennsylvania, and laboring day and night for the passage of a law for taxation to meet the public indebtedness. A friend who was present says: "I well remember the first time he addressed the Senate upon these important financial questions. Without the artificial graces of oratory, his speech was the embodiment of plain common sense and conclusive reasoning. He seized the strong points of the argument, and discussed them in a masterly and convincing manner. His friends were gratified, and his enemies—if, indeed, he had any—were silenced." He was also mainly instrumental in securing the passage of a law for abolishing imprisonment for debt.

In his second term of service the State was agitated by questions of internal improvement. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company was seeking the right of way through Pennsylvania to Pittsburg, a project which was regarded by the people of Philadelphia as prejudicial to their interests; and was successfully opposed by Mr. Bigler, who substituted what is regarded as a more favorable road for the State in connection with Pennsylvania Central Railroad, from Philadelphia to Pittsburg, to which the former city is largely indebted for its present commercial prosperity.

In 1838 Mr. Bigler's name was presented to the Democratic Convention for nomination as a candidate for Governor; but, though he received a large vote, the choice fell upon Joseph Ingersoll, by whom election Mr. Bigler labored assiduously, but this time without success. In 1851, however, he was nominated by acclamation, and, upon the contest of unusual severity, he was elected by eight thousand majority. Mr. Bigler made a large number of speeches during that campaign, the leading issue of which was the administration of the Fugitive Slave Law, against which much hard feeling was provoked by the Christiana tragedy. In his various addresses he sustained the doctrine that a faithful execution of that law is a constitutional obligation of the States, and citizens of the States; and also advocated the non-intervention of Congress in the affairs of the Territories. By a singular coincidence his own election as Governor of Pennsylvania was simultaneous with the election of his elder brother to the same dignity in the new State of Minnesota.

The machinery of government did not work very smoothly during Mr. Bigler's gubernatorial term. For a great difference of opinion existed between the Legislature and the Executive upon questions of banks and corporate privileges. During the session of the Legislature after his inauguration he sent in thirty veto messages, not all of which received his assent to eleven charters for as many new banks.

In 1854 the State Democratic Convention again unanimously nominated him for Governor, and he entered upon another laborious canvass. This was to contend against the "American" party, in addition to its former opponents, and which had defeated the Kansas and Nebraska Bill, to which he gave his infirmament, although it is known that he preferred the first bill, prepared by Mr. Douglas, to the one which ultimately became a law. Defeated in the contest for the Governorship of Pennsylvania, he became President of the Philadelphia and Erie Railroad; but was again called into political life by his election to the United States Senate, in January, 1855.

Entering the Senate with the last Congress, he has had little opportunity to distinguish himself in debate. His contest with Senator Douglas, at the commencement of the present session, has brought him most prominently before the country; but it is in the committee-room, and in the visiting interviews with fellow-counsel in those unrecorded conferences which mould the destinies of nations, that he most distinguishes himself. He is a less keen and more felt than almost any gentleman on the Administration side of the Senate. He is continually heard by persons who wish to avail themselves of his known intimate relations with the President and Cabinet, in his most truly position of personal friend, adviser, and confidant of the Chief Executive, in a mode of certainty and extreme courtesy of demeanor toward those who approach him even for favors. He is one of the rare men whom dignity and fortune do not spoil. His fine appearance and genial countenance are the indices of his character. He is not believed to has an enemy even among his political opponents.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, JUNE 5, 1858.

THE BRITISH AGGRESSIONS ON AMERICAN COMMERCE.

THE render will find elsewhere accounts of a couple of fresh outrages by the British cruisers off the coast of Cuba. The limits of this sheet forbid our giving a detailed narrative of all the outrages which have been perpetrated by that same cruiser upon our vessels within the past month. Suffice it to say that nearly thirty American vessels, engaged in lawful commerce, and bearing the United States flag, have been compelled to bring to, boarded and visited by British vessels of war. The word hardly add—for who is ignorant of the fact?—that the men has aroused the national temper almost to the war point, and that the Senate has felt it necessary to adopt resolutions of the most decided and almost belligerent character. Senator Mason, who was at first disposed to pooh, pooh! the whole affair as a mere newspaper tale, now sees the propriety of joining issue squarely with the British Government on the long-disputed question of the right of visitation; Senator Douglas is willing to assign the liberties of his nation to a Providential keeping for the sake of punishing the English; and that paragon of national wisdom, Senator Sam Houston joins hands for once with Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, and, in the language of a pugilist, lays his "coat around it" the fight which his patriotic emotions demand.

One can perhaps understand and make allowance for the warmth and vehemence displayed by the Senate. That body is well known to be composed of almost heedless youths, whose tempers have not yet been toned down to moderation. It would perhaps be unreasonable to expect them to display the mature gravity and sober caution which are the characteristics of age.

But there is no reason why the public at large should follow the example of these hot-headed youths, and debate this serious question with the fury of new recruits. It is possible, perhaps, to be cool and deliberate even in considering a British outrage upon the national flag. Anger is no doubt wholesome on some occasions; but this is one on which cool reason may serve our purpose better.

At the time this country began to have a national navy, Great Britain exercised, by right of usurpation, the privilege of stopping and searching foreign merchant vessels on the high seas. There was no warrant for the practice in the books of international or maritime law. She exercised it because she could do so, and for no end because she had the power. For a series of years American merchant vessels were subject to be stopped on the high seas by British cruisers, and searched for British sailors—who then, as now, manned the bulk of our ships. Repeated remonstrance and protest against this unjustifiable and insolent practice failing to produce Great Britain to relinquish it, war was at length declared by the United States. It was carried on with various fortune for a couple of years. Both countries were weary of the strife, peace was declared. But in the treaty of peace not a word was said of the issue on which the war had been waged. On the contrary the privilege was effected. So far as the right of search was concerned the war left both nations in statu quo—for though the practice was suspended right, the United States denying it as before.

Practically, however, the United States partially carried their point. While the Government of England refrained from any official declaration of its abandonment of the right, it tacitly abandoned all claim to search American vessels for British seamen. The United States remained content with this practical victory.

In 1842, treaty stipulations were concluded between the two countries which were supposed to maintain a certain squadron on the coast of Africa for the purpose of suppressing the slave-trade. It was agreed by the British diplomatist who concluded that treaty to interpolate therein a clause binding the contracting parties to submit the right of search claimed by the cruisers of either; to this the American Government refused to consent. The American Government stood to the main principle of the Treaty, namely, the suppression of the slave-trade by the employment of a certain squadron on the coast of Africa, the British plenipotentiary could well afford to yield the point. Without the right of search, the treaty became a nullity, and the omission of a clause sanctioning that right in so many words could not be held by any impartial person to imply the renunciation on the part of either contracting party of the only feasible method by which the purpose of the treaty could be carried out. In fact, from the first, the English vessels on the coast of Africa have systematically searched all suspected vessels, without regard to whether the United States flag or any other; and latterly, since higher exigencies have compelled the United States to withdraw the flag of that force from that station, the work of search has been almost altogether relinquished to the British.

The treaty proved a failure. It did not meet the ends sought. Under the British protection the slave trade of Brazil exchaling slavers from that country, and Cuba remaining the only market for the new importations—the British Government, lately resolved to alter their tactics, and to assail the traffic not on the coast of Africa, but on the shores of Cuba—not at the point of production, but at the market where alone the product is available. This resolution—which was formed at the time when Lord Palmerston's overthrow—was strongly fortified by a recent dispatch from General Cass to Lord Napier, in which the former avows the intention at the British exploits on the African coast, and inquired why, if the English had the suppression of the slave-trade so much at heart, they did not assail it in Cuba? We now perceive that they have assailed it in Cuba—assailed it, in fact, by subjecting to search all vessels in the of the Island—whether with or without the consent of the Spanish authorities we can not tell, and matters not.

To carry out this blockade, they have searched every vessel, Americans as well as others, on the route to the waters where the slaver lurks.

They have done so on the plea that the mere hoisting of the American flag is no protection from search, when the treaty of waste paper, as, of course, every slaver will always claim American flag, and that the only of ascertaining by actual observation whether or no the American flag is rightly hoisted, and whether the vessel is not really a disguised slaver. This they do not call a right of search, but a right of visitation—though it would puzzle a lexicographer to find out any substantial difference between the terms.

It is evident that the English plea is sound. If armed cruisers are to be allowed to check the trade by the science of slavers, they must have the right of stopping and examining all vessels which seem likely to contain slavers. Without such a right, the operations of the squadrons would be ridiculously futile. They would be in the position of a watchman set to guard property but scrupulously forbidden to look at any intruder upon the premises. And the unwilling opening of the United States Senate—when we have on the Statute Book an Act in which we bargain conjointly with England to put down the slave-trade, by the employment of armed squadrons—at the commission of acts without which that bargain would become a mere nullity, certainly redounds but slightly to the credit of that august body's common sense.

On the other hand, it is quite plain that the right of search or visitation claimed by Great Britain, is a palpable invasion of the sovereignty of the United States. The principle that the flag covers the ship and cargo is too obvious and too generally admitted to need comment at the present day. No nation can submit to allow its vessels to be searched by the cruisers of another nation without abdicating some portion of its sovereignty; and the nation which claims any such right of visitation, arrogates to itself an authority which no power can possess with regard to whose ships that right is exercised. Were the United States to submit to the practice now asserted by Great Britain, they would tacitly admit the legal supremacy and general police authority of the latter on the high seas.

It is evident that this can not be done. It is clear that we must put an end to this right of search or visitation. But it is unnecessary and absolutely silly to get into a rage about the matter; for it is clear as noonday that we brought these outrages on ourselves by making the treaty of 1842. That treaty never could have been carried into effect without the visitation of American ships; and as we made and ratified it, it is of no consume now to clamor at a consequence which must have been foreseen at the time it was executed.

We anticipate no trouble with Great Britain. The people of England will not go to war with us. Nor would we with them. Engaged in the enormous Asiatic struggle, will give way, and either new arrangements will be made for the police of the ocean, or the matter will be left to take care of itself. The foolish treaty of 1842 will be abrogated. For the rest, the affair of hostilities is preposterous, and only worthy of the petty politicians who trade in national comities. It is not a little significant that the waters where this last dispute arose were also the scene of the gallant devotion of the British sailors and doctors who, a few weeks since, saved the survivors of the Georgiennaud from the most terrible of deaths; and that the first American officer who has been dispatched to the scene of action is he who presented the Resolute to the Queen of England, and assured her of the personal attachment and respect which his countrymen bear her. Such men are very unlikely to strike the first blow in an Anglo-American war.

THE GOVERNMENT OF INDIA.

WE alluded, in a recent number, to the probable difficulties which the British Government would have to encounter in framing a new system of Government for the reconquered Indian territory. We are now placed in possession of further information on the subject. Votes of the House of Commons prove that Parliament is resolved at all events to oust the control of the British Possessions in India out of the hands of the East India Company, and to vest that control elsewhere. The question to be decided is whether to transfer the Company in administering the Government of the hundred and fifty millions of souls who are, directly or indirectly, subject to British authority in India.

Two plans have been proposed, one by Lord Palmerston, the other by Mr. Disraeli. The former proposes that the establishment of a board of control for India, without constitutional restrictions; the members of said board to be appointed by the Crown, and to be responsible only to her. The plan of which Mr. Disraeli claims the paternity is identical in detail with that of Lord Palmerston; but it proposes to vest the supreme authority over Indian affairs in a board composed partly of officials appointed by the Queen, partly of old East India Directors, and partly of persons elected by the chief seaports of England. The numerical proportions of the three different classes of members are so contrived that the Crown members shall be in a minority. Mr. Disraeli therefore claims that his scheme is more democratic of the two.

It is much easier to find faults than merits in both schemes. It is positively astounding that the people at home, who govern India by the agency of an irresponsible board of foreign despots, never have had any power to set a foot in India. But it is equally ridiculous to contemplate the creation of sea-port constituencies with authority over Indian interests. We shall best realize the absurdity of Mr. Disraeli's plan by supposing that Congress had passed a law granting the governments of Mexico in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Boston. How would Ohio and Illinois relish such an embarrassment? And yet these constituencies of Great Britain have as large an interest in her colonial dependencies as the seaport towns; they surely will not consent to be thrust into the background in the unceremonious manner contemplated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The American idea, in the case of newly acquired possessions in a state of outrage, is to direct them to assume the forms and even the semblance of sovereignty; the parent authority reserving sufficient control to prevent mischief. This very simple and just system does not seem to have occurred to the English. Yet it does not clearly appear that any serious evil would flow from at least a trial of the plan in India. If the Residencies happened to form part of our dominion, we should erect them into Territories, and expect them to elect Territorial legislatures. We should appoint governors, intrust them with the veto power, and should sustain them, in case of need, with an ample military force. If the Territories elected men who showed themselves competent to the task of self-government, we should, after a time, submit them into the Union, as equal and coördinate commonwealths; if they did not, we should keep them in a state of pupilage till they did.

It is very singular that this simple idea—the education of peoples for the trade of self-government—should not have occurred to the British mind, the experiments now in progress must end with this.

MESSRS. BANGS, BROTHER, & CO., auctioneers, will sell on the 9th, 10th, and 11th of June, about five hundred paintings, which deserve the attention of lovers of art. They are a collection made by a dealer at the time when the French entered the city. Many of them are undoubtedly originals of value, although no great pretense is made by the gentlemen who sell them. They are put up in very rough condition, but artists and amateurs will thank us for calling their attention to the sale, which differs so much from ordinary picture auctions in New York that we have departed from our usual custom in this case. Every one who pretends to be a lover of art should make a point of seeing the collection.

MY FAIR LOVE.

LETTICE, my fair-haired love,
Hadst thou ever heard
How sweetest thou sweet berries,
How riper than the ripest,
Are the lips of my fair love,
Than rain-gift of the year,
And drops where, nursing free,
She dreams—but not of nest—beneath the fruited tree.

O boy bee! comest thou
How than each honeyed bell,
Spiced pink, or dewy rose
That in the sunset grows,
Is sweeter my love's kiss,
Than all that read, than sun-new lilies.
Thy glancing wings, and light—
But lightly light!—to detain from her red lips so bright.

I speak, O bird! to bee!
My love—so coy to see—
Should let go still and bright
Her lips, that ye might die,
Lost in a boundless gain
Of sharp delicious pain!
I'd creep, to breathe her breath,
Into your shells, content to die your blissful death!

THE LOUNGER.

SOME NEW BOOKS.

IT is certainly one good result of the commercial crisis that the weekly publications of the weekest novels has been interrupted, and that we may have some chance of really enjoying a good new book. Yet we who is familiar with the unnatural history of publishing but must sigh over the goodly lists of "just published"—knowing, as he does, how few of the books that come fluttering before the public eye will ever be heard of after that announcement—and while in the announcement itself Tupper is as important as Shakespeare. As the Lounger, moreover, is about to mention a few more new books, he begs the authors, if by chance they should honor him with a glance, not to consider this little preface as a puff of their productions. On the contrary, the Lounger begs to assure them that he has no favors to confer, and is quite free, and all discriminating judges will allow that to be.

In fact, there can not be two opinions in either of the cases supposed.

Dr. Peck's "Wyoming," historical and romantic, tracks the region which is not only among the most picturesquely and poetically famous of American scenes, but which is becoming every year more visited by artists, tourists, and sketchers. A lovely landscape in the Academy, this year, reveals the character of the Wyoming valley, which is confirmed by the enthusiasm of all who have seen it. Dr. Peck's work is a historical monograph, the result of much investigation, and we are very glad to remind the citizen who is sketching his summer campaign that, as for every, in the corner of Pennsylvania, and accessible by rail through delightful scenery, is a region is familiar to the imagination as it is near to the eye.

In the "Life of George Stephenson" we have one of the most interesting and valuable of modern biographies. It is not the story of a man merely, but of a system. It is the history of railroads, and of the man whose peculiar genius has been of more influence in their development than that of any other individual. Born the son of a collier—learning to read when he was eighteen—mending watches and locks in his leisure hours—with hardwood mechanical genius, he improved the machinery he found about him—he invented a safety lamp on the same principles as Davy's, and just before him—he constructed and worked locomotive engines—and, at last, in the face of the most stupid opposition, and the sneering skepticism of English science and common sense, he surveyed the Liverpool and Manchester Railway — built the locomotive to run upon it—organized one of the most powerful institutions of civilization, and so conquered the respect of England and the honor of the world.

The history of the railway enterprise in Great Britain, as it is here related, is one of the most strange upon record. It is the most humiliating chapter for "science" and "common sense." The so-called practical men and professional sought to hide their heads for a year after reading this book, and never again phase themselves upon their superiority. The English Parliament, the most eminent lawyers, including Alderson and Baron Parke—namely, every man, with that unerring instinct Dr. Lardner, at the head—pished and poohed at the idea of traveling twelve miles an hour. Dr. Lardner, in particular, was conspicuously wrongheaded and absurd; and we notice in the more particularly because a recent effort of his seeks to show that he did not complete his proof that steamers could not cross the Atlantic at the very moment they did so! However that may be—not the Doctor certainly seems to have been maligned by some false report—there is no question that he insisted that if you could persuade the wheels of locomotives to turn as rapidly as Stephenson claimed they would merely revolve upon their axes and the car stand still! He also proved, by incontestible figures, that the air in tunnels would be so poisoned by coal combustion that people must be suffocated; and, in fact, made so many laughable mistakes as it was possible to make under the circumstances. Dr. Lardner's demonstrations were like the pompous assertion of a man who feared was sitting in the stocks. "What are you sitting there for?" "Why," replied the victim, "I've been robbing hen-roosts." "Pooh, pooh! they can't put you in the stocks for robbing hen-roosts." "Can't they, indeed?" said the unhappy wight. "Just how I am?" So Dr. Lardner proved that steam could be used, but couldn't do this—and steam was busily doing it all the time. Afterward the good Doctor flew over to the other extreme, and proved, with equal ease, that people could not be long exhausted receivers hundred miles an hour.

Perhaps they may. For the moment it is the most delightful and instructive biography is, that there is no limit to mechanical progress. The most improbable faith is the deepest wisdom.

But how shall we turn from coal-smoke and locomotives to Arabian fire?—and—Alderson—Baron Lardner (Dr. Ignatius Lovels, Yellowplush called him) to Hosmus al Rochid—from stokers and pokers to viziers, emirs, interpreters, and the Princess Alibama? Certainly there was never a more dainty dip of a pen than that which wrote new poem, "The Course of True Love never did Run Smooth." But the course of the verse does so. It slips along like "Incent Lake" when it's still cinnamon." The little poem recites the loves and fate of the Vizier Hassan and the Princess Alibassa. But what the story is we shall not say, for you can read it for yourself in half an hour. To see Mr. Aldrich at work, it is really fun—that easy rotes, moonlight, guns, and fountains, there is also the black-cloud horror. Occasionally a line is the smooth ropes of a tiger. It is death in abyssance.

The poem pleases us more than Mr. Aldrich's "Bable Ball," which is very popular; and we are glad to see a volume of his collected poems announced. When they appear we shall return to him.

One more new book is Mr. Viele's "Following the Drum." It has all the typographical neatness which marks the publications of Rudd & Carleton—but what more can a candid Lounger say? The author is evidently the wife of a military officer, and accompanied him to Fort Snelling.—A before remarked, the typography is very neat!

CAGLIOSTRO, JUN.

AT there be truth in the theory that disembodied spirits communicate with those that are left through tipping tables and cracking toe-joints, or through individuals still living, there can be little doubt that the late lamented Count Alexandre Dumas, père, ad Joseph Balsamo, is revisiting the glimpses of the moon in the personality of Mr. Hume. This gentleman was born a little more than a century since, and has for a career—especially at the Court of Versailles, in connection with the famous "affair of the necklace"—as one of the remarkable episodes of French history at the close of the last century. Mr. Home likewise has been the most conspicuously mysterious of personages in Paris during the last two years, and has lately married a young Russian lady of good family and good fortune; and, according to the Times' correspondence from Paris, has been luxuriously feasted by the élite of "the aristocracy" of Paris. And, as we write, his eminence the Count Cagliostro, who had no warmer friend than the Cardinal de Rohan. Whether as Hume or Cagliostro, Signor Count Dumas perverts himself with superb mystery. Like master, like man; it is not surprising to Paris that the ward of the idle which believed in Cagliostro should believe in Mr. Home.

THE GERMANS A-MAYING.

WE owe two great debts to our German fellow-citizens—music and lager-beer. The professional musicians of that nation, who live and teach and play among us, have probably exercised more or less whole number in the country; and wherever there is a German, he is not only a drinker of lager, but the cause of lager's being drunk—notwithstanding Dr. Dowman declares it has less intoxicating element than cider.

And there is still one more obligation under which they have placed us, and that is, the annual proof that human pleasures are much alike, and that in the boldness without undue risk and drunkenness. "Any body or any person who has visited the American how to enjoy himself, would discern the most lasting memorials of national gratitude.

The present national idea of enjoyment is, driving five miles in fifteen minutes, and getting drunk at the end of it. The Fourth of July is consequently the dismalest day in our calendar. It is neither simple, picturesque, nor pleasant, as you see it in the streets and country. The Yankee thinks it is spoony to dance, and play games, and sing, but manly to fight and get drunk. The German scorns neither music nor dancing nor singing, drinks his lager and adores his Liederlein. The result is, that while Wednesday is a much more agreeable affair than our Fourth of July.

But we shall learn, as we have learned. Rum and lager-beer will not long be put together—and it may be a sob prophecy that, when we are a hundred millions, instead of a rum and brandy drinking, our festivals will be much more festive and picturesque.

THE REGATTA.

THE prettiest aquatic festival of the year is the Yacht Regatta in June. The course from the Yacht-house in Hoboken down through the Narrows, and back again to the Yacht-house, is the strait between Staten Island and Fort Hamilton, and the view stretches down the bay and Sandy Hook, white sails, toward the southwest spit, the usually solitary expanse of the lower bay sparkles with eager life.

Such a sport is in advance of the old German games, if not of the Americans. It is better than the Roman hunt of gladiatorial combats. It is more manly than Spanish bull-fight or English bruising. Running afoot serves all the purposes of manly sports, without fostering the brutality which has been inherited from barbarous times. And the fact that it does this for the yachters and their friends, it does what none of the others did; it provides a delightful spectacle for every one who chooses to look. In other days, Festivals were of another kind. Then the ruler and the court were umpires between our pleasures and those of another age, the Lounger quotes an admirable description of a Roman sporting spectacle. He has culled from Suetonius and Tacitus by a recent Quarterly Review:

"In the reign of the Emperor Claudius, on a brilliant summer morning, the glassy lake of Fucinus exhibited a scene of unusual festivity. The surrounding heights were crowded with countless spectators of every age and rank, assembled as in some vast natural amphitheatre. On a promontory overhanging the lake, the Emperor, in military array, and the Empress in purple robes of state, with their children, were seated in state. One of the terrible naval combats for which the Romans were famous was about to commence. A tunnel of great length had been bored through the mountain which separates the lake from the valley of the Liris, to convey its waters. Its waters to a lower and more convenient level (a purpose which it answers to the present moment), and the sluices were now to be opened for the first time. It was a sight well worth seeing: but it was not for this that the vast crowd had met, and so many of his slaves were assembled.

"The galleys were of immense and quadrireremes, supplied with all the munitions of war and manned by thousands, divided proudly on the surface of the lake. The gallery round the bulwarks, shelves, platforms, and sailed-stern, the number of 21,000, thronged to mutual slaughter for the entertainment of the people. At a signal given from the tower of the Emperor, the armaments began to move, and the multitudes in the banks were hushed in breathless expectation. Presently as the noble vessels passed in review before the imperial pavilion, and as they majestically swept by, the crews saluted the monarch in the audience, 'Ave Imperator, moriturí te salutant!' (Hail! Emperor, the doomed to die salute thee.) Perhaps the chilling recollection of this moment may have unnerving the nerves of the sufferer men, and the gayest bulliness of the scene was soon supplanted them to a sudden revulsion of feeling; but the commonplace return of their salutation by the Emperor, 'Avete vos' (you may have), gave hope and desire of life. They could not—they would not believe that even he, the very author of their misery, could mean the confirmation of a sentence of death. 'They were pardoned,' they said; 'they expected to live.'

"Claudius was transported with rage. In his words, 'what was the use of the execution of a carriage ('fœda vacillatione') he seems to have reconsidered Janet I. of England). He rushed down to the beach, where the vessels were now being towed, called with stakes to prevent the escape of the condemned crews, and by another signal hastened the termination and promises of pardon to the victors he induced them to begin the battle; but though the combat was short, the carnage was not the less without interest. The dry from which so much had been anticipated was a failure. When the waters were let off, the sluices were opened without due precaution, and many accidents occurred, nor was the expected combat enjoyed. The battle could not been correctly taken, and the work was still incomplete. The scum enjoyed the spectacle with humor, and the day ended in a scolding-match between the favorite Narcissus and the Empress Agrippina: each was proud to support their side, and neither as yet powerful enough to subvert the other."

OTHER SPORT.

THE meanest and most brutal thing true men can do together is to pommel each other to pelties. It is the sport which has become the national sport in England; which has its peculiar nomenclature and technology; and which furnishes curious material for a species of newspaper called, by some ghastly conceit, "sporting" papers. Last year about this time, there was an elaborate account of a fighting-match between two English bullies, which was written with such gusto that it was copied into several of our daily journals, as an illustration of a particular tendency of national character. "The combat" which two men in full health and vigor, either, or an elephant and a rhinoceros, are the most eminent "professors"—was illustrated by a party of people, within a few days, upon Long Island. Now that in a community like that of the city of New York there should be brokers, as there are drunkards, gamblers, thieves, forgers, and murderers, is not surprising. But that a procession of them from a barroom to the neighboring fields, skillfully dodging the police upon the way, should be considered a matter so noteworthy that respectable papers should give a leading place to a prolonged and detailed account, is an unpleasant fact.

Upon the ground of "news," whether of little detail may not be permissible? If it be the duty of the daily press (for whose publication and position in civilized society, are the public press) to inform the people of every thing that happens, why is not the public intoxication of a legislator a matter of quite as much interest to the general mind as the fight of a couple of fat-necess bullies? What disgusting incident of any kind is it not, by this rule, the duty of the journals to publish? Last year the papers were crammed with all the prurient details of a criminal trial in Boston, in which the accused person was a clergyman. Turn any many books and stealthily in the corridors of hotels? Is it not dangerous to publish every detail of the newspapers which contained the story of that case.

Because liberty is good, is there no such thing as license? Because a State censorship of the press is one of the greatest evils, and most dignified men who edit newspapers to exercise no discretion? Would they describe hundreds of things which they now do not describe, simply because they are done, and might make the paper sold? Because it is good that courts should be open to the public, and it never wrong to print every detail of every case, is the Boston court was open to the public. Would that the editor like to have seen his wife or children pressing in to the trial? If he would not, why should he force the sight of such disgusting horrors upon the eyes of other people's wives and children?

If the incessant claim of the press (which we are far from denying) be well founded, that it is the great popular power and influence, is not its responsibility commensurate? That the newspaper should absolutely reflect the times, or contain a notice of every thing that happens, is impossible. That it should be open to every fact of fact and fact, of is a principle upon which no paper practically proceeds; because, however it may be desired to be cited, the sale that would be promoted, by the publication of every report would be ruinous and we see in a single night of city life, would in a hundred-fold greater than any interest in news from Nicaragua or the Irish Tune-loop or Constantinople, and yet as newspaper ventures to do it. If, then, there be no clear and definite rule as to the time that decent men who are responsible for newspapers, excluded peculiar accounts of prize-fights and all the incidents of such affairs?

"GO, AND SIN NO MORE!"

THERE is presently to be a Shakespearian reading for the Magdalen Female Benevolent Society. The Lounger does not see nothing of the benefit, but is concerned with one of the noblest of social questions. Science and religion have shrunk from consideration of it. Yet that is only because the sun has not come who will boldly and firmly deal with it.

Oh, the unfortunates that walk gayly clad in the gaslight! Are they the hopeless unknowing of the under painted smiles, like dead men's bones in polished parquet? Are they the every-day sin of the children in a cellar or a garret is a night so sad as the woman in silk and spangles who walks alone by night? Has she no willing to that corner, but when she reaches it, desolation without and despair within shall make the cup yet more bitter?

At least we can pity them, if we can not help them. We can expose our hearts, if not our hands. We can remember that they are human beings, however fallen—that all the promises and hopes are theirs as well as ours—that in every way we can give our sympathy to the efforts making to provide some retreat, some asylum, something, where they can lie down, and shut it in—in decency.

RACHEL.

THE world certainly contrives to get the most out of its celebrities. While Rachel lived, every incident of her life was annually reproduced, and in every style of art the great actress was represented. Now that she is dead, her relics are to be seen sold—her jewelry, her books, her dresses, her furniture, and—by itself—her tied and canopy. Indeed the engravings have flown upon every wind. The heart of Parisian gossip has been satisfied. Her devotion to her family quieted. And it is the career of this hapless woman, whose life seems all the more a tragedy from the brief splendor of its triumph, would indeed be sacred or profane history if to prove finally to the world how truly is a thousand scenes that are not always seen in the glare of the struggle—a photograph of Rachel in the last agony of life was taken, and, with some changes, is sent to the publishers, to be used by her children. A Paris correspondent of a city paper says: "What new objects can this genius which has left no poor behind, mourning in the incessant intelligence of a highest sphere.

"Imperious Cæsar, dead, and turned to clay, Might stop a hole to keep the wind away."

Oh, that the world which has left the great actress should relish a wail to expel the winter's flaw!

A POEM BY THE LATE H. W. HERBERT.

AN correspondent of the Literary World, for April 10, 1847, contained a copy of verses by the unhappy man who recently killed himself and asked to have Infidelissimus carved upon his headstone. They have been recalled by one who knew him well, and are a memorial of a mind and heart whose selfishness and warmth were not enough to save him from a tragical fate.

MY HOME.

"A home! a home! yes! your thought still and small,
I have a home where soft the sinless fall.
From the dim pinions of the dove, that sings
Its notes of the soul, with every wave sings;
Her hearth is there, and her bell, not festive pleas,
Her welcome smile of that beaming face,
But the low whisper, and the kiss of love,
That made pain pleasant—yet it is my own—
Mine, and I love it, and I love my God my friend,
Oh, for my narrow home and lowly bed!

"Earth has no home that can with mine compare,
For there, my own best one, for thee are there.
It matters not that they are sealed in death,
These tombs of light, and still the balmy breath,
That was the radiant light of those brave—
It matters not—for it always there!
Thou hast been there, love, for I feel it so,
On that true heart of mine, when all is past,
Will love once again and lonely bed!

"Oh, for my narrow home and lowly bed!

"Oh, weary-waste and weary is the day,
And weary is the night—and weary
But anguish wakens with the rising morn,
And sleep is sorrow with the night to me,
And years went past, long years, ere I shall rest
Upon the quiet spot which God to me has given.
The only home which now my soul doth crave,
Try love—and love—and love—and love—
Oh, that for me the brief shores were spread
Now, in my narrow home and lonely bed!

—Tomahawk, April 10, 1847.

THE LOUNGER'S LITTER-BOX.

—ENNUI is naturally displeased with Trelawny's treatment of the dead Byron. Perhaps, also, Lady Annie feels angry by the poem of Tennyson. If he is from the Lounger to insinuate that his correspondent is not a lady because she does not like it should, he may remember that the London Philharmonic Society would not play that symphony of Beethoven's if it were a lady.

—MR. LOUNGER.—Rowsome Sir: We are hearing something nowadays about Byron, Shelley, and Tolstoy—Shelley, Byron, and Tolstoy. Now, as you are considered to be a friend of the family, and as you have the great distinction of letting the world know that Byron's legs were crooked, I think you ought to let the feet were club feet. Wonderful disclosure! How important he sanitized!

I must say that I prefer to hear of Byron's servant, than whom we have no better authority on that subject. I should like to know if he was a man of such honor that he did not reveal the misfortune of his master even after his death.

Yours respect bim!

—As a quite irrelevant subject, let me submit the following verses, which I found in a country paper. They will be a refreshing hour of night by a friend of mine, and there is a certain sweetness in the lines that has always given me a certain expression of countenance when I thought of them. Here they are:

"'Twas midnight, and the setting sun was rising in the west;
The world river slowly ran; the peacock's in her nest;
The pretty goose and playful cow
Gayly leap from heath to heath."

"ENNUI."

—MR. LOUNGER.—Did you ever read the following:

"Who the dickens Bee could be,
Puzzled many a learned elf;
Till three centuries ago
And Bee appeared as Dickens' self?"

—A dull reader of the Rio Hudo Community asks himself laboring under a similar perplexity as to whether the Lounger, when he has written himself into the sixties, or not; and, while waiting for a solution, he wishes to present the following to the world as the result of a conference of the Weekly, contained in a letter written by a young gentleman of the Rio Hudo Community called "Philadelphia Central High School:"

"Mr. Harper's Weekly, as usual, contains articles rich in amusement, valuable in instruction, excellent in wood-cut illustrations, and in the literary part suited to the sixties, or of any great and mighty intellects. Its pages are fragmentous it stands unrivaled as a paper paper. Its publishers confine it to Rudolph, and vary its previous offers for editors must be generous, and are not all good editors supposing that we can buy an editor, and that editors has in which their efforts to please and offer are held by the art makers! Why hold their distinguished editors in the reading world?

KNOWNOTHING."

—MRS. MARY WIGGIN is determined to have a new sensation. She has written a novel for it in the fashion. Let Mr. Wiggin consider this:

"Yes, I went here a crazed. And who ever knew a woman who had written a novel who was sane? Pish up stimulate Alys high, and they cry strengthen her nerves. Mrs. Wiggin has her family of children to consider, I am quite sure if nautical science had pronounced the Mississippi navigable, she would have written 'Impossible!' some woman would have proved to the contrary, and she would say it such her childe to do so? Then teaches her aims to bring fore as a butterfly, frail as a fairy, or nervous and of 'no account,' and can she not succeed? Think, then! Will I not have a 'Calcutta'? To-be-sure! And though I believe in Longfellow's doctrine, 'suffer and to strong' as a good tonic for nonentiods, how to bring it about without making my beloved' too mighty upon a restless pillow?"

That is the question; and Mrs. Wiggin would like to know if any lady has discovered any other way of conquering a crape than by tearing the sunbeam Wiggin.

SMILING MORN.

THE TEMPTATION.

THE BIG TREES OF CALIFORNIA.

AMONG the many remarkable natural curiosities of the land of gold, not the least is that solitary group of gigantic pines known as the "Big Trees of Calaveras County." Many of our readers will remember the sections of bark taken from one of the group, which were exhibited some years ago in our principal cities, and which excited the wonder of all beholders, and the doubts of many, who could not persuade themselves that so monstrous a mass could ever have grown upon a single tree.

The group in Calaveras County are solitary specimens of their race. There are no others of their kind or size on the known globe. It is a singular fact that the group, consisting of ninety-two trees, is contained in a valley only one hundred and sixty acres in extent. Beyond the limits of this little amphitheatre the pines and cedars of the country shrink into the Lilliputian dimensions of the common New England pine—say a hundred and fifty feet, or thereabout. They are situated in Calaveras County, about two hundred and forty miles from San Francisco, but may be reached with a couple of days of railroad and stage-coach traveling.

A few hunters, in 1850, were pushing their way into the then unexplored forest, when one of them, who was in advance, broke into this space, and the giants were then first seen by white men. Their colossal proportions, and the impressive silence of the surrounding woods, created a feeling of awe among the hunters; and after walking around the great trunks, and gazing reverentially up at their grand proportions, they returned to the nearest settlements and gave an account of what they had seen. Their statements, however, were considered fabulous until confirmed by actual measurement. The trees have been appropriately named the Washingtonia Gigantea, though some of the ingiant savans of San Francisco have endeavored to have the Washingtonia changed to Wellingtonia, because some English botanist, availing himself of the discovery by American frontiersmen, hastened to appropriate the name for his countryman. The basin or valley in which they stand is very damp, and retains here and there pools of water. Some of the largest trees extend their roots directly into the stagnant water, or into the brooks. Arriving at "Murphy's Diggings" by one of the daily lines of stages, either from Sacramento or Stockton, or by the Sonora coach, you are within fifteen miles of the celebrated grove; and from here it is a pretty horseback ride to the "Mammoth Tree Hotel." This has been erected within a year or two, to accommodate the many visitors; for the "big trees" have now become objects of general interest.

Adjoining the hotel, with which it is connected by a floor, stands the stump of the "Big Tree," which was cut down three years since. It measures ninety-six feet in circumference. Its surface is smooth, and offers ample space for thirty-two persons to dance, showing seventy-five feet of circumference of solid timber. Theatrical performances were given upon it by the Chapman family and Robinson family in May, 1853. This monster was cut down by boring with long and powerful augers, and working the augers between—an achievement of Vandalism as ingenious as the Chinese refinement in cruelty of pulling out the nails of criminals with pincers. It required the labor of five men twenty-five days to effect its fall, the tree standing so near perpendicular that the aid of wedges and a battering-ram was necessary to complete the destruction. But even then the immense mass resisted all efforts to overthrow it, until in the dead of a tempestuous night it began to groan and sway in the storm like an expiring giant, and it succumbed at last to the elements, which alone could complete from above what the human axes had commenced below. Its fall was like the shock of an earthquake, and was heard fifteen miles away—at "Murphy's Diggings." There fell in this great trunk some thousands of cords of wood, and it buried itself twelve feet deep in the mire that bordered the little creek near by. Not far from where it struck stand two colossal members of this family, called the "Guardians;" the mud splashed nearly a hundred feet high upon their trunks. As it lay on the ground, it measured three hundred and two feet clear of the stump and broken top-work. Large trees had been snapped asunder like pipe-stems, and the woods around were splintered and crushed to the earth. On its leveled surface are now situated the bar-room and two bowling-alleys of the hotel, the latter running parallel a distance of eighty-one feet.

One of the most interesting of the group is that called the "Mother of the Forest," of which the engraving we here present is an accurate representation, drawn from nature. It is now the loftiest of the grove, rising to the height of three hundred and twenty-seven feet, straight and beautifully proportioned, and at this moment the largest living tree in the world. It is ninety feet in circumference. Into this trunk could be cut an apartment as large as a common-sized parlor, and as high as the architect chose to make it, without endangering the tree or injuring its outward appearance.

The engraving represents the scaffolding built around the tree for the purpose of stripping off its bark, for exhibition abroad. This was accomplished in the year 1854, for a distance of something over one hundred feet from the ground, and was effected with as much neatness and industry as a troop of jackals would display in cleaning the bones of a dead lion. Such was its vitality, that, although completely girdled and deprived of its means of sustenance, it annually put forth green leaves until the past year, when its blanched and withered limbs showed that nature was exhausted.

But the dimensions of the whole group pale before those of the prostrate giant known as the FATHER OF THE FOREST. This monster has long since bowed his head in the dust; but how stupendous in his ruin! The tree measures one hundred and twelve feet in circumference at the base, and forty-two feet in circumference at a distance of three hundred feet from the roots, at which point it was broken short off in its fall. The upper portion, beyond this break, is greatly decayed; but, judging from the average taper of the others, this tree must have towered to the prodigious height of at least four hundred and fifty feet! A chamber or burned cavity extends through the trunk two hundred feet, broad and high enough for a person to ride on horseback through; and a pond deep enough to float a common river steamboat stands in this great excavation during the rainy reason. Walking on the trunk, and looking from its uprooted base, the mind can scarce conceive its astonishing dimensions. Language fails to give an adequate idea of it. It was, when standing, a pillar of timber that overtopped all other trees on the globe. "To read simply of a tree four hundred and fifty feet high," observes the Country Gentleman, "we are struck with large figures; but we can hardly appreciate the height without some comparison. Such an one as this would stretch across a field of twenty-seven rods wide. If standing in the Niagara chasm at Suspension Bridge, it would tower two hundred feet above the top of the bridge; if placed in Broadway, New York, at the head of Wall Street, it would overtop Trinity steeple one hundred and sixty feet; and would be two hundred and thirty feet higher than Bunker Hill Monument, Charlestown; or two hundred and seventy feet above Washington Monument, Baltimore. If cut up for fuel, it would make at least three thousand cords, or as much as would be yielded by sixty acres of good wood-land. If sawed into two-inch boards, it would yield about three million feet, and furnish enough three-inch plank for thirty miles of plank road. This will do for the product of one little seed, less in size than a grain of wheat."

THE "BIG TREE" IN CALAVERAS COUNTY, CALIFORNIA.

These trees are not the California red-wood, as has been affirmed of them. They are a species of cedar peculiar to the western slopes of the Sierra Nevada. The growth, bark, and leaf are different from those of any other tree. Botanists class them, and probably correctly, among the Taxodiums. Foreigners will doubtless continue to rechristen them after this or that European celebrity. All who write or speak of them should avoid being thus led, and perpetuate the glorious name given them shortly after their discovery—the WASHINGTONIA GIGANTEA.

LITERARY.

RUDD & CARLETON publish a very pleasant volume by Mrs. Viele, entitled FOLLOWING THE DRUM. It consists of gossipy sketches of the incidents in the life of an American officer's wife, who lived in the camp. The country through which her journal extends is bounded by Montreal on the north and Mexico on the south; but the familiarity of all the scenery, and the commonplace nature of many of the experiences, are relieved by the freshness and naïveté with which the writer gives them. We imagine that the book will be especially attractive to ladies.

Hugh Miller was a great and a good man. Dr. Brown's biography, published also by Rudd & Carleton, is a very able and interesting work. Condensed as a biography should be, containing very few digressions, giving us the man as he was, and leaving him in our minds as he would himself have chosen to be left, to be judged by what he himself has done in the age in which he lived and among the men by whom he was surrounded. The book is not a simple biography, but is, as it is called, THE LIFE AND TIMES OF HUGH MILLER. He was one of the men of the day, and especially one of the men of Scotland in this century. His history is to a great extent a history of progress in science and religion in Scotland.

Sermon readers and others will place high value on a volume of SELECT DISCOURSES FROM THE FRENCH AND GERMAN, published by Sheldon, Blakeman, & Co. These are selections from the pulpit efforts of such men as Adolphe Monod, Krummacher, Tholuck, and Müller, whose names are well known in the religious world, and whose writings are always eloquent.

Dick & Fitzgerald publish THE YELLOW FRIGATE, a novel by Captain Grant, in cheap form.

From Randolph we have a new collection of CHURCH MELODIES FOR THE USE OF CONGREGATIONS, by Thomas Hastings, whose name is sufficient guaranty for a judicious and tasteful selection. Among numerous books of this class, we know of none more worthy. It will answer as well, too, for family use.

A. L. O. E. is a row of initials which has become familiar to children by reason of the number of capital books by A. L. O. E. which Carter & Brothers have published. We have now THE STORY OF A NEEDLE, and of the little children through whose fingers the needle passed, pleasantly and instructively told. Another good book of the same class, from the same house, is TRUTH IS ALWAYS BEST.

Dr. Livingstone has arrived out at Sierra Leone on the way to his old home in Africa. The accounts from his expedition are very satisfactory thus far.

Rev. Paul C. Sinding, late of Copenhagen, is about to publish a work on the Scandinavian countries and the northern mythology.

Rev. Dr. Russell, President of St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, has written an interesting life of Cardinal Mezzafanti, the greatest of modern linguists. The Life is prefaced by a most erudite Essay on Linguists, ancient and modern, which adds much to the interest of the volume, and contains also a portrait of the cardinal, and a fac-simile of sentences in his handwriting, in no less than sixteen languages. The Cardinal spoke fluently over forty tongues.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

POLITICAL.

CONGRESS.

ON Monday, May 24, in the Senate, Senator Clay introduced a bill for the improvement of the Dismal Swamp Canal. Senator Douglas introduced a bill for an inter-oceanic telegraph. The same senator likewise introduced the following bill:

"Bill to restrain and redress outrages upon the flag and citizens of the United States.

"Be it enacted, etc.,—That in case of flagrant violation of the Law of Nations, by outrages upon the flag, soil, or citizens of the United States, or upon their property, under circumstances requiring prompt redress, and when, in the opinion of the President, delay would be incompatible with the honor and dignity of the Republic, the President is hereby authorized to employ such force as he may deem necessary to prevent the perpetration of such outrages, and to obtain just redress and satisfaction for the same when perpetrated; and it shall be his duty to lay the facts of each case, together with the reasons for his actions in the premises, before Congress, at the earliest practicable moment, for such further action thereon as Congress may direct."

The Judiciary Committee reported that Senators Fitch and Bright, of Indiana, were entitled to their seats. The Fifteen Million Loan Bill was then taken up and debated, without action being taken, by Senators Hunter, Wilson, Collamer, Stuart, Bigler, Cameron, Simmons, and Pugh.——In the House, the Bill to regulate municipal elections in the District of Columbia was taken up, and led to a desultory debate on Native Americanism, in which Messrs. Davis, Burnett, Marshall, and Kelly took part. The House then went into Committee on general debate, and speeches on Slavery and other topics were made by Messrs. Keitt, Cragin, Bliss, and Gilmer.

On Tuesday, 25th, in the Senate, after discussion of the Chicago Harbor Improvement Bill, the Fifteen Million Loan Bill was taken up, and Senators Hunter, Simmons, Toombs, Seward, Crittenden, and others, spoke thereon, generally in deprecation of British outrages.——In the House, bills were passed regulating municipal elections in the District of Columbia, and establishing a paid fire department therein. The Ohio contested election case being taken up, Mr. Vallandigham was declared entitled to the seat by four majority. The House, on motion of Glancy Jones, acted on the Senate amendments to the Executive, Legislative, and Judicial Appropriation Bill. The Fortification Bill then came up, and was discussed by Messrs. Glancy Jones, Quitman, Whiteley, Dowdell, and Letcher; no vote was taken.

On Wednesday, 26th, in the Senate, the Chicago Harbor Improvement Bill was passed by 26 to 17. Also a bill for the improvement of the mouth of the Milwaukie River. The Fifteen Million Loan Bill was taken up and passed, after debate, by 28 to 14.——In the House, the enacting clause of the Fortification Bill was struck out. A motion to postpone consideration of the Fort Snelling case till November next was rejected by 167 to 26. The House went into Committee on the Naval Appropriation Bill, which, after debate by Messrs. Glancy Jones, Bocock, Grow, Covode, Winslow, Phillips, Taylor, Washburn, and Florence, was laid aside to be reported to the House. The House then took up the Appropriation Bill for Volunteer Regiments, and speeches were made thereon. Further debate on the Customs and Post-Office Appropriation bills followed, but no vote was taken.

On Thursday, 27th, in the Senate, the Homestead Bill was taken up and postponed till January next by 30 to 21. Several Harbor Improvement bills were taken up and discussed, but no vote was taken.——In the House, the Naval Appropriation Bill was passed by 110 to 75. The Investigating Committee on the Tariff Corruption case presented a majority and two minority reports, which were received. The Army Appropriation Bill was taken up, and speeches were made thereon by Messrs. Sherman, Letcher, Leiter, Seward, and Grow; also the Post-Office Appropriation Bill, which elicited speeches from Messrs. Davis, Jones, and Sandridge; after which both bills were reported to the House for action.

On Friday, 28th, in the Senate, Senator Seward's resolution to prolong the session till 21st June was laid over. Senator Mason presented a report from the Committee on Foreign Relations on the British aggressions, closing with the following resolutions:

Resolved, That American ships at sea, under the American flag, remain under the jurisdiction of the country to which they belong, and therefore that any visitation or molestation is an infraction of the sovereignty of the United States.

Resolved, That these aggressions demand such an unequivocal explanation from Great Britain as shall prevent their recurrence forever in future.

Resolved, That the Committee approves of the action of the Executive, and are prepared to recommend such future legislation as circumstances may require.

The Miscellaneous Appropriation Bill was taken up which led to a discussion on various topics by Senators Iverson, Bigby, Houston, Hale, Green, Davis, and Seward.——In the House, the Post-Office, Army, and Ocean Mail steamer Appropriation, 72 House, and 17 Senate Bills were passed.

On Saturday, 29th, after the receipt of some petitions the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations on the British aggressions was debated by Senators Mason, Mallory, Hale, Toombs, Seward, Douglas, Hayne, and Wilson, the tenor of the debate being in favor of the resolutions. The Miscellaneous Appropriations were then briefly discussed.——In the House, the bill establishing post roads and several private bills were passed. The British aggressions were discussed by Messrs. Clay and Garnett.

THE LAST BRITISH AGGRESSIONS—CASE OF THE SCHOONER MOBILE.

The master of the American schooner Mobile has published the following statement:

"NEW YORK, May, 15, 1858.

"I first saw the steamer about noon, April 29—a mere speck on the horizon—to the eastward; could not make out what she was. At noon our latitude was 23° 42' longitude 81° 52'. At one o'clock took the glass and looked at the stranger; saw she was a steamer, bark-rigged, and appeared to be running across our bows. I said to the mate, 'I think she is an American man-of-war going to Key West.' Wind at the time east by north, vessel heading north by east to north-northeast; several sail in sight. I then went below and laid down.

"About half past three my eldest daughter (my family were on board) came to my room and said—'Father, what is that vessel doing?' I looked out of my window and saw that she was running down for us. Thinking she was going to speak us, I went on deck to answer her hail. As I came on deck the mate said to me—'That is an English war steamer.' I told him to set our ensign, which he did in the main rigging, the steamer then about two miles off. The steamer kept on until within hailing distance; he then rounded to on my weather quarter. As he came to, I saw the English flag at his mizen peak, which was the first I had seen of it. Soon I heard, twice in succession, something like the crack of a rifle; but I could hardly believe he was firing at me and lying within hail. I soon heard another report, and likewise the whistle of the ball. The mate came to me and said—'They are firing at us, and with ball, too.' I then ordered the vessel hove to—the same as I would heave to for a pilot. After that there were two shots fired into us, one ball striking the vessel about eight feet abaft the forechannels (where the mark can now be seen), the other going over the heads of the men working amidships, striking the water to the leeward. My men being in danger, I ordered the jibs to be hauled down, thinking that might stop his firing.

HOW THE MOBILE WAS BOARDED.

"About four o'clock his boat came alongside, with, as near as I can recollect, six men and an officer, all apparently unarmed, with the exception of the officer, who wore his side-arms. The officer, dressed in the British naval uniform, came aboard; came aft and, without asking for the captain, began to ask questions: Where the vessel was from, where bound, where owned, her name, and number of men and passengers, etc. To which I gave the usual answers. I then asked him what they meant by firing into my vessel and frightening my wife and children? He said, 'Why did you not heave to when you saw a man-of-war to windward with her ensign flying?' I told him it was common to see American and Spanish men-of-war in the Gulf with their colors flying, and they had never stopped or interfered with me, and it would not do for me to heave to and wait the motions of every man-of-war I saw with colors flying. He then asked for my papers. I started to go to the cabin to get them, when he, knowing that my family were there, and without an invitation, immediately followed me.

"I showed him my enrollment and license. After looking at them a moment, he said: 'You should have a register.' I told him our coasters did not have registers, but sailed under a license, and if he was not satisfied, here was my clearance from Mobile, in regular form.

"After looking at them a while he laid them on the table. I asked him if he took me for a slaver. He said, No. I told him that, knowing that I was not a slaver, it was very strange they should want to board my vessel and insult my flag in such a manner; that they had no right to do it. He said they had, and that they had orders to board every vessel going up or down the Gulf, and that it was very lucky for me that I hove to.

"I then told him if he had got through I should like to pursue my voyage. He then left my vessel without so much as saying, 'good-day.'

"In the course of his visit, I asked him how I should have known he was a man-of-war? He said I could have seen their pennant. I told him I had a long one which I very often set. He said if he saw me with one set he would haul it down for me.

"Our latitude when boarded was 24° 4'; longitude, 81° 42'. Three hours afterward I saw Sand Key light, bearing west-northwest by compass, and distant fifteen miles.

"ALLEN HOWES."

THE CASE OF THE N. B. BORDEN.

The following statement has been made officially by the master of the schooner N. B. Borden:

"SAVANNAH, Georgia, April 22, 1858.

"Schooner N. B. Borden, of Fall River, Massachusetts, James M. Brightman, master, sailed from the port of Matanzas, Cuba, on Sunday, March 21, 1858, at ten o'clock A.M., bound for Savannah, with a cargo of molasses and fruit, consigned to Messrs. Padelford, Fay, & Co. When six hours out of the port of Matanzas, being about four o'clock P.M., the island of Cuba being still in sight, and while I was on the starboard tack, saw a sail running down, which proved to be the British sloop-of-war Styx, she being three miles on our larboard quarter. She fired a blank cartridge, and I, not knowing her business, ordered the American ensign to be hoisted, as customary, and kept my course. She then fired a shot, which fell at our stern. I then thought the matter more serious, tacked the schooner, and stood for the sloop-of-war until I was within half a mile of her, when I lay by until I was boarded by the first lieutenant, or I suppose it was that officer from his appearance. As he came alongside I hailed him, and asked what he wanted with a molasses droger. He replied that he would let me know, and came on board. He demanded of me where I was from, and where bound, and what was my cargo, and saying they were in search of slavers and took me to be one. I told him that slavers seldom took molasses to the coast of Africa, and, moreover, they never went loaded so deep—the schooner N. B. Borden being at that time nearly to her decks in water. The lieutenant then said I had a fine vessel, and he would like to take her to Jamaica. I told him he had no occasion to do so, as my vessel was built in Massachusetts and calculated for the West India trade, and never would be ashamed to wear the stripes and stars at her mast-head; and that her commander had always sailed under that flag, and had been master of a vessel for the last eighteen years; had always done a lawful business, and was ready to nail the American ensign to the mast-head, as our forefathers did, against any nation, and that I did not deserve to be insulted so by the British nation. The lieutenant then got into his boat and went on board of his vessel. I filled away and proceeded on my course, as usual. The schooner N. B. Borden was built at Somerset, Massachusetts, in 1855; is 123 tons, and owned by Messrs. N. B. Borden and others, merchants, at Fall River, and her owners and commander deserve the protection of the American flag. Yours, respectfully, JAMES M. BRIGHTMAN, Master of schooner N. B. Borden.

A NEW PLAN OF RETALIATION.

It is rumored that Judge Douglas will move to empower the President, in cases of violation of the laws of nations and outrage by a foreign government on our citizens, to issue special letters of reprisal, to be placed in the hands of an officer of the United States Navy, who will proceed in a vessel of war and seize upon the property of the government so offending, and bring it to the United States, where, by a decree of a court having admiralty jurisdiction, it shall be sold and the proceeds applied to liquidate the claim of the American citizens upon whom the outrage has been committed, the measure of damages to be ascertained by the Court of Claims.

RUMORED SUBMISSION OF THE MORMONS.

Advices received during the week confirm the rumor of Governor Cummings having gone to Salt Lake City. He left Fort Bridger on Monday, 5th April, for Great Salt Lake City, with the expectation of returning on the 15th. He was accompanied only by Colonel Kane, two servants and two teamsters, depending on his escort from the Mormons when he had passed the advanced pickets of the expedition. It was rumored in the camp that the Governor was to have the opportunity afforded him of addressing the Mormons, on the Sunday following, from all parts of the Territory, as they were to be congregated on that occasion to hear him, and decide whether they would continue their course of opposition to the officers of the Government, under the Governorship of Brigham Young, or accept him, without bloodshed, for their Governor, under certain conditions. Nothing definite was known of what those conditions were.

General Johnston purposes carrying out his own plans, and intends to march for Salt Lake City about the beginning of June. By that time he will be reinforced by Colonel Hoffman and Captain Marcy. The Colonel would add to General Johnston's command twenty officers, five hundred and fourteen men, one hundred and sixty-six horses, with one hundred and seventy-six mule teams, one hundred ox teams, with between two and three months' supplies for Colonel Johnston's whole command.

Captain Marcy would arrive there, accompanied by Colonel Loring—who was at last advices following the Captain to provide him an escort—with five officers, one hundred and ninety-four men.

With that portion of the reinforcements, it is certain that General Johnston will march at the time stated into Salt Lake City, as he is determined that not words but acts of submission only can be accepted from the Mormons.

HOW GOVERNOR CUMMING WAS RECEIVED.

A letter from Fort Bridger to a Boston paper says: "A United States Commissioner, Mr. Kane, arrived here about the 25th of March from Salt Lake City, with dispatches. He afterward returned to the city, where he remained a few days, and on the 5th of April returned to this fort, and after a short interview with Governor Cumming the latter agreed to accompany him to the capital on the morrow. Accordingly, on the 6th, Governor Cumming, attended only by Mr. Kane and his carriage driver, took his departure for the Holy City, intending to go through in two days. He did so, and entering the city on the 8th, found a large hall ready and beautifully fitted up for his reception. Brigham Young received him with an appropriate speech, which was responded to by the Governor in a true democratic and feeling manner. I am sorry I can not furnish you a copy, but will do so by next express. We look daily for his return. He was treated with the utmost civility and respect. We look daily for Colonel Johnston to issue orders for entering the city, as the road is now passable."

MOVEMENTS OF THE UTAH EXPEDITION.

"General Harney pays no attention to the reported surrender of Young, but is pushing forward the reinforcements and the supply trains. It is not believed at the head-quarters of the expedition that Kane accomplished any permanent good.

"Large Mormon trains are leaving various points in Nebraska for Salt Lake, carrying great quantities of arms, ammunition, and clothing, and manifesting a very hostile spirit. Many Mormons are also hanging about the fort, and following the trains in various capacities. All sorts of rumors are constantly coming in from the army. There are reports that buffalo were extraordinarily plenty on the plains—more so than for years—and the grass fine."

REPORT OF THE TARIFF INVESTIGATING COMMITTEE.

The Report of this committee has been published. It shows that Mr. John W. Wolcott was sent to Washington authorized to pledge any amount of money, and to use any means, however corrupt, to insure a change in the tariff. Soon after the adjournment of the last Session of Congress he received from Lawrence, Stone, & Co. $74,000.

Of this sum $13,645 79 was in commercial paper indorsed in blank and negotiable by delivery. Mr. Wolcott paid the Hon. George Ashmun $4000 for aiding the passage of the tariff, according to Mr. Ashmun's evidence, though Mr. Wolcott swears that he paid no money for such purpose. Thurlow Weed was paid $5000 through Ezra Lincoln of Boston, and $8117 06 was paid by the New York house to various persons, making the sum of $87,117 06 which appeared on the books of Lawrence, Stone, & Co., charged to the tariff of 1857.

Of the eight thousand and odd dollars disbursed by the New York house, Mr. D. M. Stone of The Journal of Commerce received $2500, J. N. Reynolds, President of the American Councils, who carried the resolution favorable to the woolen interests, $5070, and A. R. Corbin, formerly Clerk of the Committee of Claims, $1000. The balance was expended for traveling expenses, pamphlets, and the like.

It appears from the testimony of Mr. Slade, that Lawrence, Stone, & Co. received $12,000 or $13,000 more, which was also disbursed; but it is not ascertained how, as this witness was examined in Philadelphia, and the books and papers were in Boston.

The Committee express the strongest censure on Messrs. Wolcott and Corbin, and impeach their testimony seriously. It is believed that Mr. Wolcott appropriated about $70,000, which was put in to the banking business of Gardner, Wolcott, & Co. Mr. Corbin resigned his clerkship of the Claims Committee to avoid expulsion.

THE OCEAN MAIL SERVICE.

The House Committee on Post-offices have decided to report a bill for the ocean mail service. It will embrace the following schedule:

1. Collins line to be authorized to run to Southampton instead of Liverpool.

2. The Havre line to be contracted with for ten years, at two dollars per mile.

3. A line to Gluckstadt, via Plymouth and Rotterdam, for ten years, at two dollars per mile.

4. A line from New Orleans via Havana, Bermuda, Fayal, and Santander (Spain), for ten years, at two dollars per mile.

The expense of these lines is not to exceed seven hundred thousand dollars per annum. This sum is stated to agree with the amount reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, on the 10th of May, for this service for the fiscal year. The estimated receipts of postages by European mails for the year is just this amount. All letters by private ships are to be charged the same as by mail ships, and no letters are to be sent out of the United States but through the Post-office.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Incomplete returns from the election in Kansas indicate a majority of 750 in favor of the Leavenworth constitution. The utmost apathy was manifested in regard to the result, and the Pro-slavery vote was very small.

The board of Commissioners, appointed under the act of Congress of May 4, convened at Lecompton on the 24th. Present, J. W. Denver, Governor; Hugh S. Walsh, Secretary; C. W. Babcock, President of the Council; George W. Deitzler, Speaker of the House, and William Weir, District Attorney. The members of the board were sworn in by Judge Cato, and the Commission organized by electing Governor Denver president, and Mr. Walsh secretary. A committee of three was appointed by the chair to prepare a programme for conducting the election and report at the next meeting of the board, which takes place on the 31st of May. On motion of Mr. Babcock it was unanimously agreed that the election ordered by Congress be fixed for the first Monday in August next. The commission then adjourned.

PERSONAL.

Mr. Lewis Cass, Jun., has resigned his mission at Rome, the resignation to take effect when his successor shall be appointed. It is said that he found the place rather too hot for him after an occurrence which has excited much comment.

The Hon. H. B. Anthony, ex-Governor of the State of Rhode Island, and editor of the Providence Journal, has been elected by the General Assembly United States Senator for six years from the 4th of March next—receiving 92 out of 100 votes cast.

There was a general fraternization of the Republicans, Douglas men, and Americans, at Senator Seward's on Thursday night, at a party given by him. All the leading Opposition Senators and members were present.

A movement has been made in Mississippi to request the resignation of Governor M'Willie. The people of the State are very indignant at the last exercise of Executive clemency, which has turned loose the notorious assassin, James Dyson.

The Times correspondent says: "While in the agony of death the relatives of Mademoiselle Rachel caused to be taken her photograph by the photographer of the King of Sardinia. What their object was in thus disturbing the last moments of the dying tragédienne it is not proper to judge. But the sensitive paper produced her dying agony so faithfully, the clenched hands, the contracted muscles, and the frowning brow are so fearful to look at, that the friends dare not put the work on sale as it appears on the original. But they have softened it by a reproduction on stone, and this picture is now on sale at the print-shops. While living, she was the resource of her Hebrew family; now that she is dead they continue the exploitation of her body and her memory."

The Hon. Thomas Morris Erskine, recently appointed Secretary of the British Legation at Washington, is half American. His grandfather was the great Lord Chancellor Erskine, son of the Earl of Buchan, and his father, the second Lord Erskine, married a daughter of General Cadwallader, of Philadelphia. The present Lord Erskine, brother of the new Secretary, is named Americus, probably to denote his maternal descent. The removal of Mr. Erskine from Turin, where he was Secretary to the Embassy, has been the cause of a good deal of comment in the English journals, and is not particularly creditable to his talents as a diplomatist.

The Evening Post says: "Rear-Admiral Pacha expressed, in a recent conversation, astonishment at the money-making turn of the shipbuilders and Aldermen who surrounded him on his arrival. He says it surpasses any thing he ever saw in Europe or Asia. The recent caricatures in Harper's Weekly, burlesquing his progress in New York, at first excited his indignation, but, on hearing an explanation, he burst into a regular haw-haw of the most Turkish kind. The picture which most moved his risibles was the one which represents the Rear-Admiral, while preparing to draw on his pantaloons, surprised by the apparition of a daguerreotypist, who is taking his picture."

A Paris correspondent of a late London paper says: "Mr. Bonaparte, the eldest son of Marshal Prince Jerome by his marriage with Miss Paterson, has been staying in Paris for some time, almost incog. He dined almost daily at Hill's English tavern, in the Boulevard des Capucines, where he was generally accompanied by two or three American gentlemen. He is a plain, unpretending-looking man, much younger in appearance than he really is, for his mother's marriage, which the Pope always refused to disavow, was arbitrarily declared void by the Emperor so long ago as 1805; he must, therefore, be between fifty and sixty years of age, and yet he is neither bald nor gray. He speaks English with a strong American accent, and is by no means a perfect master of French. His likeness to Prince Jerome is most striking. He stands just as near an heir to Napoleon I. as the present occupier of the throne of France."

The tavern referred to is a small eating-house, where perhaps a dozen persons may dine at once. It is much like many restaurants here, where one may get a plain meal for about twenty-five cents, and is much frequented by those English and Americans in Paris who do not speak French. The son referred to was educated at West Point, and is now on the Emperor's staff. Mr. Bonaparte arrived here in the Fulton last week.

The Baptist papers are quite indignant at the latitudinarianism of Henry Ward Beecher on Baptism—especially at the remark that he would baptize his people every Sunday, if they wished. They state that he would make baptism a common plunge-bath.

Judge Welles has granted a writ of error and stay of proceedings, in the case of Ira Stout, convicted of the murder of C. W. Littles. The trial will probably take place in September.

Archbishop Hughes denies explicitly the charge made by an Albany paper, that he was concerned in a secret society called the "Circle of Jesus."

Lord Napier and family spent several days of last week at Castle Hill, the residence of the Hon. Wm. C. Rives, in Albemarle county, Virginia.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says: "M. de Sartiges, the French Minister at Washington, is about to come to France on leave of absence. The French Consul-General at New York will act as Chargé d'Affaires."

Governor Willard, of Indiana, is lying very low at Indianapolis, with a severe attack of pneumonia, or congestion of the lungs. His recovery is very doubtful.

Mr. Bancroft, the historian, has gone South on a visit of a few weeks.

The wedding of a daughter of Robert J. Walker, ex-Governor of Kansas, took place on Tuesday night at Washington.

The wedding of a daughter of Andrew H. Reeder, ex-Governor of Kansas, took place at Easton, Pennsylvania, on Tuesday.

Among the passengers by the Vanderbilt on her last trip for Southampton and Havre, were Senator Sumner, Lieutenant Henry A. Wise and Mrs. Wise, daughter of Edward Everett.

A PAIR OF OLD LOVERS.

The Detroit Free Press says: "Justice Purdy married a couple yesterday who fully merit the felicity which they will doubtless enjoy in connubial union. The bridegroom was an old bachelor whose years numbered threescore and ten, and looks betoken him innocent of womanhood. His bride was a widow, who asserted that she was fifty-seven, but the by-standers set her down at eighty. It appeared that the widow, in the exercise of those winsome ways which widows do affect, inveigled the bachelor into an attachment, which both parties proposed to consummate in matrimony. An objection arose, however, in the shape of several infants twenty or thirty years old, belonging to the widow, who most decidedly objected to her marrying. In this dilemma they resorted to the usual dodge peculiar to young people, and eloped. As they lived in Canada, the only place to elope to was America, and they accordingly came to Detroit, the bridegroom coming first, and the widow joining him afterward. The delight at the successful termination of their romantic adventure was unbounded.

FOREIGN NEWS.

ENGLAND.

PARLIAMENT.

IN the House of Commons, on the 13th ult., Mr. Baillie, in response to an inquiry, denied the reports that Sir Colin Campbell had lately asked urgently for reinforcements, and that the East India Company had declined for the present to find transports for the troops ready for embarkation.

Mr. Disraeli, in reply to a question, said that Lord Ellenborough laid his resignation before the Queen, without the knowledge of even the Prime Minister, and that had he consulted his colleagues, they would have unanimously requested him to withdraw his resignation.

On the 14th, in the House of Lords, the Earl of Shaftesbury moved his vote of censure upon the Government for their dispatch to the Governor-General of India, touching his proclamation to the people of Oude, and urged its adoption at considerable length. An animated debate ensued; after which, the House divided, the vote being 158 for the resolution and 167 against it; majority in favor of Government 9. The announcement was received with cheers.

In the House of Commons on the same day, Mr. Cardwell brought forward his motion of censure upon the Government for the Indian dispatch, and advocated his views at length. Divers other speeches were made pro and con, and at a late hour the debate was postponed to the Monday following.

In the House of Commons on the same day, Lord Stanley stated that no change had taken place in the position of Britain relative to France or the United States, with regard to the Newfoundland fisheries, nor had the British squadron been increased on that station.

THE ATLANTIC TELEGRAPH.

The experiments which have been made with the new telegraph machines of Professor Hughes upon the Atlantic cable have been quite successful. The instruments transmitted messages through the whole length of cable, and clearly demonstrated that they could be worked with more rapidity and with greater reliability than any other method. Mr. Cyrus W. Field called on the 13th ult., upon Sir John Packington, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and explained to him the situation of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, in regard to a paddle-wheel steamer to act as a tender upon the Niagara in place of the Susquehanna, which the United States Government were prevented from sending on account of the yellow fever having broken out on board of her. The Admiralty at once granted the request to furnish a steamer in place of the Susquehanna. The liberality of the British Government in placing four of their best steamers at the disposal of the Atlantic Telegraph Company, to assist in laying the cable this year, and at a time when they are chartering merchant steamers for their own service, shows the deep interest they feel in the success of this great international enterprise.

THE QUEEN'S STATE BALL.

A London paper has the following description of her Majesty's state ball, given at Buckingham Palace on the 10th of May, and to which about 1900 were invited. "The ball was far more numerously attended than the ball given in honor of the nuptials of the Princess Royal, and much more brilliant. The noble apartments are fully equal to accommodate 2000 guests with ease; but at a state ball all the visitors crowd round where her Majesty sits or dances, and, consequently, the spacious and magnificent new ball-room was not large enough of itself to accommodate the numbers that thronged into it. Her Majesty sat on the haut-pas, with the youthful, pretty, and charming young Queen of Portugal by her side. Seats were also placed for all the members of the Royal Family, the Prince of Hohenzollern, and the Princess Anna of Saxe-Weimar. The seats of the Queens were marked on the haut-pas by a footstool, a distinction which was omitted with the other members of the royal family. The royal bride danced frequently during the evening in quadrilles with the Prince Consort, the Duke of Cambridge, and Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar. In noticing the arrival of the Duc de Malakhoff, we remarked upon his 'agile step,' and it is a great confirmation of the fact that not only did the Queen of Portugal but our own gracious sovereign select the Duke as a partner for a quadrille. The gallant marshal was a little taken aback when the honor intended by our Queen was first intimated to him; but he nevertheless acquitted himself with grace, and after each dance conducted his royal partner to her seat with true French gallantry. The Duke wore the full uniform of a Marshal of France, but paid us the compliment of displaying the Ribbon of a Grand Cross of the Order of the Bath without any other decoration. The places of our Queen and the Queen of Portugal at the supper were opposite to that famous work of art in the precious metals, 'Horses at the Fountain,' and immediately on their Majesties' approach, the fountain commenced playing and throwing off the grateful odors of Eau-de-Cologne. The shield presented by the King of Prussia to the Prince of Wales, the Prince of Wales's epergne, and the South American salver were also displayed on a buffet, placed opposite to the seats of the two Queens. Although the Queen of Portugal had a long day's travel before her on Tuesday, she remained with the Queen in the ball-room till two o'clock, dancing with the Duc de Malakhoff immediately after supper. The dancing continued with unabated vigor until the Queen left the ball, and by ten minutes past three o'clock the last of the guests had departed from the palace."

INAUGURATION OF LORD MACAULAY AT CAMBRIDGE.

The inauguration of Lord Macaulay as High Steward of the borough took place on Tuesday, May 11, in the Town Hall, Cambridge. Among the eminent persons who have held this office are Lord Bacon, Oliver Cromwell, and Lord Clarendon. The Town Hall was crowded on the occasion. At a banquet given by the Mayor, after the formal proceedings, a great number of the members of the University were present. In reply to the toast of his health, Lord Macaulay, who was loudly cheered, said: "It is now five years since I last raised my voice in public, and it is not likely that, except upon some serious and important call of public duty, I shall ever so raise it again; but I trust that if these should be the last words I so express, you will accept them as intended to convey my most grateful sense of your kindness, and my earnest wish that the town of Cambridge may ever flourish in peace and prosperity—and, may I be allowed to add, may ever cherish a feeling of unanimity with the noble and distinguished University, which I must ever regard with the most filial gratitude."

POSTHUMOUS WORK OF BLACKSTONE.

Judge Blackstone—he of the "Commentaries," the most popular law book ever written—left behind him in manuscript a work on architecture. It was written when the Judge was young; but has been described by those who have seen it as worthy of his maturer years. A wish having been expressed by leading jurists to see the work in print, a London house has undertaken to publish it.

EXTRAORDINARY LETTER TO THE QUEEN.

An English architect, whose name is published below, has been arrested for writing and sending the following letter to the Queen:

"HEREFORD, 27*th April*, 1858.

"To Her Most Gracious Majesty Victoria, Queen of Great Britain, Ireland, and their colonies.

"Your Majestie's humble and loyal subject sheweth that through the mercy and grace of Almighty God he has, during a period of 36 years, been an obedient and useful subject of this realm, and moreover, for more than 20 years now past he has been an humble servant of the Most High God, and a partaker of His grace, manifested in His only begotten Son. Your Majesty's security also sheweth that the All-Wise and Gracious God has in an especial manner manifested Himself to him [the writer]; and in such a marked and continuous way as leaves him no alternative but to apply to your Majesty to render up to him your Majesty's office as head of the Church. And in doing so it is from a solemn conviction of duty. Your Majesty will please to remember that this application is registered in Heaven, and will have to be accounted for at the judgment-seat of our Lord. I shall be happy to produce to your Majesty my credentials as Christ's vicegerent on earth, and challenge the creation to produce any other claim except my own to the office. In preferring my claim, your Majesty will please to observe that it is from no sordid motive, but on the contrary, merely for the glory of God, the welfare of your Majesty's people, and the stability of your throne! Wishing your Majesty every happiness, both domestic and public, I am, by the grace of God, in your Majesty's service,

"AUSTIN MAGGS."

A RETORT AT THE ALTAR.

"Recently," says the Essex Herald, "in a rural district of Essex, tending toward the coast, certainly not more than 53½ miles from Latchington—we do not like to speak very positively as to measurements—a worthy thatcher had been employed by the curate of the parish in clothing his roofs and making matters secure and water-tight about the homestead. As thatchers are but men, and are, moreover, in the habit of damping themselves as well as their straw, the purse of the pastor had been repeatedly drawn upon in the course of the work, till at length, drawing the strings thereof tightly together with stern fingers, he tied them in a double knot; and when the man applied for a further advance of the current coin, he responded to the appeal—'No, when you have done your job you shall have your money.' Now the thatcher, either on the stack top or other exposed situation, had been struck by a pair of bright eyes. The lady's circumstances were pressing, and after due preliminaries, the pair presented themselves to the curate at the altar. Steadily the ceremony proceeded up to the production of the hoop of gold, when the minister, strictly following the directions of the rubric, as it seems is the custom thereabout, required him to 'lay it upon the book, with the accustomed duty to the priest and clerk;' in other words, demanded the marriage fees, when the bridegroom, thinking a like principle should apply to thatcher and curate, replied, 'No, when you have done your job you shall have your money.' The irreverent retort, and the refusal to let the curate draw on account, cut short the marriage ceremony. The book was closed; and the willing pair, though their dwelling-places are not far asunder, still remain only half married."

THE QUEEN OF PORTUGAL IN ENGLAND.

On Sunday morning, the 9th, the Queen of Portugal, attended by the Prince of Hohenzollern, and the Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, left Buckingham Palace for the residence of the Portuguese Legation, in Gloucester Place, Portman Square, to attend mass, which was said by Cardinal Wiseman. After mass, her Majesty held a reception, at which the principal Portuguese residents in London were present. On Monday morning her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and the Prince of Wales, accompanied the Queen Stephanie of Portugal, the Prince of Hohenzollern, and the Prince Royal of Hohenzollern, to view the National Gallery, Trafalgar Square. The royal cortége consisted of five carriages. Her Majesty and the Queen of Portugal inspected both the National Gallery and the Exhibition of the Royal Academy of Arts. On Tuesday the Queen of Portugal left Buckingham Palace, and, accompanied by Prince Albert and the Prince of Wales, traveled to Plymouth, where she embarked on board the Bartolomeo Dias, for Lisbon. The Queen of Portugal looks about eighteen years of age, and has remarkably agreeable features. She is rather above the middle height, and has none of the more striking peculiarities of the foreigner about her. Her hair is dark and her complexion very clear, and she has a frank, unaffected manner. In a letter dated Madrid, May 2, we find the following extraordinary and improbable statement: "We have just heard that the young King of Portugal has narrowly escaped being poisoned. The deadly drug was administered to him by a prelate attached to the Court, but the design was discovered and happily frustrated."

FRANCE.

AN ANECDOTE OF JULES FAVRE.

The French "commis voyageur" is a favorite character in farce. Two weeks ago one of the fraternity fell in with an intelligent passenger in the train to Bordeaux, and was so charmed with his anecdotes that he insisted on feasting him at the Chapeau Rouge; and after sundry bottles, became talkative about shawls and merinos, boasting of his commission being worth 4000 francs a year. "I, too, am a traveler," said his guest; "but can I count on your discretion?" On which he dropped a hint that his line was robbery, forged bills, and sometimes assassination, at which he earned 80,000 francs one year with another. Dumbfoundered, the bagman managed to shorten the interview, and made his way to the nearest bureau de police, from which a posse hastened to the capture of the itinerant criminal, whom they found to be Jules Favre, brought down special for a very bad case before the Bordeaux tribunal.

HOW MARRIAGES CAN BE DISSOLVED.

The jurisdiction of French Courts in marriage matters is getting perfectly scandalous. On the 12th of May a Peruvian lady appealed for protection under very aggravated circumstances, and was dismissed without redress. Monsieur Eugene Ruttinger, a Parisian fast man about town, was sent by his father to Lima as a commercial agent; here he gets himself introduced to the opera-box of a young widow of twenty-one, Signora Torribia Guido, of high connections, and, after a considerable courtship, was married by the proper authorities at church, and his union was registered at the French consulate. Some time after he levanted. She follows him to Paris, and he now claims to be exonerated from the solemn contract by showing that he was only twenty-four years old at his marriage (twenty-five is the age required when parents are not consulted), and that old Ruttinger had only heard of it six months after it had taken place. On this silly and palpable sham the Court sets the villain free for fresh matrimonial razzias.

ANNEXATION OF ENGLAND TO THE FRENCH CROWN.

The Court Journal has the following queer story; of course "Girardin" is the name so transparently vailed: "Emile G——n has had several interviews with the Emperor of late; and as a pamphlet, written by him upon the subject of the facility with which a descent might be made in England, and the ease with which that country might be annexed to the French crown, is going the round of the political salons, it has been supposed that these interviews had been sought by G——n to expose his ideas on the same subject. The tenor of the pamphlet, which is kept a strict secret from the public, and is printed for private distribution only, may be judged when, addressed to the Emperor, it opens thus: 'Let your Majesty remember that the event of your Imperial Majesty's reign is yet to come—no Austerlitz, no Leipsic, no Marengo has marked its annals—with an unrivaled army, and a navy which now stands first in Europe, your Majesty might accomplish far more brilliant feats than these. Even the pallid reign of Charles the Tenth has left Algeria as a legacy of glory to the nation—even the short-lived republic has left us the occupation of Rome by our victorious troops. Let, then, the conquest of England be the one immortal feat of arms which shall render your Majesty's reign even more glorious than that of Napoleon the First, whose fate it would so nobly avenge.'"

A MINISTERING ANGEL.

The Court of Assizes of the Cotes du-Nord has just tried a woman of Legue for the manslaughter of her husband. For nearly forty years they lived most unhappily together, owing to her drunken and brutal character, and she was in the constant habit of beating him, keeping a thick stick for the purpose, and even sometimes taking it into bed with her to belabor him in the night. In the evening of the 28th of March last he returned from his work, and sat quietly down to supper; when all at once his wife, who was lying on the bed in a state of intoxication, jumped up and snatched his food from him. This led to a quarrel, and after a while the man was heard to exclaim, "Ah! you have got the stick!" "Yes," said she, "I have," and at the same moment she struck him a tremendous blow on the head, which felled him to the ground. After a while he got up, and managed to get to a neighbor's, but two days after he had to take to his bed and died. The jury declared the woman guilty, and the Court sentenced her to twelve years' hard labor.

APPROACHING MESALLIANCE.

The London Court Journal says: "The approaching marriage of an English lady, of large income and portly person, with her stalwart Italian courier, is much talked of by the English in Paris. The lady has just returned from a tour in Switzerland, where the unceasing attentions of the courier, his vigilance over the lady's safety, his bad English, and his singing to the guitar, completely took the grateful heart of the lady by surprise. The lady's eldest son, an officer in the Guards, is said to have arrived in Paris for the express purpose of preventing the match if possible; but, upon acquaintance with the object of his mother's attachment, became reconciled to the step, with the consolatory remark to his friends, "The fellow seems quite good enough for a step-father, at any rate, and it's well it's no worse."

WHOLESALE EXTRACTION OF TEETH.

The Memorial de la Loire tells a strange story. A dentist, who said that he came from Caen, went to the school of the Brethren of Christian Doctrine, in St. Etienne, and asserting that he was authorized by the municipality to examine the teeth of the children, and to extract those which were not good, made the boys parade before him, and he drew from them not fewer than two hundred teeth, most of which were good ones. When the parents of the children heard what had taken place they were naturally indignant; and the report being spread that it was not two hundred, but six thousand, teeth that had been extracted, a large portion of the lower classes shared in their anger. Before long a crowd assembled and raised a loud clamor against both the brethren and the dentist. The former expressed their regret at having allowed the man to draw the teeth, while the dentist had deemed it prudent to decamp.

SOULOUQUE AND HIS TROOPS.

The Paris correspondent of the London Globe relates the following transaction, which, he says, will occupy the tribunals and amuse the public: "Faustin I., Emperor of Hayti, gave, in March, an order, not to Leeds, but to Elbœuf (Normandy), for three thousand suits of regimentals. The contract was duly attended to, and the manufacturers were up to time, but, unfortunately, the goods were sent by the Havre broker in two distinct shipments for St. Domingo, and three thousand pantaloons arrived three weeks before the supplementary portion of the outfit. Soulouque, who had fixed on a grand review, had his troops drawn up in coatless array, haranguing his brave army with a promise of jackets by the next packet. Had the jackets come first, he would, no doubt, have turned out his men in the costume of sans-culottes; but the broker will have to answer for breach of covenant with this nigger majesty."

SOMNAMBULISM DISPROVED.

M. Burdin, a physician, who recently died in Paris, at the age of eighty-one, was a decided unbeliever in somnambulism, and many years since resolved to prove that his incredulity was well founded by depositing a sum of 3000 francs in the hands of a notary, which was to be paid to any person who should read what was written on a paper placed in an opaque box, the trial taking place in presence of a commission named by the Academy. This competition was open for three years, and a number of persons came forward, but the money eventually returned to M. Burdin's pocket, no somnambulist having been able to solve the difficulty."

INDIA.

MR. LAYARD ON THE INDIAN REBELLION.

Mr. Layard, who has just returned from India, has delivered an important address in London on the rebellion. He argues, first, that the insurrection was not merely a military mutiny, but a real national or popular rebellion; and secondly, that this rebellion did not originate in a religious panic, but was caused by English misrule, especially and notably by their policy of annexation, their dealings with the land titles of great chiefs, their maladministration of justice, and general treatment of the natives. Mr. Layard quoted the following extract from Lord Ellenborough's dispatch: "We desire to see British authority in India rest upon the willing obedience of a contented people; and there can not be contentment where there is general confiscation;" and, commenting upon it, said: "These words should be written in characters of gold, and exhibited in every public place in India; and if they were acted upon, there would probably be no other rebellion. India must, of course, be governed in India; and as to the council in this country, it should, he thought, consist partly of old civil servants, partly of military men, and partly of natives. In Ceylon there was a council founded on liberal and civilized principles, the buddhist and native half-caste race being represented. Let them try the experiment of governing India on the same principles, and then, even if they should lose India, that would be no disgrace to them, provided they left the country civilized, prosperous, and happy, and, if they could effect that by their example, he would add Christian."

CHINA.

PERSONNEL OF YEH.

The special correspondent of the London Times, who seized the opportunity of taking passage in the Inflexible from Hong-Kong to Calcutta for the purpose of studying the notorious Yeh, says of him: "Such a man must be a great problem. If I fail to solve it, I may, at any rate, supply to others the materials for a solution.

"In his personal appearance Yeh is a very stout and rather tall man, about five feet eleven, with the long thin Chinese mustache and beard, a remarkably receding forehead, a skull in which what the phrenologists call 'veneration' is much developed; a certain degree of rotundity behind the ear, and a moderate development of the back head. Shorn nearly to the crown, and very thinly covered with hair in that part where the Chinese mostly cultivate their hair, our Mandarin offers every facility for craniological examination. His tail is very paltry, very short, and very thin. The smallest porker in China has a better tail than her highest Mandarin.

"His face is heavy. There is more chin than you usually see in a Chinaman—more jowl and jaw, indicative of will and obstinacy. The nose is long and flat, the nostrils forming one side of a very obtuse angle. Seen in profile the nose is very remarkable and very ugly; in the front face this, the most simial expression of the man's countenance, is mitigated. The eye—that round slit Mongolian eye—is the most expressive feature of the man who is sitting opposite to me, and looking rather suspiciously at me as I am now writing. In his ordinary mood there is only a look of shrewdness and quick cunning in this, the only mobile feature of his face; but I have seen him in the turning moments of his life, when those eyeballs glared with terror and with fury. He has a large protruding mouth, thick lips, and very black teeth, for, as he remarks, 'it never has been the custom of his family to use a tooth-brush.' It is, however, a very common custom in some Chinese families, as any one may see who walks the streets of Canton and notices the Coolies and small traders at their ablutions.

"He does not wear long nails. He says he has been too busy all his life to do so. His hands, as is almost universally the case in China, are small and well shaped. The same occupations which have prevented him from growing his nails seem to have kept him from washing his hands. I think I can remember, however, that when first taken his nails were of Chinese growth.

YEH'S TOILET HABITS.

"In the practice of that virtue which we Westerns are glad to rank next to godliness Yeh is certainly not conspicuous. A more undesirable messmate for the commander of a man of war can scarcely be imagined. He spits, he smokes, he eructates, and he blows his nose with his fingers. Captain Brooker has taught him the comfort of a pocket handkerchief, but not to use it for this purpose. His daily ablutions consist of a slight rubbing of the face with a towel moistened in hot water. He has a horror of fresh air, and while in Chinese waters never willingly went on deck. He loved to have the ports closed and the skylights down.

"He wears thickly padded stockings, the long, blue-sleeved, quilted cape, and blue pantaloons tied at the ankle, common to all Chinamen. He boasts that he has worn his outer coat for ten years, and its appearance justifies his assertion; it is stiff with grease. When we drew near to Singapore, within one degree of the line, the heat became frightful. His practice then was, while steaming from libations of hot tea, to strip off his coat and sit in his long yellow grass-cloth shirt, wet and discolored—a most disgusting object.

"Once, after six weeks' confinement, he gravely intimated his intention of taking a bath; and he was eagerly reminded of what he had been more than once informed, that there was a most comfortable bath-room on deck, quite at his daily service. That was not at all Yeh's idea of a bath. The cabin was given up to him and his domestics, and a small pan of boiling water. We all hoped that he had cleansed himself, but when we saw him again he was wearing his old greasy, unwashed jacket.

HOW YEH SLEEPS.

"Yeh sleeps in a recess in the captain's cabin, which he prefers to a separate sleeping berth. He goes to bed about eight o'clock, and while we are reading, or writing, or playing chess, he sleeps the sleep of infancy—an unbroken slumber, apparently undisturbed by visions of widowed women or wailing orphans. This man-killer, after slaying his hundred thousand human beings, enjoys sweeter sleep than an innocent London alderman after a turtle dinner. So false are traditions; so false are the remorseful scenes of Greek and Roman and English tragedies.

YEH'S MORALITY IN PRIVATE LIFE.

"Yeh is in his private life a very respectable Chinaman. He is entirely free from all suspicion of those detestable habits common to his countrymen, and for which even the virtuous Keying was but too notorious. He smokes no opium; his ordinary drink is only warm tea; he uses samshu only as a medicine. He has sent his only wife, under the protection of his father, to his native village. He spoke of his concubines; but as I could not tell how far it might be wrong in his eyes to show curiosity on this topic, I did not learn their number or destination. He has no son, but has adopted a nephew, who is now twenty-four years old, and is pursuing his studies at Pekin.

"He eats twice a-day of four or five succulent dishes, and he has the good sense to eat rice with each dish, not reserving it for the end of the dinner, as the Chinese do at their feasts. He drinks nothing while eating.

YEH'S RELIGION.

"His devotions consist of sitting in the posture of a Chinese idol, his legs crossed, and his face to the east. He remains in an abstracted state for about ten minutes, and the act of devotion is accomplished. When he first came on board he retired into this contemplative state several times a day. He afterward became much more remiss, and once a day appeared to suffice him. He uses no idol, and when asked whether he wished for any facilities for performing his devotions privately, replied that he wanted nothing of the sort. I imagined that this was an act of devotion according to the custom of the higher sect of the Buddhists; but one day, when he was in special good humor, he condescended to explain why he turned himself to the east, instead of to the west, which is the birth-place of Buddha. He said if he were praying he should turn to the west; but he is not praying. He turns to the east because the east is the 'sǎng chi'—the principle of life, as the west is the principle of death. He says the four cardinal points agree with the four seasons—the north is the winter, the south is the summer, the east is the spring, and the west is the autumn. We asked him what Taoli this was, 'Confucian?' 'Yes.' 'Buddhist?' 'Yes.' 'Taouist?' 'Yes. It is more ancient even than Confucius. It is the ancient ceremonial of China.' 'Are the Taoli of Confucius and Buddha and Laotzu all subordinate to the ancient Taoli of China?' 'Yes; they are all included in it. From the time there was an east there was this Taoli.'

YEH'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY.

"We traversed the Bay of Bengal upon an unruffled sea, and Yeh was comfortable in his stomach, and during some portion of each day ready for conversation. One subject upon which it was never difficult to draw him out was that of his own career.

"He tells us that he is fifty-two years old, that he is the son of a public officer now eighty years old, who was Secretary of the Board of War (of which Yeh is now President) for fourteen years, and who has now for some years retired.

"He recounted the different high offices he has held. The list is too numerous for insertion, but it includes every kind of judicial and political duty. He declares that he owed his first appointment as Prefect entirely to his success in the public examinations. This gave me an opportunity of inquiring into the nature of these examinations, about which so much has been written and so little is known.

"Yeh has taken four degrees. He has passed seven examinations. In three he was unsuccessful: in the other four he was successful. In the last his distinction was so great that he was named the second wrangler of the Empire—he was No. 2 on the list of all the candidates who passed at that Imperial examination."

A PICNIC BY LAND.

A PICNIC BY WATER.

PICNICKING BY LAND AND WATER.

THE Picnic season is at hand, and our artists present, on the preceding page, their ideas of a party by land and one by water. We trust the designs, which are as cool and shady as the heart of picnicker can desire, will stir up them who,

"Sick of home and luxuries,

Do want a new sensation," and cause them to realize that this spring rains have enabled the woods to come out in their freshest and densest green; while, in the mild sunshine, every flower and leaf is as bright and sweet and fragrant as only the sun of early June can make them.

What memories will be brought up in the reader's mind by the hues now electrified. What memories of scaling precipices, climbing mountain sides, exploring unknown caves, and talking nonsense to Echo in gipsy-land! What visions of unbridled breaks to be crossed, and whose crossing afforded to tender natures an excuse for taking the fainting of the Po did to Hamilton—nay, was, perhaps, as fraught with important consequences! to him as was the crossing of the Rubicon to Cæsar! And then—to come to more material things—what a singular charm your appetite took for ham sandwiches and other pâtés de foie!

Yet there are sundry drawbacks to your enjoyment. Probably it rained the night before your picnic: it generally does. You sit down, and "Sink to what stool's nearest,

For chairs would you abide?
Why settle thrones legs and feet,
If shifted from a pedal?"

Then, as to the eatables, of course there has been a search:

"Over a pie—a sudden sup—
The grasshoppers are skipping!
Just look at the wasps, each like a mop,
And all the meat is dripping.

"Floating with broken grog, you find
Some cakes among the bottles,
Which then may eat who do not mind
Excoriated throttles.
The biscuits now are wiped and dried,
With lemon and orange voices mixt
'Look! look! a toad has got astride
Our only pat of butter!'"

Then,

"Your solids in a liquid state,
Your cooling liquids heated,
And every proposal put by Fate
Most cruelly defeated,"

you inwardly vow that this shall be your last picnic. So finds, in the words of that old humorist whom we have quoted (not Wordsworth):

"While thus you smile, but storm within,
A storm without soon ensues,
And down descends in deaf'ning din
A deluge of disaster.
'Tis some pic-nic!—the fruit dessert
Is fruitlessly deserted,
And homeward now you all revert,
Jaded, moody, and dirtied!
Each gently grumbling, as he goes
His sorked and soiled clothes,
'If these are picnic pleasuries,
Preserve us from another!'"

THE MADISON MYSTERY.

I.

PEOPLE meet at New Jersey. It is looked upon by the people of American civilization as a sort of Purgatorial State. Jersey and Jericho seem to hold the same relative positions as places to which evil-doers are traditionally banished. If you live a place in New Jersey, your friends regard you with a species of wondering pity. But if you have a villa by the banks of Acheron, you could not be more commiserated. According to the popular mind, mosquitoes and ague are the two great objects of this calumniated State. It is a land of apples and cold drafts.

I don't care a snap of my fingers for the morals of the Jerseyites, but I can not withhold my admiration for their State. I have been much struck, more of quiet orchards that, in the month of May, bear upon gnarled branches the delight of their pink and white blossom, and in September are fragrant with the perfume of "quintessence ripened and quintillionen green." I love the calm Passaic, and the broad inlets having been twaddled over through a volume of turnpike-road verses, by a Mr. Macdonald, who known as "Bloom." I love its green banks; its thick and slippery mud-flats; its darting leaps through the channels and over the rippling shoals; its green; its quiet ponds mantled with hazy waterlilies, unfortunately which the pike-perch and pickerel-fish in wait for the dragon-fly, who flashes overhead, here and there its sail-like wings. There is something soothing and civilized in the land of Nature in New Jersey. The very factories and mills there, although as industrious as a swarm of bees to bush their clacking into well-bred, subdued murmurs.

The sweetest spot, to my mind, in this State is Madison. It is a quiet country village, with but few stores and many churches, and through the traveler the reflection that the place is more pious than surrounding. The roads are very good, and the large trust, that drop lovingly over the polestrain, and protect him from the fierce sun with their green shades. The land on all sides is rolling into knolls and sinks into valleys, the one crowned and the other lined with bushy oaks, and dotted with old and transparent maples. Along the old fences, ragged and quaint, the chipmunk runs in and out of holes as if he were first cousin. On the hills there are many pools scattered through the fields here; some bordered with thick sedge, to which a sportsman's imagination might conceive hosts of wildfowl lurking; others dotted deep at the bottom of funnel-shaped depressions of the soil, and surrounded by sad circles of trees that shroud the still waters in an everlasting gloom.

There is a calm and self-possessed-looking hotel in Madison. Even in the hottest day it seems as cool as Sir Charles Coldstream. So unwisely are all bustle pervades it. Its piazzas are tranquil as the cloisters of a monastery; and if we looked at vesper-time stealthy-footed files of monks moving along them, it would scarce seem out of character with the building.

The servants at the Katydid House are noiseless and orderly. They perform their duties as quietly as if they were religious exercises. There is a lumdrey always at work in the back garden, who, as it were, washes to herself. None of the usual noises attendant on such lavatory exercises are to be heard, and the presence of the lumdrey is one she could not create less disturbance. Every body in the establishment seems to move in velvet slippers. Sometimes you see one suddenly, as if he were slid along a groove like the ghost in the "Castle Spectre," without having made any audible tyvate, answering to the name of "Chloe," who invariably enters your room through the key-hole. Chloe is the only black in the village, for the first intimation you receive of his presence is a distant voice (which is the property of his lungs) in the back hall behind him, and which has never since been able to catch him up descending. "Did you call, sir?" Chloe is the most clear ghastly sounds, for he is constantly gliding in upon the guests at all hours, demurely, and with noiseless feet.

The large parlor of the Katydid House is inhabited chiefly by the mother of the proprietor of the house, who remembers Washington—and a large brass stove, which, being at one end of the room, looks like an old-fashioned fireplace—never occasionally seen in the old Jungle's provincial churches. I have not the remotest idea what the old lady's name is. Nor has any one I know only as the proprietor of the Katydid House, and herself only as the mother of his son. Indeed, she goes but in the name of "The Mother," and has a strange eccentricity of speaking of herself as "I" still, as if she were merely an observer making allusion to some one with whom she was entirely disconnected. But the old lady is a favorite with the Mother seems to have devoted herself is to induce people to play on the piano, a strange and unique instrument that stands behind the door, and looks as if it could crawl up the wall at any given moment. She is a good old lady, and has been lulled into awaking the melody that slumbers in this ingenious piece of furniture. She has certainly accelerated her remaining days. I don't believe that she has ever succeeded, but her perseverance is wonderful. The proprietor of the Katydid House is Mr. Betty, sister of the proprietor or the mother of the proprietor, who presides at the table, and to whom the superintendence of the culinary department is confided. She resembles somewhat in texture an aged fowl that has been boiled for soup, and is fond of continually smoothing down her black silk dress with her hands, as if she were endeavoring to perform some electrical experiment and was gathering the fluid. Miss Betty stands behind the chair of the guest (at the head of the dining-room), watching the effect of her cookery on the guests, and has the most extraordinary contingency if the beef-steak pudding or the fresh stew is not entirely appreciated.

There are but two guests at the Katydid House last summer. They came late one night in July, by the last train from New York, and found the institute rooms in the house. A tall, handsome lady, and a middle-aged gentleman. The lady, who seemed about twenty-eight, had a fine, open brow, bright, blonde complexion, and graceful, flexible figure. She was pale, and had the appearance of one who seemed bending under the weight of some secret sorrow. Her companion was a singular-looking person. He looked more like the dark-complexioned of some blasted tree than like a human being. His head was long and narrow, and bald, except on the sides, when he moved them about, they seemed more as if tossed by the wind than stirred by any spontaneous motion. He was rather a tall man, but from his unnaturally long legs, that seemed, in the act of walking, to perform more than one step at a time, he resembled the flexible rests on which this strange, unearthly trunk was supported. His head was large, and draped with a profusion of coarse, black hair, that fell over his humped shoulders like the mossy weeds that cover the trunk of old decayed stumps. His eyes were of a strange, colorless character, like faded opals, and occasionally an expression that would shock you, giving them a wild, pride ferocity.

The night these travelers arrived at the Katydid they committed the crime of last night against the Mother, by declining to take supper at the public table. Chloe, who, by-the-way, has a peculiar habit, said, all their needs in their private apartments.

"I wonder if such a thing, Betty, ever was?" said the Mother, indignantly, when Miss Betty communicated this intelligence. "I can only call it the terrible hurt to please. Now this child thought that they would be kind of sociable when they came, and to have a regular time of it, and sit on the piazza; but if they're as quiet to shut themselves up in their own rooms, I'm sure I don't see the use of persons this child would knot stockings for. Cock 'em up, indeed!"

The Mother had not been long inhabiting the Katydid before they became mysteries. Madison is a very small village, and even in a metropolitan village; but even the most respectable and reserved of families could not stand with impunity the lovely and unending notice them that a guest of a dwarf of fashion ugliness taking up their abode at the principal hotel, and remaining secluded in their own apartments by day and night, and never having as much as a doctor or even a clergyman to see them. But these strangers kept pale in a very short time, and its wings grew considerably owing the judicious treatment of the Mother. According to that venerable authority, sounds of quarrel were heard to issue frequently from the apartments occupied by the mysterious pair; and Chloe reported that, on one occasion, when he had made one of his usual entrances through some chink or key-hole into the parlor, he beheld the pale and beautiful lady pinning the dwarf to the floor by the throat, while the latter was struggling violently, and gurgling out the most awful imprecations. The most extraordinary part of this scene was that the dwarf—whom one would have supposed grateful for the intervention—was as exasperated as the lady at the interference, and with his spallen eyes glowing at a white heat ordered them instantly out of the room. This dish of gossip, after being properly served up by the Mother, served as a wonderful appetizer to the good people of Madison.

II.

"Again I ask you, what have you done with him?"

"Poor thing! poor thing!" ejaculated the dwarf, waving his long, branch-like arms, and casting a strange glance, intended for sentiment, at the ceiling, "what could I have done with him, with arms folded, and an expression of the most furious rage burning in the eyes.

"I say, what have you done with him, Adam Drake? Answer me, you fiend!"

"Fiend, indeed! Fiend, I fear," murmured the dwarf, piteously, to himself. "Never. She's getting worse every day."

The woman ground her teeth, and stamped upon the floor.

"You devil incarnate!" she cried, "I'll tear the secret out of your black, bitter heart before I have done with you!"

"It's terrible to behold a noble intellect in ruins," continued the dwarf, musingly, in the same tone as if he were contemplating a Colosseum or a Temple of Minerva. "Hadn't you better leave me, nothing dreadful to you, my love? You are getting excited." And as he spoke he rose, and in a tender manner endeavored to lead the lady from the room, but she had drawn from his pocket.

"If you come nearer I will tear your flesh with my teeth!" said the woman whom he called Agnes, hissing out the words with exquisite distinctness. "If you dare to make me as mad as reality as you affect to believe me. But you shall tell me, or by my senses until I have torn the secret from you, then let my poor heart break if it will. I will never leave you, Adam Drake! I will be your fate as long as you live, until I discover what you have done with the child!"

"That child is gone!" replied the dwarf, rocking to and fro on his chair, and watching her every motion with his blue—blue—eyes.

"I have come nearer I will tear your flesh with my teeth!" said the woman whom he called Agnes, hissing out the words with exquisite distinctness. "If you dare to make me as mad as reality as you affect to believe me. But you shall tell me, or by my senses until I have torn the secret from you, then let my poor heart break if it will. I will never leave you, Adam Drake! I will be your fate as long as you live, until I discover what you have done with the child!"

"That child is gone!" replied the dwarf, rocking to and fro on his chair, and watching her every motion with his blue—blue—eyes.

"Gone, indeed! Gone! I'll see you in the matter," she continued, "by instinct, when I've prostrated by the most unaccountable of my humanities, and the pains of labor came upon me; and when on my bed of agony I was lowering so terribly that the whole house was running around me was dim and dull, you spirited away my child—the child that was born with the pain of a heart broken, and when I came forth from my trance you stood with your cold, colorless eyes by my bedside, and you said that the child was gone! I knew that you lied, my brother-in-law's, and Lint, and dull as the fiend whom the feeble know you are! I infant in the air that surrounded me. I felt the pulses of a life derived from mine throbbing within me, and I knew that you were waiting in unison with the beating of my own heart! Oh! I felt it! Because you knew how I and child were strung by a chain that no one saw, but which no force can break, no distance can sunder!"

"I have no curiosity to see her thus," said the dwarf, still speaking as if to himself.

"You have no curiosity, Adam Drake," she continued. "He lives—I feel it. You were too great a coward for murder; but you have concealed him. Where is he?"

A long pause. The dwarf did not reply, but rocked to and fro.

"For eight years I have incessantly asked you that question. You think because, through the long, dreary years, I have not pressed, that your mystery is safe. You are wrong, Adam Drake. I have but waited my time."

And as she spoke she slowly drew from her bosom a slip of paper, torn, apparently, from a book, for it was full of print and narrow. The dwarf started and turned white.

"Remember this," to pay Mrs. Bendon for the—"

"Where did you get that?" shrieked the dwarf, leaping from his chair, and advancing upon her with his long arms clutchingly extended. "You robbed me, you fury!"

"Robbed you! Because you, does it? I thought so. What fills up the blank after what I have read?" said the woman, retreating before him, and waving the slip of paper over you thought yourself, did you not? But even dessous sleep, and when you found I came to you in my night-dress, and with a pin and that pocket-book was the clew I wanted. If I did not believe through those long years that I would find out the clew, Adam Drake, I would have murdered you a long time since!"

"Look you, myself," cried the dwarf, making a bound at her like a wild cat.

She evaded him, drawing a small stiletto, and lifting it above her head. "Come closer, and I will kill you!"

At this moment a voice, that seemed to come from some spot about four miles off, said, hollowly, "Did you call, Sir?"

The antagonists turned and beheld Cleb—Cleb, who, as usual, had entered through the key-hole, and was now standing before them like a ghost that had suddenly been summoned to appear.

"No, Scoundrel!" said the dwarf, savagely.

"Yes, Sir!" said the lady, decisively. "Is the lady of the house below?"

"Do you mean Miss Bother?" asked Cleb, vocally going a few miles farther back into the interior of the States.

"The old lady, I mean."

"She's in the parlor," said Cleb, from a great distance.

"Very good; I will go and see her. I am not afraid of you," said the lady, turning to the dwarf. "but I must live until I find him." And before he could utter a syllable in reply, she had passed through the door, and was gone.

III.

"Lor' a mussy!" ejaculated the Mother, lifting her hands in astonishment, "this child never heard any thing like it since she was born! And to take the darling little bubby away too. Oh, the inhuman serpent! But don't you be afeard, darling. The loss is around, this child tells you. He'll take care you don't come to no harm. Mayhap you'll play on the pianny, my dear. There's a beautiful one over there, if you do."

"I'm not afraid of any thing he can do," said the lady called Agnes, who, as you may conjecture, had been confiding her sorrows to the Mother. "Nothing could kill me if he could not. I will be alone, and I must not die until I find my darling child. Ah! where is she?"

It was a play-bill—a splendid and enormous play-bill—announcing that at the Madison Theatre, on the next evening, would be exhibited the celebrated drama of "Rolla and Pizarro;" the part of Rolla by Mr. Bloody, and the part of Cora by the renowned actrice, Mrs. Seraphina Bindon; the Child, by Master Bindon.

"Oh, that painting right dead away!" exclaimed the Mother, on beholding her guest scrutinizing the play-bill which she had picked up off the table. "Oh, la, Betty! here, Betty!"

And Betty came from the kitchen, rapidly clearing her hands with her apron, and there was a great bustle and fuss, and restoratives were applied to the fainting lady.

"Why, what's the matter, deary?" asked the Mother, as soon as Agnes recovered her senses. "Has any one been a-taking on to you?"

"Why, don't you see?" cried Agnes, clutching the play-bill with a convulsive grasp. "Master Mrs. Bindon—that is the woman that has my child! Where is the theatre?—I must go there. Oh, God bless you, my child! and his mother! I will find him at last!"

This child thinks that it must be Farmer Bowyer's born that them players have teek. Clich! where's the thyrater? You're up to all mischief, you naughty child!

Cleb, answering from the vicinity of the White Mountains, immediately continued the Mother's surmise. The theatre was Farmer Bowyer's barn.

"Come with me," cried Agnes, seizing Cleb by the arm and dragging him toward the door; "you could communicate with his voice to reconstruct. "Come with me, child, and I will reward you. And you, dear old lady, you are too kind."

The Madison Theatre was in a state of immense preparation for the coming performance. The floor that had so often been bedstrewn by fluits in threshing time, was now covered with a green baize, planted scenery stood here and there against the walls. A flat scan, who looked like the manager, was busily engaged in painting a pretty child on a pole, unlikeably woman, with fluffy cheeks and a pink complexion, was painting a pretty child on a pole, unlikeably woman, with fluffy cheeks and a pink complexion, was painting a pretty child on a woman would play Cora.

Agnes gave a shriek at the child the moment she entered, and covered it with kisses.

"Hillo!" cried Cora, in a voice like a man's, "what's all this?"

"My child! my dear, dear child!"

"Your child! What do you mean, ma'am? he's my child!"

"Woman!" cried Agnes, starting to her feet, "I swear all; you were employed by Mr. Drake to take care of this child—to pass it off as your own! Speak, woman!"

"If I was," answered Cora, rather flatly, "he told me the mother was dead, and that it was a child he was to take care of."

"He lied. The child was mine. He stole it from me, and I have come to reclaim it. Nothing under heaven shall part us."

"But I can't give him up without authority. Besides, what will they say to-day? Rolla can't play without a child you know."

"Listen, Cora," said Cleb, "I will pay you and your troupe double your expected receipts for to-night. You shall have any sum you please, but I must have the child."

This proposition seemed to be received with the greatest favor by the whole theatrical company, and Agnes, pressing the little one to her heart, set off for the Katydid House.

"Where is Mr. Drake?" were the first words she uttered as soon as she entered.

"He's gone to New York," said the Mother.

"Thank God!" exclaimed Agnes. "I will never see him again."

THE FIRST GRAY HAIRS.

A silver tress is 'mid thy hair
I never saw before—
The first that ever has woven there,
To warn thee youth is o'er!
But think not I can love thee less
Because my fingers rest
Ah, no! that little silver tress
More closely binds our hearts!

It is decreed that youth must pass,
Why should it be deplored?
For in our child (as in a glass)
We may live renewed!
Thy gentle smile plays o'er her face,
And sun-brown is her hair;
Oh dear, dearest love! ere I could trace
One tress of silver there.

ANCHORED.

As, after sailing over stormy seas,
  A ship, full-freighted from a foreign shore,
Comes pressing landward in the freshened breeze,
  Where swarthy headlands breast the billows' roar;

And in its sea-sought anchorage calmly swings,
  When graybeard Twilight glooms the murmuring bay,
Folding to rest its long-exerted wings,
  Kissed by the cool lips of the ocean spray—

So has my soul at length its anchorage found
  In the still harbor of a sweet content,
Land-locked from fears that beat with ceaseless sound
  On coasts foam-flecked with surges chill and spent.

No fretting cares disturb its sheltered calm,
  Or break the silence of its full repose;
The breeze blows sweetly over beds of balm,
  And soothes forever old memorial woes.

And as the sailor in the harbor dreams,
  In silent watches, of his venturous life,
And in the swells of far-off music seems
  To hear the songs once wooing him to strife—

So, floating safely on the sheltered sea,
  Rocked by the lazy ebbing of the tide,
I dream of all my life had longed to be,
  In vain ambitions of its restless pride.

I dream of all the bright alluring aims
  That gleamed from far upon its hither way,
Yet ever faded, as the star whose flames
  Pale in the brilliance of the coming day;

The hopes that flashed athwart the western sky,
  When life and love walked proudly hand in hand,
Yet ever sank before the eager eye,
  Like looming castles in a mirage land.

I drink again the melody that floats,
  I seem to feel the odorous breezes blow,
I hear the welcome of a thousand throats—
  But in fruition do not long to go.

The calm of manhood lulls the wild desires
  That stirred me once, a tender-hearted boy;
But can not still the trembling of the lyres
  That flood the soul with memories of joy.

In wayside harbors of life's quietude
  Each idle wave that plashes on the shore
Thrills with old songs the tranquil thoughts that brood
  On buried fancies soul endued once more.

The past is past, yet to our life belongs
  The fairest hues that made its past divine,
The full-toned music of its sweetest songs,
  The warm, rich splendor of its summer shine.

A SAD STORY.

IT was just three years ago, on such a night as this, and the snow was enough to take away one's breath; I could hardly find my way through the well-lighted streets. I was summoned to the house of Mr. F——, the rich wine-merchant. He was very comfortably off, to use the common phrase. He had made one of those marriages of convenience which are so common, and which once caused a woman to say, "If you were not my husband, I should not feel the slightest interest in you." In short, the man was happy, and now doubly so, for his wife bore a joyful hope beneath her heart. When I entered the drawing-room the tea was being served. All the front rooms in the house were brilliantly lighted and thrown into one. The young wife was ordered to take exercise, and she was now walking up and down the rooms. Not a sound was to be heard on the velvet carpets. I seated myself with the company, consisting of the wife's parents and her married sister. The mother was working at a baby-cap, the sister was crocheting a dainty coverlet; in a corner stood the cradle, covered with a green silk curtain. Whenever Mrs. F—— was absent in the next room, they began speaking of the hour of travail, which all were awaiting with mingled feelings of apprehension and delight. I was especially requested to look out for a healthy and respectable nurse. The sister, a clever young woman, who seemed very delicate, said: "I could never make up my mind to hire a wet-nurse, and I much wished that Fanny were of the same opinion. I am always grieved to see the way in which these nurses are pampered and petted; they are treated like queens, and enjoy the best of every thing, and what is to become of them afterward? Besides, it must have a pernicious influence on the other female servants. They who have kept pure from sin are forced to wait on the fallen sister, and endure all her caprices and whims." Her husband somewhat harshly expressed his opinion about it being all stuff, while I was engaged in combating the prejudices of Mr. F——, who fancied that a wife retained her beauty longer if she did not suckle her children. I proved to him how utterly false and unnatural this view was. The young wife had now found us, and, for fear of exciting her, the conversation was turned to other matters. The sister sang, the father retailed some of his stock jokes to keep her in good spirits. The fair young wife, as she sat there self-forgetting, and only thinking of the future, resembled a saint. For a woman who bears a second life beneath her heart is a saint; even the roughest and wildest beings treat her with reverence.

I left the house at a late hour. As I descended the stairs I thought to myself how happy the new arrival would be—how many loving arms, how many sparkling eyes would welcome it. As I went along the street, the snow and wind almost knocked me backward. At last I reached my residence in the Lying-in Hospital. As I walked up the steps I felt something moving at my feet. I started back, and shouted, "Who is that?"

"Oh, God!" was the reply, "have mercy upon me!"

"Who are you?"

"Misery, misery! I must die—I and my child!"

I now saw by the glimmer of the lamp a girl, whose head was wrapped up in a coarse shawl: she was wiping the snow out of her eyes. I rang violently, and the poor girl embraced my knees and sobbed out:

"Oh! we must not be left to die. I have come twenty miles to-day from G——. I could hardly drag my limbs along. I could not stay there any longer: the villagers were pointing the finger of scorn at me. I went into a public-house and implored them to give me shelter, but they only laughed at me; one coarse fellow tried to insult me, and I ran away. At last I resolved to remain here till some kind person came to my assistance."

Thus the girl spoke through her tears, and shuddering with the cold, until the porter at last opened the door. I ordered a nurse to be roused, and the stranger put to bed, and within an hour she was in a deep sleep, though every now and then she made a convulsive movement. For a long time I lay awake: do what I would I could not but speculate on the fate of the two children I was about to bring into the world almost at the same time. Little did I think what a fearful tragedy I was preparing.

The next morning I found the stranger refreshed, and almost quite restored. I, too, had got over that softness of heart which had so strangely unmanned me on the previous night. I went up to her bedside. I knew beforehand what lamentable story, intermingled with sobs, I was about to hear. I have been too often deceived not to be always strictly on my guard. Fortunately we are at times not so wise as we should like to be, and the uncorrupted heart will not listen to all the wise warnings of the head. Well, I found the girl in better spirits, and she thanked me heartily for my kindness. According to her statement she was the daughter of a once rich farmer, who had been brought down in the world by intoxication and bad housekeeping. She had seen better days in her father's house. Father and mother were now dead, and Jane Hardy (that was her name) had been for three years servant at the Plow, in G——. Here she fell away from virtue with the hostler. She wept bitterly as she said this, but then she wiped her tears and her eye sparkled as she spoke of her husband, as she persisted in calling him. She represented him to be a thoroughly honest and industrious man, and was incessant in her praises. He wanted to marry her, but they had not a shilling to begin housekeeping. She spoke of the nights she had passed in solitary sorrow, and how her mother could find no rest in the grave, because her daughter had quitted the path of rectitude. She told me how her husband was going to do himself a hurt, through sorrow for his great fault. Then she added, "God will punish me for my sin, but I will endure all patiently, so long as the poor innocent creature is spared to us. I will willingly work my finger-ends off, and I and my husband will be able to save enough in the course of a few years to emigrate to Australia."

I must confess that the story affected me but slightly; but I had heard so many of them, part true, part invention. But when, in the course of a few days, the husband made his appearance, a good-looking young fellow, but now as hang-dog as a criminal, and with a trembling hand offered me a few shillings, then adding, through fear of insulting me, that I could lay them out in getting some dainties for Jenny, I began to form a better opinion of the couple. The young fellow pleased me remarkably: he was one of those men who are not in the habit of expressing their thanks, and who find difficulty in uttering words of humiliation, for they prefer to receive only that which they have a right to demand.

On the tenth day after her arrival Jane gave birth to a healthy boy. The joy she evinced at the sight of the infant is indescribable. At this moment she put off all her grief, all thoughts of her misfortune: she was a happy mother. And when she said that the boy was the very image of his father, her whole face shone with delight.

A week later Mrs. F—— also gave birth to a son. I now proposed to Jane to go there as wet-nurse, as she could earn a decent sum of money. She regarded me with widely-opened eyes, pressed her child closer to her heart, and large drops stood in her eyes. She drew breath hurriedly, and could not speak, but at last she said, "I can say nothing about it: my husband is coming to the christening to-day." The child was christened, and I was asked to be godfather, but I had no time, and, to tell you the truth, no great inclination. I might have been godfather to half the world if I had accepted all the offers. Still, in gratitude to me, the boy received my name—Anthony. The husband wanted to take the child in the country with him, and have it taken care of there, and I advised the same; but Jane made it a condition that if she accepted the situation her boy must remain near her. It was handed over to one of these old nurses I was abusing just now.

The same evening I took Jane to Mr. F——'s house. She shrank back involuntarily as she laid the strange child to her breast. But she got over this feeling; and Jane lived like a princess in a room where the temperature was regulated with the greatest care. She had every sort of dainty to eat and drink, the whole house was at her disposal, and Mrs. F——'s child (he was christened Augustus) grew stronger hourly. Jane grew handsomer every day too; she sang and sported with the child, and could hardly invent sufficient terms of endearment. Many times did I laugh at her inventive genius. But you must not imagine that Jane was trying to stifle the cry of pain in her own heart; it is a secret impulse of nature that a nurse learns to love her foster-child. I was heartily praised for having procured the F——s such an excellent and respectable wet-nurse. I received most hearty but unmerited thanks.

The winter rapidly made way for spring, and Jane was permitted to take Augustus out for an airing in St. James's Park. She carried the child warmly wrapped up, and held a parasol over his face to keep off any impertinent sunbeams. Mrs. F—— was seated at the window, and I met Jane just as she got into the street. She looked round timidly, and said to me she felt nervous: she was to surprise Mr. F—— as he came home from the City, by showing him the child enjoying the air for the first time.

In the Park were several wet-nurses, mostly reckless creatures, who paid more attention to the soldiers than to the children in their arms. One of them, who had known Jane in the institution, asked her, casually, whether she had got rid of her trouble. She turned icy cold, for she had seen her child but once since she had deserted it. On the day when Augustus was christened, the old nurse had brought Master Tony, and had been regaled with the best of meat and drink. Jane had then felt that she was almost a stranger to her child, and now the thought of her neglect almost maddened her. She rushed down the dirty back streets of Westminster to her child. She found it crying, alone in the room; a half-peeled boiled potato lay upon the cradle. The child was wretchedly thin, and looked like death. When her eye then fell on the little Augustus (so the old nurse said), she looked as if she would have killed him with a glance. It seemed to say, "See, that is the robber who steals from you your mother, your food, your very life!" She sank down by the side of the cradle, and sobbed loudly; the two children cried with her. Then she rose again, took up her own child, kissed it and hugged it: she offered it the breast, but it would not suck: she raised it sportively above her head, and the boy merrily struck her in the face. Then she quarreled with the old nurse; but all at once the idea occurred to her she must go home, and she hurried away with Augustus. When she reached Mr. F——'s house she received a severe scolding, as far as they dared to go for fear of injuring her nursling. Every body was suffering from the greatest alarm. The father had come home from the City, and the child was nowhere to be seen. Jane did not like to say where she had really been; so she pretended that she had lost her way. Strict orders were given that she must never go out again alone. The little Augustus cried and whined all the day. Against my will I was obliged to betray where Jane had been. Mr. F—— was half inclined to turn her out of the house at once; but I interposed, and promised to keep a careful watch over Jane's child. I had done so all along; but what avail is that under such circumstances?

Jane gradually became quite cheerful as she had heretofore been. On the third evening after this occurrence, Mr. and Mrs. F—— went to spend the evening at her mother's. The house was quite quiet. Jane was singing a melancholy old English song, while the under-nurse was at work in the adjoining room. Suddenly Jane rushed to the window and threw it up. The under-nurse asked her what she was about; she was letting in a draught and must close the window instantly. Jane asked her if she had not heard something; it seemed to her as if some one in the street kept on calling her by name. The under-nurse said she heard nothing, and it must be all fancy. But Jane could not be pacified; and she rushed about the room like a tiger in its cage. She stopped and listened at the window; all was silent, and yet she heard something again. She opened the nursery door and went out. She slipped off her shoes and gently glided down stairs. The house door was locked, and in a second Jane was down the kitchen stairs and entered the larder, the window of which opened on the area. It was, luckily, unbolted, and she leaped out, and was up the steps in a moment. So soon as she reached the street, she hurried on along. The policeman started back involuntarily as she passed him: she was come and gone without a sound. On she hurried, and at length reached the house where her child was. The door was on the latch, for the old nurse had gone to visit her next-door neighbor. Jane found her child quiet in bed; it no longer cried, it only groaned. The moon shone brightly in the heavens and poured down on the mother, as she bent tearless over her child. The nurse came in with a light, and Jane uttered a cry that pierced the very marrow as she saw her child; she tore her hair, but then suddenly turned calm, and laid her child to her breast. Oh! blessings on it! her boy opened his eyes, laid his wasted hands on her bosom, and drank eagerly. Cautiously she laid him down, and kissed the blanket under which he slept, or at least had closed his eyes.

I had just arrived at the house on my round of visits, and hearing an unusual disturbance, I walked in. Jane hurried to meet me, and said, joyfully, "My child is alive—my child is alive!" but I saw death, which might close its eyes at any moment. I tried to induce Jane to go home, but she was proud or lost in thought, and scarcely listened to me. She sang a nursery song, and rocked her child the while. I felt its pulse—it was quite silent—she was rocking a dead child. I now tried to force Jane home, for I hoped to hide the awful truth from her: but she seized the child once again, and I saw that the awful truth had struck her. At first, I thought she was about to faint, for she sank over the cradle; but she soon recovered, and said, "Yes, he has gone from me, my Tony, but he drank at my breast for all that, yes—yes." She turned backward and forward and shook her head, as if saluting a party of friends. I had several visits still to pay, and ordered that Jane should be kept there till I came to fetch her. She could not return to Mr. F——'s house in her present condition. Jane allowed me to depart quietly, but so soon as I was gone, she over-persuaded the old nurse to accompany her home. She walked along the street as quiet as a lamb.

When they arrived at Mr. F——'s house the carriage was just drawing up to the door. Jane said, "Let me in now," and she stepped in without observation. She crept up to the nursery, roused the little Augustus from his sleep, kissed and cuddled him, and sang:

"Sleep, my darling, sleep,
Your father minds the sheep,
Your mother—"

At this moment the door opened, and Mrs. F—— walked in.

"How is my child?" she said.

"Your child?" Jane shrieked in her madness. "Away, away! Your child!—my child! Yes, your child, the murderer of my child." She glanced wildly around her. "Murderer! murderer!" she yelled, and hurled the child on the ground. It uttered but one groan—it was dead!

At this fearful moment I entered the room. The child was lying on the ground, the mother in a fainting condition by its side. Jane was dancing round the room, and singing merry snatches. I was petrefied.

That night Jane was conveyed to Hanwell: it was said that she was attacked by a milk fever. After many weeks of fearful agony, death spared her further suffering.

A LITTLE HYMN TO SLEEP

SLEEP, thou boon,
  What sweet tune
Shall I sing to bring thee near?
  What rare fall,
  Or madrigal,
Will delight thy dainty ear?
Shall a little honey-bee
Bring a summer song to thee?
  Or the wind among the leaves?
Or the silver-singing rain—
  Wouldst thou hear it on the eaves?
Hear its feet, but not too plain?
Name the strain, it shall be thine,
Only come to me, and mine,
  Sleep, fairy Sleep!

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT?

BY SIR E. BULWER LYTTON.

CHAPTER V.

It is asserted by those learned men who have devoted their lives to the study of the manners and habits of insect society, that when a spider has lost its last web, having exhausted all the glutinous matter wherewith to spin another, it still protracts its innocent existence by obtruding its nippers on some less warlike but more respectable spider, possessed of a convenient home and an airy larder. Observant moralists have noticed the same peculiarity in the Man-Eater, or Pocket-Cannibal.

ELEVEN o'clock A.M. Samuel Adolphus Poole, Esq., is in his parlor—the house one of those new dwellings which yearly spring up north of the Regent's Park—dwellings that, attesting the eccentricity of the national character, task the fancy of the architect and the gravity of the beholder—each tenement so tortured into contrast with the other, that, on one little rood of ground, all ages seem blended, and all races encamped. No. 1 is an Egyptian tomb!—Pharaohs may repose there! No. 2 is a Swiss chalet—William Tell may be shooting in its garden! Lo! the severity of Doric columns—Sparta is before you! Behold that Gothic porch—you are rapt to the Norman days! Ha! those Elizabethan mullions Sidney and Raleigh, rise again! Ho! the trellises of China—come forth, Confucius and Commissioner Yeh! Passing a few paces, we are in the land of the Zegri and Abencerage—

"Land of the dark-eyed Maid and dusky Moor."

Mr. Poole's house is called Alhambra Villa! Moorish verandas—plate-glass windows, with cusped heads and mahogany sashes—a garden behind, a smaller one in front—stairs ascending to the door-way under a Saracenic portico, between two pedestaled lions that resemble poodles—the whole new and lustrous—in semblance stone, in substance stucco—cracks in the stucco denoting "settlements." But the house being let for ninety-nine years—relet again on a running lease of seven, fourteen, and twenty-one—the builder is not answerable for duration, nor the original lessee for repairs. Take it altogether, than Alhambra Villa masonry could devise no better type of modern taste and metropolitan speculation.

Mr. Poole, since we saw him, between four and five years ago, has entered the matrimonial state. He has married a lady of some money, and become a reformed man. He has eschewed the turf, relinquished belcher neckcloths and Newmarket coats—dropped his old bachelor acquaintances. When a man marries and reforms—especially when marriage and reform are accompanied with increased income, and settled respectably in Alhambra Villa—relations, before estranged, tender kindly overtures; the world, before austere, becomes indulgent. It was so with Poole—no longer Dolly. Grant that in earlier life he had fallen into bad ways, and, among equivocal associates, he had been led on by that taste for sporting which is a manly though a perilous characteristic of the true-born Englishman. He who loves horses is liable to come in contact with blacklegs. The racer is a noble animal; but it is his misfortune that the better his breeding the worse his company. Grant that in the stables Adolphus Samuel Poole had picked up some wild oats—he had sown them now. By-gones were by-gones. He had made a very prudent marriage. Mrs. Poole was a sensible woman—had rendered him domestic, and would keep him straight! His uncle Samuel, a most worthy man, had found him that sensible woman, and, having found her, had paid his nephew's debts, and adding a round sum to the lady's fortune, had seen that the whole was so tightly settled on wife and children that Poole had the tender satisfaction of knowing that, happen what might to himself, those dear ones were safe; nay, that if, in the reverses of fortune, he should be compelled by persecuting creditors to fly his native shores, law could not impair the competence it had settled upon Mrs. Poole, nor destroy her blessed privilege to share that competence with a beloved spouse. Insolvency itself, thus protected by a marriage-settlement, realizes the sublime security of VIRTUE immortalized by the Roman Muse:

——"Repulsæ nescia sordidæ,
Intaminatis fulget honoribus;
Nec sumit aut ponit secures Arbitrio popularis auræ."

Mr. Poole was an active man in the parish vestry—he was a sound politician—he subscribed to public charities—he attended public dinners

—he had votes in half a dozen public institutions—he talked of the public interests, and called himself a public man. He chose his associates among gentlemen in business—speculative, it is true, but steady. A joint-stock company was set up; he obtained an official station at its board, coupled with a salary—not large, indeed, but still a salary.

"The money," said Adolphus Samuel Poole, "is not my object; but I like to have something to do." I can not say how he did something, but no doubt somebody was done.

Mr. Poole was in his parlor, reading letters and sorting papers, before he departed to his office in the West End. Mrs. Poole entered, leading an infant who had not yet learned to walk alone, and denoting, by an interesting enlargement of shape, a kindly design to bless that infant, at no distant period, with a brother or sister, as the case might be.

"Come and kiss Pa, Johnny," said she to the infant.

"Mrs. Poole, I am busy," growled Pa.

"Pa's busy—working hard for little Johnny. Johnny will be the better for it some day," said Mrs. Poole, tossing the infant half up to the ceiling, in compensation for the loss of the paternal kiss.

"Mrs. Poole, what do you want?"

"May I hire Jones's brougham for two hours to-day to pay visits? There are a great many cards we ought to leave; is there any place where I should leave a card for you, lovey—any person of consequence you were introduced to at Mrs. Haughton's last night? That great man they were all talking about, to whom you seemed to take such a fancy, Samuel, duck—"

"Do get out! that man insulted me, I tell you."

"Insulted you! No; you never told me."

"I did tell you last night coming home."

"Dear me, I thought you meant that Mr. Hartopp."

"Well, he almost insulted me, too. Mrs. Poole, you are stupid and disagreeable. Is that all you have to say?"

"Pa's cross, Johnny dear! poor Pa!—people have vexed Pa, Johnny—naughty people. We must go, or we shall vex him too."

Such heavenly sweetness on the part of a forbearing wife would have softened Tamburlane. Poole's sullen brow relaxed. If women knew how to treat men, not a husband, unhenpecked, would be found from Indos to the Pole! And Poole, for all his surly demeanor, was as completely governed by that angel as a bear by his keeper.

"Well, Mrs. Poole, excuse me. I own I am out of sorts to-day—give me little Johnny—there (kissing the infant, who in return makes a dig at Pa's left eye, and begins to cry on finding that he has not succeeded in digging it out)—take the brougham. Hush, Johnny—hush—and you may leave a card for me at Mr. Peckham's, Harley Street. My eye smarts horribly; that baby will gouge me one of these days."

Mrs. Poole has succeeded in stilling the infant, and confessing that Johnny's fingers are extremely strong for his age—but, adding, that babies will catch at whatever is very bright and beautiful, such as gold and jewels, and Mr. Poole's eyes, administers to the wounded orb so soothing a lotion of pity and admiration that Poole growls out quite mildly—"Nonsense, blarney—by-the-by, I did not say this morning that you should not have the rosewood chiffoniere."

"No, you said you could not afford it, duck; and when Pa says he can't afford it, Pa must be the judge—must not he, Johnny dear?"

"But, perhaps, I can afford it. Yes, you may have it—yes, I say, you shall have it. Don't forget to leave that card on Peckham—he's a moneyed man. There's a ring at the bell, who is it? Run and see."

Mrs. Poole obeyed with great activity, considering her interesting condition. She came back in half a minute.

"Oh, my Adolphus! oh, my Samuel! it is that dreadful-looking man who was here the other evening—staid with you so long. I don't like his looks at all. Pray, don't be at home."

"I must," said Poole, turning a shade paler, if that were possible. "Stop—don't let that girl go to the door, and you leave me." He snatched his hat and gloves, and putting aside the parlor maid, who had emerged from the shades below in order to answer the 'ring,' walked hastily down the small garden.

Jasper Losely was stationed at the little gate. Jasper was no longer in rags, but he was coarsely clad—clad as if he had resigned all pretense to please a lady's eye, or to impose upon a West-End tradesman—a check shirt—a rough pea-jacket, his hands buried in its pockets.

Poole started with well-simulated surprise. "What, you! I am just going to my office—in a great hurry at present."

"Hurry or not, I must and will speak to you," said Jasper, doggedly.

"What now? then, step in;—only remember I can't give you more than five minutes."

The rude visitor followed Poole into the back parlor, and closed the door after him.

Leaning his arms over a chair, his hat still on his head, Losely fixed his fierce eyes on his old friend, and said in a low, set, determined voice —"Now, mark me, Dolly Poole, if you think to shirk my business, or throw me over, you'll find yourself in Queer Street. Have you called on Guy Darrell, and put my case to him, or have you not?"

"I met Mr. Darrell only last night, at a very genteel party. (Poole deemed it prudent not to say by whom that genteel party was given, for it will be remembered that Poole had been Jasper's confidant in that adventurer's former designs upon Mrs. Haughton; and if Jasper knew that Poole had made her acquaintance, might he not insist upon Poole's reintroducing him as a visiting acquaintance?) "A very genteel party," repeated Poole. "I made a point of being presented to Mr. Darrell, and very polite he was at first."

"Curse his politeness—get to the point."

"I sounded my way very carefully, as you may suppose; and when I had got him into friendly chat, you understand, I began: Ah! my poor Losely, nothing to be done there—he flew off in a tangent—as much as desired me to mind my own business, and hold my tongue; and upon my life, I don't think there is a chance for you in that quarter."

"Very well—we shall see. Next, have you taken any steps to find out the girl, my daughter?"

"I have, I assure you. But you give me so slight a clew. Are you quite sure she is not in America after all?"

"I have told you before that that story about America was all bosh! a stratagem of the old gentleman's to deceive me. Poor old man," continued Jasper, in a tone that positively betrayed feeling—"I don't wonder that he dreads and flies me; yet I would not hurt him more than I have done, even to be as well off as you are—blinking at me from your mahogany perch like a pet owl with its crop full of mice. And if I would take the girl from him, it is for her own good. For if Darrell could be got to make a provision on her, and, through her, on myself, why, of course, the old man should share the benefit of it. And now that these infernal pains often keep me awake half the night, I can't always shut out the idea of that old man wandering about the world, and dying in a ditch. And that runaway girl—to whom, I dare swear, he would give away his last crumb of bread—ought to be an annuity to us both: Basta, basta! As to the American story—I had a friend at Paris, who went to America on a speculation; I asked him to inquire about this William Waife and his grand-daughter Sophy, who were said to have sailed for New York nearly five years ago, and he saw the very persons—settled in New York—no longer under the name of Waife, but their true name of Simpson, and got out from the man that they had been induced to take their passage from England in the name of Waife, at the request of a person whom the man would not give up, but to whom he said he was under obligations. Perhaps the old gentleman had done the fellow a kind turn in early life. The description of this soi disant Waife and his grandchild settles the matter;—wholly unlike those I seek; so that there is every reason to suppose they must still be in England, and it is your business to find them. Continue your search—quicken your wits—let me be better pleased with your success when I call again this day week—and meanwhile four pounds, if you please—as much more as you like."

"Why, I gave you four pounds the other day, besides six pounds for clothes; it can't be gone."

"Every penny."

"Dear, dear! can't you maintain yourself anyhow? Can't you get any one to play at cards? Four pounds! Why, with your talent for whist, four pounds are a capital?"

"Whom can I play with? Whom can I herd with?—Cracksmen and pickpockets. Fit me out; ask me to your own house; invite your own friends; make up a rubber, and you will then see what I can do with four pounds; and may go shares if you like, as we used to do."

"Don't talk so loud. Losely, you know very well that what you ask is impossible. I've turned over a new leaf."

"But I've still got your handwriting on the old leaf."

"What's the good of these stupid threats? If you really wanted to do me a mischief, where could you go to, and who'd believe you?"

"I fancy your wife would, I'll try. Hillo—"

"Stop—stop—stop. No row here, Sir. No scandal. Hold your tongue, or I'll send for the police."

"Do! Nothing I should like better. I'm tired out. I want to tell my own story at the Old Bailey, and have my revenge upon you, upon Darrell, upon all. Send for the police."

Losely threw himself at length on the sofa—(new morocco, with spring cushions)—and folded his arms.

"You could only give me five minutes—they are gone, I fear. I am more liberal. I give you your own time to consider. I don't care if I stay to dine; I dare say Mrs. Poole will excuse my dress."

"Losely, you are such a—fellow! If I do give you the four pounds you ask, will you promise to shift for yourself somehow, and molest me no more?"

"Certainly not. I shall come once every week for the same sum. I can't live upon less—until—"

"Until what?"

"Until either you get Mr. Darrell to settle on me a suitable provision; or until you place me in possession of my daughter, and I can then be in a better condition to treat with him myself; for if I would make a claim on account of the girl, I must produce the girl, or he may say she is dead. Besides, if she be as pretty as she was when a child, the very sight of her might move him more than all my talk."

"And if I succeed in doing any thing with Mr. Darrell, or discovering your daughter, you will give up all such letters and documents of mine as you say you possess?"

"'Say—I possess!' I have shown them to you in this pocket-book. Dolly Poole—your own proposition to rob old Latham's safe."

Poole eyed the book, which the ruffian took out and tapped. Had the ruffian been a slighter man, Poole would have been a braver one. As it was—he eyed and groaned. "Turn against one's old crony! So unhandsome, so unlike what I thought you were!"

"It is you who would turn against me. But stick to Darrell, or find me my daughter, and help her and me to get justice out of him; and you shall not only have back these letters, but I'll pay you handsomely—handsomely, Dolly Poole. Zooks, Sir—I am fallen—but I am always a gentleman."

Therewith Losely gave a vehement slap to his hat, which, crushed by the stroke, improved his general appearance into an aspect so outrageously raffish, that but for the expression of his countenance the contrast between the boast and the man would have been ludicrous even to Mr. Poole. The countenance was too dark to permit laughter. In the dress, but the ruin of fortune—in the face, the ruin of man.

Poole heaved a deep sigh, and extended four sovereigns. Losely rose and took them carelessly. "This day week," he said—shook himself—and went his way.

CHAPTER VI.

French touches to the Three Vignettes for the Book of Beauty.

Weeks passed—the London season was beginning—Darrell had decided nothing—the prestige of his position was undiminished—in politics, perhaps, higher. He had succeeded in reconciling some great men; he had strengthened, it might be saved, a jarring cabinet. In all this he had shown admirable knowledge of mankind, and proved that time and disuse had not lessened his powers of perception. In his matrimonial designs Darrell seemed more bent than ever upon the hazard—irresolute as ever on the choice of a partner. Still the choice appeared to be circumscribed to the fair three who had been subjected to Colonel Morley's speculative criticism—Lady Adela, Miss Vipont, Flora Vyvyan. Much pro and con might be said in respect to each. Lady Adela was so handsome that it was a pleasure to look at her; and that is much when one sees the handsome face every day—provided the pleasure does not wear off. She had the reputation of a very good temper; and the expression of her countenance confirmed it. There, panegyric stopped; but detraction did not commence. What remained was inoffensive commonplace. She had no salient attribute, and no ruling passion. Certainly she would never have wasted a thought on Mr. Darrell, nor have discovered a single merit in him, if he had not been quoted as a very rich man of high character in search of a wife; and if her father had not said to her—"Adela, Mr. Darrell has been greatly struck with your appearance—he told me so. He is not young, but he is still a very fine-looking man, and you are twenty-seven. 'Tis a greater distinction to be noticed by a person of his years and position than by a pack of silly young fellows, who think more of their own pretty faces than they would ever do of yours. If you did not mind a little disparity of years, he would make you a happy wife; and, in the course of nature, a widow, not too old to enjoy liberty, and with a jointure that might entitle you to a still better match."

Darrell, thus put into Lady Adela's head, he remained there, and became an idèe fixe. Viewed in the light of a probable husband, he was elevated into an "interesting man." She would have received his addresses with gentle complacency; and, being more the creature of habit than impulse, would, no doubt, in the intimacy of connubial life, have blessed him, or any other admiring husband, with a reasonable modicum of languid affection. Nevertheless, Lady Adela was an unconscious impostor; for, owing to a mild softness of eye and a susceptibility to blushes, a victim ensnared by her beauty would be apt to give her credit for a nature far more accessible to the romance of the tender passions, than, happily perhaps for her own peace of mind, she possessed; and might flatter himself that he had produced a sensation which gave that softness to the eye, and that damask to the blush.

Honoria Vipont would have been a choice far more creditable to the good sense of so mature a wooer. Few better specimens of a young lady brought up to become an accomplished woman of the world. She had sufficient instruction to be the companion of an ambitious man—solid judgment to fit her for his occasional adviser. She could preside with dignity over a stately household—receive with grace distinguished guests. Fitted to administer an ample fortune, ample fortune was necessary to the development of her excellent qualities. If a man of Darrell's age were bold enough to marry a young wife, a safer wife among the young ladies of London he could scarcely find; for though Honoria was only three-and-twenty, she was as staid, as sensible, and as remote from all girlish frivolities as if she had been eight-and-thirty. Certainly, had Guy Darrell been of her own years, his fortune unmade, his fame to win, a lawyer residing at the back of Holborn, or a petty squire in the petty demesnes of Fawley, he would have had no charm in the eyes of Honoria Vipont. Disparity of years was in this case not his drawback but his advantage, since to that disparity Darrell owed the established name and the eminent station which made Honoria think she elevated her own self in preferring him. It is but justice to her to distinguish here between a woman's veneration for the attributes of respect which a man gathers round him, and the more vulgar sentiment which sinks the man altogether, except as the necessary fixture to be taken in with the general valuation. It is not fair to ask if a girl who entertains a preference for one of our toiling, stirring, ambitious sex, who may be double her age, or have a snub nose, but who looks dignified and imposing on a pedestal of state, whether she would like him as much if stripped of all his accessories, and left unredeemed to his baptismal register or unbecoming nose. Just as well ask a girl in love with a young Lotharia if she would like him as much if he had been ugly and crooked. The high name of the one man is as much a part of him as good looks are to the other. Thus, though it was said of Madame de la Vallière that she loved Louis XIV. for himself and not for his regal grandeur, is there a woman in the world, however disinterested, who believes that Madame de la Villière would have liked Louis XIV. as much if Louis XIV. had been Mr. John Jones! Honoria would not have bestowed her hand on a brainless, worthless nobleman, whatever his rank or wealth. She was above that sort of ambition; but neither would she have married the best-looking and worthiest John Jones who ever bore that British appellation, if he had not occupied the social position which brought the merits of a Jones within range of the eye-glass of a Vipont.

Many girls in the nursery say to their juvenile confidants, "I will only marry the man I love." Honoria had ever said, "I will only marry the man I respect." Thus it was her respect for Guy Darrell that made her honor him by her preference. She appreciated his intellect—she fell in love with the reputation which the intellect had acquired. And Darrell might certainly choose worse. His cool reason inclined him much to Honoria. When Alban Morley argued in her favor he had no escape from acquiescence, except in the turns and doubles of his ironical humor. But his heart was a rebel to his reason; and between you and me, Honoria was exactly one of those young women by whom a man of grave years ought to be attracted, and by whom, somehow or other, he never is; I suspect, because the older we grow the more we love youthfulness of character. When Alcides, having gone through all the fatigues of life, took a bride in Olympus, he ought to have selected Minerva, but he chose Hebe.

Will Darrell find his Hebe in Flora Vyvyan? Alban Morley became more and more alarmed by that apprehension. He was shrewd enough to recognize in her the girl of all others formed to glad the eye and plague the heart of a grave and reverend seigneur. And it might well not only flatter the vanity, but beguile the judgment, of a man who feared his hand would be accepted only for the sake of his money, that Flora, just at this moment, refused the greatest match in the kingdom—young Lord Vipont, son of the new Earl of Montfort—a young man of good sense, high character, well-looking as men go, heir to estates almost royal—a young man whom no girl on earth is justified in refusing. But would the whimsical creature accept Darrell? Was she not merely making sport of him, and if, caught by her arts, he, sage and elder, solemnly offered homage and hand to that belle dedaigneuse who had just doomed to despair a comely young magnate with five times his fortune, would she not hasten to make him the ridicule of London?

Darrell had, perhaps, his secret reasons for thinking otherwise, but he did not confide them even to Alban Morley. This much only will the narrator, more candid, say to the reader—if out of the three whom his thoughts fluttered round, Guy Darrell wished to select the one who would love him best—love him with the whole, fresh, unreasoning heart of a girl whose childish frowardness sprung from childlike innocence—let him dare the hazard of refusal and of ridicule; let him say to Flora Vyvyan, in the pathos of his sweet, deep voice, "Come, and be the spoiled darling of my gladdened age; let my life, ere it sink into night, be rejoiced by the bloom and fresh breeze of the morning!"

But to say it he must wish it; he himself must love—love with all the lavish indulgence, all the knightly tenderness, all the grateful sympathizing joy in the youth of the beloved, when youth for the lover is no more, which alone can realize what we sometimes see, though loth to own it—congenial unions with unequal years. If Darrell feel not that love, woe to him; woe and thrice shame if he allure to his hearth one who might indeed be a Hebe to the spouse who gave up to her his whole heart in return for hers; but to the spouse who had no heart to give, or gave but the chips of it, the Hebe, indignant, would be worse than Erinnys!

All things considered, then, they who wish well to Guy Darrell must range with Alban Morley in favor of Miss Honoria Vipont. She proffering affectionate respect, Darrell responding by rational esteem. So, perhaps, Darrell himself thought; for whenever Miss Vipont was named he became more taciturn, more absorbed in reflection, and sighed heavily, like a man who slowly makes up his mind to a decision, wise but not tempting.

THE KALEE-POOJAH OF THE THUGS.

In No. 50 of the first volume of Harper's Weekly we gave an illustration showing the manner of camping out among the Thugs in India. The engraving upon the following page represents one of the religious festivals of the horrid band. It is well known that, although they rob those they murder, yet the killing itself is with the Thugs a matter of religious observance. They are devotees of the goddess Kalee, and every murder committed, under favorable omens, and without spilling blood—which is abhorred by the goddess—is a direct act of homage to her.

One of the most curious of the Thug superstitions is connected with the tool they employ to excavate the graves of their victims. As the service is holy, the pickaxe is fabricated with the greatest care, dedicated with many formalities, and held by the whole gang in the greatest veneration. The process of its manufacture and consecration is thus described by a reformed Thug. A lucky day is fixed upon (the Thug does every thing on lucky days), and on this the leader of the gang proceeds to the smith's forge, where, with closed doors, and every precaution against intrusion, the implement is made. After this, it must be consecrated to the service of the goddess Kalee. One well versed in the Thug traditions receives it in a brazen dish, and washes it first in water, next in sugar and water, then in sour milk, and lastly in arrack rum. It is then marked with seven spots of red lead, and replaced in the dish with a cocoa-nut, cloves, sandal-wood, and sugar: these articles, except the cocoa-nut, are then burned, and the pickaxe passed seven times through the flame, after which the leader takes the cocoa-nut and endeavors to divide it with one blow of the pickaxe. Upon the success or failure of this blow the whole matter depends. Failure renders of no avail all the preceding ceremonies, and the tool is at once destroyed. Success completes the consecration, and causes a general jubilee in the gang, who augur well of the expedition which begins so favorably. Prostrating themselves on the ground before the fortunate pick, this is handed over to the leader, who must be a tried Thug. He places it in a well, or buries it in a retired spot till it is wanted for use. Thereupon the whole gang betake themselves, at dead of night, to the hidden retreat of their goddess, convey the image into some retired nook in the forest, and there hold the celebration which our engraving represents.

The image of the goddess is fearfully hideous. It has three eyes—one being, Polyphemus like, in the centre of the forehead; four arms, two on each side, the two lower ones holding the gifts of her devotees, and the upper ones the fatal handkerchief. The head-quarters of the goddess, curiously enough, are in Calcutta, where, however, she has for her devotees all manner of men and women, but not the initiated of her favored fraternity, who worship her image in private.

It is a curious fact, which came out in the examinations, that the Thugs believed seriously that the buried pickaxe would come out of the well, of itself, at the bidding of the man who placed it there. This was firmly believed by even the most intelligent of the bands. When employed to dig the grave of a murdered man, should the pickaxe fall from the hands of the sexton Thug, the whole gang is panic-stricken; regarding this as the worst of all evil omens, betokening the death of the man who dropped it within the year, and disasters to the whole gang, who are henceforth regarded as doomed men, and shunned by all true Thugs. Farther, the pickaxe is used to give solemnity to an oath. The Thugs believe that the most horrible of deaths will, in a few days, overtake any one who violates an oath taken on a sanctified pick. They believe that goor, or sugar, distributed to the band amidst the ceremonies of the goddess, which are represented in our illustration, hardens their hearts, and so entirely changes their natures that, no matter how merciful or disinclined to murder the person was before taking it, he will never be else than a zealous Thug after it.

THE YOGEES OF INDIA.

In the second illustration on the preceding page is depicted one of the many modes of self-torture practiced by the Yogees, a set of mendicant philosophers of Hindostan. These men form a distinct caste, and devote themselves to a mixed life of begging, stealing, cheating, and voluntary self-torment. In times past these men moved in vast bands from place to place, visiting various holy shrines under pretense of worship, but taking care to lay towns and cities, and even whole provinces, under contribution by the way. Sometimes, indeed, the tribute was exacted by force of arms, and the pious Yogee turned marauder. In the time of Warren Hastings such a swarm fell upon Bengal, like a flight of locusts, and marched through the country at full speed, burning and destroying every thing in their way. A body of Sepoy troops was sent after them; but they moved at a speed which defied regular infantry, and regained their native mountains in safety.

Many of the Yogees are devotees of the strictest order; and live only for the fulfillment of the various vows which they make in early life. Such a band is represented in our illustration. They have sworn to torment themselves in company, and so go about from town to town, exhibiting themselves to the public, suspended in various positions from a bamboo frame-work, thus obtaining contributions from the piously inclined. Some are fastened to the frame-work with nails through their hands or ears; some balance themselves on the poles, holding hot irons in their hands; and others throw themselves violently to the ground, from various heights of the bamboo staging. "Hook swinging" is one mode of torture, or penance, in use among the Yogees at the present day; and practiced chiefly at Benares, at a yearly feast of one of the many thousand gods of that monkey-ridden city. The British authorities have endeavored to put a stop to this exhibition, but the superstitious prejudices of the natives have triumphed, and last year the festival was more brilliant than ever, and an unusual number of holy beggars dangled from their appropriate poles by iron hooks thrust into their sides.

But these are not the only forms of this penance. Some of the Yogees make a solemn vow to continue for life in one unvaried position; others traverse vast provinces, dragging a heavy chain; some crawl on their hands and knees, for years, around the entire Indian Empire; and yet others travel from the most remote places to the sacred banks of the Ganges, by rolling their bodies over and over in the mud and dust of the common road, relying upon the kindness of passers-by for food and drink. Some swing, during their miserable lives, before a hot fire; others suspend themselves, with their heads downward, for a certain time, over the fiercest flames, some eat nothing but the grain which has passed through a cow; and indeed this, after being washed clean from its accompaniments, is considered by the most pious Brahmins the purest of all food—so great is their veneration for the cow, the incarnation of Vishnu. A traveler relates the case of a devotee of Siva, who had made a vow to fix every year a large iron ring into the most tender part of his body, to which was fixed a long and heavy chain, which was thus dragged over the ground by him. This extraordinary saint had just put in the seventh ring, and was carrying the seventh chain about his shoulders, until the newly-made orifice should become callous. And again another, who had for so many years held his arms motionless above his head that the muscles had withered, the nails, of twenty years' growth, were like extraordinary horns, and the limbs were fixed motionless in their unnatural posture. Unable to feed himself, this fellow, who had the appearance of a wild beast, was waited on by numbers of wealthy and pious Hindoo ladies, who vied with each other in feeding and attending upon so great a saint.

Such are some of the dark superstitions which meet the Christian missionary on every hand in India. Many of these practices have been, for years, not only countenanced, but pecuniarily supported, by the British East India Company, which, regardless of morality, and intent only upon the amassing of rupees, supported the temples and devotees, for the sake of a pilgrim-tax which was levied on all who approached the protected shrines.

Miscellany.

—We never tire of reading of Harem Life.

Madame La Princess Belgiojoso, who, during the Russian War, wandered about Asia Minor and Syria, has, in a volume lately published in Paris, made a deliberate attempt to destroy what little of romance is still connected with the subject. As a lady she had, of course, advantages for seeing the inner life of the Orientals which are refused to male travelers—and she saw sufficient to prove that not even the last charm, beauty, belongs to the wretched inmates of the Turkish Harem. Here is a sketch of

Turkish Fashions:

Imagine walls blackened and cracked, ceilings with the beams gaping and covered with dust and spiders' webs, sofas torn and greasy, portières in tatters, traces of tallow and oil every where. When I entered for the first time one of these charming places I was disgusted, but the mistresses of the house did not perceive it. Mirrors being very scarce in these countries, the ladies bedizen themselves in the strangest possible guise. They thrust a number of bejeweled pins into printed cotton handkerchiefs and then roll them round their heads. They pay not the slightest attention to their hair, and only the very great ladies who have visited the capital possess combs. As for the many-colored paints, of which they make an immoderate use, they can only regulate their distribution by mutual assistance, and as the women living in the same house are so many rivals, the great object is to render them ridiculous. They put vermilion on their lips, rouge on their cheeks, nose, forehead, and chin, white wherever there is a vacancy, and blue round their eyes and under their nose. Stranger still is the manner in which they paint their eyebrows. They are doubtlessly told that, to be beautiful, the eyebrow should form a large arch, and they have thence concluded that the larger the arch the more beautiful is the eyebrow, without inquiring whether its position is not irrevocably fixed by nature. This being the case, they allow their eyebrows all the space between the temples, and paint on their foreheads two immense arches, which, starting from the top of the nose, run across the forehead. Some young eccentric beauties prefer a straight line to a curve, and trace a broad black band across the forehead; but these are exceptions.

—Having gone through the women's apartments, the Princess had an interview with the aged paterfamilias, whom she interrogated on some domestic customs which are brought out in this picture of a Lively old Patriarch.

"But," I asked again, "as his excellency is no longer young, and has had, as it seems, several young wives always, and only regards them as such to the age of thirty, I calculate that during the course of his long life he must have received a very considerable number into his harem."

"Probably," said the holy man, without any emotion.

"And your excellency has, doubtless, many children?"

The patriarch and his servant looked at each other and burst into a loud laugh.

"Many children?" replied the master, when the fit of mirth had passed off, "I really believe I have; but I could not tell you the number. Say, Hassan," he added, addressing his servant, "could you tell me how many children I have, or where they are?"

"Indeed not. His excellency has them in all the provinces of the empire, and in all the districts of each province; but that is all I know, and I would bet that my master is not wiser than I am on that point."

"And how should I be?" said the old gentleman.

I insisted, for my patriarch was losing my esteem rapidly, and I wished to open his whole heart. "These children," I continued, "how are they brought up? who takes care of them? at what age are they separated from their father? where are they sent? what profession do they follow? what are their means of existence? and by what sign can you recognize them?"

"Oh! I may be mistaken, like any one else; but that is of slight importance. They are all brought up by me, as you see. I am educating these two, until the age when they can take care of themselves. The girls are married, or betrothed, as soon as they have reached their tenth or twelfth year, and I never hear any more about them. The boys are not so precocious, they can not walk alone until they are fourteen; but then I give them a letter of recommendation to some friend in business; he employs them himself or finds them a place, and, after that, I wash my hands of them."

"And you do not see them again?" I went on.

"How do I know? I receive very often visits from people who call themselves my sons, and who may be so. I give them a kind greeting, and keep them for some days without asking any questions; but, at the end of that time, they see there is no room for them here, and nothing for them to do. Their mothers being dead, they are strangers to me. Thus they go away, and never come back any more. Others arrive in their place, and behave in the same way. Nothing could be better."

I was not yet satisfied. "But," I went on, "are these pretty children you are now caressing destined to undergo the same treatment?"

"Certainly.'

"You will separate from them when they are ten or fourteen years of age? You will not be anxious as to what becomes of them? You will never see them again, perhaps? And if they do come back, you will treat them as strangers, and see them go away forever, without giving them one of those kisses of which you are so prodigal to-day? What will become of you presently in your desolate house, when the voice of your children no longer resounds through it?"

I was beginning to grow animated, and my friend did not understand me. The servant, however, seizing the sense of my last words, hastened to reassure me as to the future isolation of his revered master.

"Oh no," he said, "when these children are grown up his excellency will have others quite small. You may safely trust to him in that matter: he will not allow any failure."

Hereupon master and servant burst out laughing once more.

—This is said to be a Utilitarian age. Every body wants to be useful; but with the majority this desire is little more than discontent with that position in which Providence has placed them—a longing, so to speak, to exchange from a small tread-mill to a large one. Bishop Jebb has some sensible words on this subject of Usefulness.

The most efficacious manner in which we can act usefully in the immense circle of the world, and for the good of humanity, is to fill our place in the circumscribed circle of domestic virtues; to form around us an atmosphere of love and benevolence. We must do the good that lies in our power; it afterward belongs to Providence, and not to us, to make that good contribute to the general utility

THINGS WISE AND OTHERWISE.

"Oh, pray let me have my way this time!" said a young gentleman to his lady-love. "Well, Willy, I suppose I must, this once; but you know that after we are married I shall always have a Will of my own."

As two of our children were playing together, little Jane got angry and pouted. Johnny said to her, "Look out, Jane, or I'll take a seat up there on your lips." "Then," replied Jane, quite cured of her pouts, "I'll laugh, and you'll fall off."

During a recent slander case there was a large number of ladies present, who caused a gentle murmuring all the while. The usher called out repeatedly, "Silence!" when the judge mildly said: "Mr. Usher, don't you know better than to call silence when ladies are in court!"

A gentleman having occasion to call upon an author, found him at home in his writing-chamber. He remarked the great heat of the apartment, and said it "was as hot as an oven." "So it ought to be," replied the writer, "for it is here where I make my bread!"

Little Nellie, not quite four years an inhabitant of earth, had been so unfortunate as to have no playmate but an older brother, and he was her instructor in diction. She had been quite refractory, and her mother, after much good counsel and reproof and very kind remonstrances with her, told her she must now whip her, and looked very melancholy. When Nellie says, "Well, mamma, if you must" (with her little arms akimbo), "why, let her rip!"

Joy, Temperance, and Repose,
Slam the door on the doctor's nose.

A Word to the weaker Vessel.—A lady who obstinately persists in wearing hoops ought not to complain of being ridiculed. If she will make a barrel of herself, she must expect to be treated as a butt.

Ladies have the Pull of Gentlemen.—Ladies are following the profession of dentistry in New York. Smellfungus, in his cynical manner, approves of this, and the reason of his approval is, because "Women (he says) are universally acknowledged to be the most practiced hands at stopping men's mouths!"

Happy is the husband who can take his wife down Broadway without stopping at a shawl shop.

Habits of Healthy Exercise.—If a young lady is unable to sport a riding habit, she should adopt a walking habit.

The Hebrew Mind.—"Penny wise, and Pound foolish," as Shylock was.

A perilous Position.—A lady swooned the other day before one of the horrible pictures in the Academy. Owing to the preposterous circumference of her dress, it was found impossible to approach within several yards of her. It was apprehended at one time that she would perish within sight of several hundred sympathizing by-standers, owing to the difficulty of conveying assistance to her; and it was not before the greater part of her skirt (more than sufficient, we are informed, to fill, with the flounces and trimmings, three good-sized wheel-barrows) had been ruthlessly cut away, that restoratives could be administered to her. One minute more delay, and the case might have been fatal!

Mr. S—— has a smart little boy, who frequently gets off a good thing. A few evenings since, as the old man was preparing to ask a blessing on a scanty meal, he was interrupted by this little son, who, leaning reverently forward and folding his hands, thus began:

"Four slices of bread for four of us.
We bless thee, Lord, there ain't no more of us."

The Providence Telegraph says: "Marshal Hudson handed us the following document, which we publish as indicative of the zeal which animates some of the good people, though it may, perhaps, be a question whether it is a zeal according to knowledge. We publish it verbatim et literatim:

"'Mr. William H. Hutson, Esq.,—Sir: I beg to inform That if you do not Send your police to have Josiph Charnley Arrested for continueing in the niuance act, Sum one will have to do So in your Stead, So as A friend I tell you plainly to have it done to-morrow without any heslitateing one hour if you regard your office.'"

The following advertisement appears in an Illinois paper, from a man in the pursuit of business under difficulties:

"take Notice.

"I have moved my residence, my shop is in the fore room of the Jail. all persons wishing to see me will please call, as my business is so, that i can't leave.

"Yours most truly, Charles R. Johnson."

WEEKLY MARKET SUMMARY.

New York, Monday, May 31, 1858.

The Wholesale Produce Markets during the past week have been decidedly brisker for Flour and Wheat, each of which has arrived quite freely, and as receivers have generally been eager sellers, prices have tended downward. Corn continued scarce at advancing prices up to Thursday. Since that day the receipts of Mixed Western have increased, and prices have fallen off. The demand has been fair throughout the week. Rye, Barley, and Oats have declined, with more sellers than buyers ....Cotton has been in limited request at drooping rates ....Groceries have been less sought after, though buyers have had any existing advantage....Provisions have been in fair demand, at, however, irregular prices.... Hay has been moderately dealt in at steady figures.... A limited inquiry has prevailed for Hops, which have slightly declined....Naval Stores have been in request, and they close steadily....Less activity was discernible in Tobacco... Domestic Wool attracted considerable attention at somewhat better prices.

The range of prices according to the actual sales of Live Stock at the leading City Markets last Wednesday was as follows:

Hot Springs, Virginia.

Great Thermal Watering Place of the American Continent!!

NATURE'S REMEDY FOR CHRONIC DISEASES!

The hotel at this place will be open for the reception of visitors on the first of June next. In the number of its Mineral Springs, the variety of their temperatures, and their extraordinary remedial powers in many of the most serious, painful, and dangerous Chronic Diseases that afflict the human race, this Watering Place offers to INVALIDS suffering from the maladies in which THERMAL WATERS are indicated, advantages and facilities for the recovery of health which can be found at no other in the United States.

The supply of mineral water is most abundant, and the bathing establishment for the next season will consist of NINE BATHS, constantly supplied with fresh water from different springs of various temperatures, from 78° to 106° Fahrenheit.

In all cases of acute disease, the hot baths are contra-indicated, but in the chronic forms of

Gout,
Rheumatism,
Diseases of the Liver, with its complications,
Paralysis, free from inflammatory action,
Neuralgia,
Old injuries to the Muscles and Joints,
Enlarged Glands,
Visceral engorgements and obstructions,
Spinal irritation,
Chronic Diarrhœa, and some Diseases peculiar to Females,

the remedial properties of the waters of the VIRGINIA HOT SPRINGS are unrivaled. Many cases of the diseases enumerated above, which had resisted not only the most skillful medical treatment, but in which other mineral waters of high repute had been used in vain, have been entirely cured by their use.

Of the vast number now suffering with these maladies, there are comparatively few, indeed, who would not be either perfectly restored or greatly relieved by these waters. When drank they are anti-acid, mildly aperient, and freely diuretic and diaphoretic. Used as a general bath, they equalize an unbalanced circulation, and restore to the different important organs of the system, when torpid, that natural and healthy sensibility without which they can not perform their respective functions, and the beneficial action of all remedies will be diminished or destroyed. They act powerfully upon the Liver, Kidneys, and Skin; relax contracted tendons; promote glandular secretion; exert a salutary influence over the uterine system, and often relieve in a short time excruciating pain caused by disease in some vital organ.

Diseases Peculiar to Females, &c.

The suppression or painful performance of periodical functions peculiar to females, is frequently relieved in a short time by the use of the waters here.

Enlargement of the Prostate Gland.

Many cases of this dreadful and unmanageable disease, which had resisted the most skillful surgical treatment, have been thoroughly cured at the Hot Springs.

Diseases of the South.

In no class of human maladies have these waters been more eminently successful than in those which prevail in the Southern and Southwestern States.

"In that state of the body termed cachectic, the consequence of derangement of the stomach, liver, and spleen, among the residents of marshy countries, and distinguished by a pale or sallow complexion, puffy skin, swelled extremeties, languor, and disinclination to motion of any kind," the baths here often act like a charm. In chronic diarrhœa, they are powerfully and rapidly curative.

In obstinate TORPOR OF THE LIVER and in the enlarged condition of the Liver and Spleen, which so frequently follows the bilious fevers of the South, their alterative and remedial powers are, it is confidently believed, unsurpassed by those of any other remedy known to the human race.

In many cases where the healthy secretion of the liver had been partially suppressed for years, a course of these waters has brought back the secretion of healthy bile; and in others, where the liver had been engorged and enlarged, the sufferers have been relieved and restored to perfect health by the use of the baths at this place.

The attention of persons suffering with these maladies is particularly called to the cases of Mr. F. B. Clark, of Mobile, Ala.; of the Hon. John L. Manning, of South Carolina; and also to the highly important and interesting letter of Dr. Landon Rives, of Roanoke County, Va., one of the most accomplished medical men in the State.

Pleasure Baths.

Besides the hot baths for invalids, there are at this place two of the most delightful and exhilarating pleasure baths in the world.

The Ladies' Pleasure Bath is octagon in its shape, and 18 feet in diameter. It is of the temperature of 86° Fahrenheit. The water is soft and alkaline in its character, and contains all the ingredients of the Schlangenbad Spa of Germany, which is renowned over all Europe for its cosmetic properties. An analysis of the Virginia Spring shows that it holds in solution sulphuric acid, carbonic acid, chlorine, soda, lime, and magnesia.

The large swimming or pleasure bath for gentlemen is 78° Fahrenheit in temperature, and is supplied with water from the ERWIN SPRING, so called in compliment to a distinguished gentleman of the State of Alabama, whose statement of his own remarkable cure of paralysis by the use of the Hot Springs' baths will be found below. In its chemical composition, the Erwin Spring is almost identical with the New Schlangenbad, as the spring which rises in the Ladies Pleasure Bath is called. These waters impart softness to the skin, and, when used as a bath, their remedial and tonic powers in cases of NERVOUS and MUSCULAR debility and irritation can not be excelled.

Location, Climate, &c., of the Hot Springs.

This place is distant only twenty miles from the Milboro' Depot of the Virginia Central Railroad, and, except those 20 miles, has an unbroken railroad connection with the principal cities on the Atlantic seaboard.

The Springs are situated in one of the narrow valleys with which the mountains abound. The scenery around is wild, romantic, and beautiful; and the climate in summer delightful, salubrious, and invigorative. The thermometer seldom rises higher than 85 degrees, and there is rarely a foggy morning.

The Hotel accommodations are of the first class, and good music will be in attendance.

A large brick building, containing a fine ball room and many excellent lodging rooms, is now in process of construction, and will be completed early in the summer.

Route.—From all the principal cities on the Atlantic seaboard, by railroad, to the Millboro' depot of the Virginia Central Road; thence by stage-coaches twenty miles over a well graded turnpike to the springs. Passengers leaving Richmond, Virginia, or Baltimore, Maryland, in the morning, can come through to this place same day to supper.

Certificates of Cure, &c.

A few certificates of remarkable cures, performed by these waters, will be found below. The attention of invalids is respectfully invited to them; also to the letter of Dr. Rives, and to the opinion of Dr. Wood, as expressed in his work on the Practice of Medicine, in regard to the value of these waters in Chronic Gout, Hepatitis, and Rheumatism.

Opinion of Dr. George B. Wood, of Philadelphia.

This distinguished physician, the Professor of the Practice of Medicine in the University of Pennsylvania, and one of the most eminent medical men of the age, in the second edition of his work on the Practice of Medicine—the most valuable treatise on that subject in the English language—says, at page 464, vol. 1, under the head of GOUT, "The Hot Springs of Virginia are sometimes very beneficial."

Under the head of Chronic Rheumatism, page 443, vol. 1, Dr. Wood remarks: "The hot bath, taken daily, and persevered in for a considerable time, often does much good; and obstinate local affections sometimes give way to a stream of hot water, directed upon them, or the hot douche. A visit to the Hot Springs, in Virginia, may be recommended." At page 461, vol. 2, of the same work, under the head of Chronic Hepatitis: "The Hot Springs of Virginia have also been found very useful, employed in the form of bath."

Letter of Dr. Rives—his opinion of the Hot Springs' baths in Gout, Rheumatism, Diseases of the Liver, Menstrual Derangements, Enlargement of the Prostate Gland, &c., &c.

Roanoke, April 2, 1858.

Dear Sir.—After suffering for two years excruciating pain, from Chronic Rheumatism, I determined to try the effects of the Hot Springs' baths, for this disease. In accordance with this determination, I spent about two weeks, last September, at your Springs (my occupations not giving me more leisure at that season), and I was, for a time, somewhat disappointed at the result, as my pains were rather increased for a month after my return home. But, during the whole of the past winter, I have been entirely free from this painful malady, notwithstanding constant exposure to the inclemencies of the weather in the practice of my profession. I attribute the cessation of these rheumatic pains entirely to the effect of the Hot Springs' baths.

I observed that the primary effect of the baths upon the circulation of the blood was excitant, and the secondary effect sedative; which accounts in part for the curative properties of your baths in chronic diseases, especially where depositions or morbid alterations have occurred in the tissues. Along with this excitement of the circulation of the blood, is a corresponding excitation of the absorbent vessels, which, in chronic diseases, generally are inactive. These vessels are stimulated to the performance of their natural functions, and the result is, that the deposits which have been left in the tissues by previous disease are reabsorbed, and these tissues restored to their normal structure and function. The secondary sedative effect insures the patient against the danger of an inflammatory action. Thus stimulated, from day to day, the absorbent vessels regain their wonted office, and disease gradually disappears. This is, without doubt, the rationale of the way in which the Hot Springs' baths cure the chronic forms of Rheumatism, Gout, Menstrual Derangements dependent on ulceration of the womb, Syphilis, Enlargement of the Prostate Gland, deformities from old injuries, &c., &c.

What assistance is derived from the chemical constituents of the waters I am unable to determine; but I should think their influence must be potent, or such results would hardly have obtained as I witnessed in the above-named diseases, and in Paralysis, Torpidity, and Enlargement of the Liver, Enlargement of the Spleen, Jaundice, and in some forms of Chronic Diarrhœa. The spout baths proved in my own, and in many other cases, as active a stimulant to the liver as calomel itself. From personal observation, and upon the representation of many intelligent visitors, I have no hesitation in recommending persons afflicted with any of the diseases I have enumerated, to resort to the Hot Springs as the most pleasant mode of obtaining relief. I certainly expect to avail myself of the advantage of these baths for a short time every summer.

With sentiments of the highest regard, I remain your friend and obedient servant,

LANDON RIVES, M. D.

Liver Disease, with Diarrhœa, &c.

Case of Francis B. Clark, Esq., of Mobile, Ala.—"One of the most extraordinary cures ever effected by any Mineral Waters."

Hot Springs, Va., Sept. 23, 1856.

Dear Sir,—I most cheerfully comply with your request that I should furnish you with some particulars of my case, which has been so happily relieved by the use of the Hot Baths.

From April, 1849, until June, 1854, I was a constant sufferer from Chronic Diarrhœa, which, supervening upon an attack of something like Cholera, was so obstinate as to evade the best medical skill, North and South. I would sometimes, from the use of medicines, obtain partial relief, and gain sufficient strength to engage in active pursuits—but only for a brief period—to be again prostrated under an acute attack upon the slightest exposure, from which new remedies were required to raise me—those which had previously proved efficacious failing to make any favorable impression when taken the second time. The liver was undoubtedly the seat of my disease, and was so torpid that it could only be goaded into feeble action under the use of mercurials—subsiding again into its former condition when their use was suspended. In fact, my system did not seem to furnish the elements of the biliary secretion. At times I became so feeble and emaciated, from the effects of this distressing disease, that it seemed impossible for me to rally again. The various watering places, which were recommended by sympathizing friends, were tried, but without avail. Cooper's Well and Bladon Springs afforded temporary relief, but the disease returned upon me, shortly after leaving them, with as great severity as before. The Cold Water Cure was tried for a few days, from which I barely escaped with life. I had nearly despaired of ever obtaining relief, and came to the mountains of Virginia to visit the Rockbridge Alum, in June, 1854, as a dernier resort. For two weeks I improved there slightly, but afterwards lost ground rapidly, and at the end of three weeks was confined to my bed. These waters, evidently, did not suit my case; and after a week's confinement, being sufficiently strengthened by the use of medicine to bear a short journey, I came over to the Warm Springs. At that place I learned from some of the visitors, incidentally, of the value of the Hot Springs in cases of Diarrhœa. I came over and gave them a trial—commencing at the temperate bath for a day or two, and afterward alternating between the "Hot Douche" and the "Boiler bath." I soon became conscious of a sensible amendment of my symptoms, and began to improve in flesh and strength. I continued bathing for a fortnight, and left for the Red Sweet Springs, where I remained a week, and again returned to the Hot Springs, bathing as before for another fortnight. My improvement was steady and progressive; and when I left the mountains in October, 1854, I was restored to comparative health, and had gained in weight from 109 lbs. to 132 lbs. I could walk several miles without fatigue, and altogether felt myself to be a new man. I returned home (to Mobile) in November, and during the succeeding winter had again a return of my complaint, but milder in form, and much more manageable than before. In June, 1855, I returned to the Hot Springs, and the use of the baths was attended with the same happy effects as in 1854. Alternating between the Hot and the Red Sweet Springs, I became entirely restored, and returned home well, and have remained well.

I am again a visitor at the Hot Springs the present season, for the purpose of fortifying my system against any lingering predisposition that may remain, and shall, if life is spared, probably return here for several seasons to come, in order to confirm what I really consider to have been one of the most extraordinary cures ever effected by any mineral waters.

If this hastily written statement shall induce any person who may be suffering under like afflictions, to obtain relief by following the course which I have pursued with such happy results, I shall be much gratified.

Yours very truly,

FRANCIS B. CLARK,

Dr. Thomas Goode. Of Mobile, Ala.

Case of the Hon. John L. Manning, of S. C.

Dr. Goode: Dear Sir: A long indisposition from the effects of a deranged state of my liver, led me to try the Hot Spout Bath at your Springs. I had previously remained four or five weeks at the White Sulphur, from which I had derived much advantage, but not so much as to make me believe that I could not be further benefitted by the use of the Hot Baths.

Its effect upon me was immediate, and as powerful as I had been led to suppose, producing a free action of the liver. I continued to use them eight or nine days with equally happy effects. Entertaining, as I do, the highest opinion of the efficacy of the Hot Springs in all cases of a diseased liver, I am led to give you this simple statement for the benefit of others who may stand as much in need of them as myself.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN L. MANNING,

Of South Carolina.

Hot Springs in Paralysis.

Case of Col. Jno. Erwin, of Greensboro, Ala. His opinion of the waters in Paralysis, Neuralgia, Liver Disease, and Chronic Diarrhœa.

Hot Springs, Va., Sept. 2, 1855.

Dear Sir: Having spent portions of four summers at this place, and used the waters freely, it affords me great satisfaction to give you the result of my experience of their beneficial effects on myself, as also of what I know of them on others.

In the winter of 1853—54, I had an attack of paralysis of my right side—Hemiplegia—which prostrated me to such a degree that I was, for some time, unable to walk; nor could I hold a pen in my fingers so as to write my name or make a letter of the alphabet. By the use of ordinary remedies and very strict regimen in my diet, I recovered so far as to be able to go about, though with difficulty. Having, from what information I could obtain, become impressed with the great value of thermal waters in the treatment of this most shocking disease, and having previously visited this place and acquired some knowledge of the medicinal character of its waters, I determined to come here to see what they would do for me in my afflicted condition. So soon as my situation and the season permitted, I accordingly did so, and arrived early in July, 1854. I remained three weeks, bathing regularly every day, first in the Temperate Bath and then in the Hot Spout. On leaving here I made a short visit to the Salt Sulphur Springs, in Monroe County, whence I returned here and remained a week more, and bathed every day in the Hot Spout Bath. The result was, I felt signally benefitted, and returned home greatly improved—so much so, that to a casual observer nothing appeared to be the matter with me.

I have now, this summer ('56), been here altogether three weeks and a half, and have, during that time, bathed regularly once a day in the Temperate Bath; and am now prepared to return home, with the gratifying conviction that I am entirely and permanently relieved, and feel that this happy result has mainly been owing to the use of the thermal waters at this place. So much for my own personal experience.

I know of several other cases in which the subjects of them received great benefit from the use of the waters here, and such is my confidence in their virtue, that I am thoroughly persuaded they will, if their use be persisted in, and prudence in diet be observed, with moderate but regular exercise, either on foot or otherwise, cure any ordinary case of paralysis, either general or local. The boy John, who attends the Hot Spout Bath, furnishes a striking case to show the correctness of this opinion. After being very badly afflicted, he assures me that he does not feel the slightest vestige of the disease remaining—the truth of which is apparent to every one who sees him; and he was cured here by the use of the Temparate Bath only.

While here in 1854, I made the acquaintance of a gentleman who resided near Winchester, who informed me that he had been paralyzed so badly as to be unable to walk or speak. When I met with him he had the appearance of enjoying robust health; and he told me that his restoration to health was owing to the use of the Hot Springs' Baths. I could mention other cases, where persons had been signally benefitted by the use of the baths here, but as they must be well known to you, and the subjects of them are accessible, I prefer to let them speak for themselves.

I know of a few cases where the use of these waters have had very happy effects in Neuralgia and Rheumatism; of the former, a lady of my acquaintance in Alabama furnishes an instance; and Richard Norris, jr., of Baltimore, one of the latter.

I am satisfied, from actual experience, that the use of the hot water at this place often has an excellent effect on the liver; and in chronic diarrhœa I have greater confidence in its efficacy than any thing with which I am conversant.

Mr. F. B. Clarke, of Mobile, Ala., is mainly indebted to it for his restoration to health, from the worst condition, and after all other remedies had failed. Hoping my experience and observation may be the means of extending a knowledge of the waters of the Hot Springs to others who may be afflicted, and of giving a wider scope to their already high fame,

I remain, Sir, with high respect, your ob't serv't,

JNO. ERWIN,

Dr. Thos. Goode. Of Greensboro', Ala.

Rheumatism.

Case of thirty-two years' duration cured in two weeks!

Alexandria, Va., August 14, 1856.

Dear Sir: Having been induced by my family and friends to visit the Hot Springs in the year 1852, for the cure of Rheumatism, which I had contracted by having taken a severe cold as early as the year 1819 (and when first taken I was confined to my bed for the space of one year). I arrived at the Spring on the 22d July, 1852. At that time I was completely prostrated, having lost my appetite and spirits, and my general health very much impaired. The morning I arrived I was unable to ascend the steps of the hotel without assistance. After having taken the third temperate bath, I was able to walk, and even run without pain. My stay at the Springs was two weeks, during which time I took nine Temperate and Hot Spouts and one Boiler Bath, and felt myself entirely cured of Rheumatism, and had not, for a year after leaving the Springs, as much pain in my limbs as I had previously in any one day for 32 years—being the space of time I had been afflicted with the disease. My general health was thoroughly restored by the free use of the waters—having drank much of them while in the bath and during the day in my room. I consider my cure as a great triumph of the medicinal and curative properties of the water of the Hot Springs, and feel grateful that my steps were turned in that direction. I have been a visitor at the Hot Springs every year since 1852. Not having used the water of any other of the Springs of Virginia, I attribute my cure to the Hot Springs, and none other.

In this connection permit me to state, that by the advice of one of my friends, a patient of Dr. D. M. French, of Pearisburg, Giles County, Va., by the name of Farley (I think) was recommended to visit the Hot Springs in August, 1854. He was severely afflicted with Chronic Rheumatism, and was scarcely able to move about, his limbs very much swollen and joints enlarged. He remained during the time I staid, being about two weeks, then left for his home a well man. I heard from him but a few days ago; he was in good health, and entirely free from Rheumatism.

I give you the above statement that others who are afflicted with disease may come to the healing well of water, and, like me, return to their families and friends in high health and renewed strength. A similar statement to the above of my own case I addressed to you by lettter in the year of 1853, and learned to-day, for the first time, with regret, that the communication never reached you.

The foregoing you are at liberty to use as you may deem best for afflicted humanity.

Very respectfully, your friend,

Dr. Thos. Goode. P. G. UHLER.

Residence: No. 15 North Washington Street, Alexandria, Va.

Case of Muscoe Garnett, of Essex Co., Va.

Hot Springs, Va., August 18, 1856.

Dear Sir: At your request I very cheerfully give you a history of my cure of a most violent and distressing case of Rheumatism. In the month of June, 1833, from great exposure in the past winter and the too sudden checking of a diarrhœa, I was attacked with Acute Rheumatism, which ultimately spread itself from the crown of my head to the soles of my feet. My sufferings were sometimes so great that my screams might be heard at a distance; and the hottest steam that could be brought to bear upon my feet and knees was a relief from the agony of the pain with which I suffered. To such an extent was the steam used that the soles of my feet were literally crisped, and yet the pain of the burning was nothing when compared with the pain of Rheumatism. This continued until the muscles of my legs and knees became so contracted that they might be truly said to be doubled up, and my arms and jaws almost useless. I could use but one arm, and that only enough, by resting on my heart, to bring such food as I could take to my mouth. I could only open my mouth wide enough to get in a little soaked cracker, or something equally soft. In this condition, being as helpless as a new-born babe, I was placed in my carriage on pillows, in the month of August, and started for the Warm and Hot Springs. I staid and bathed a few days at the Warm, and came on to the Hot, at which latter place I remained some three or four weeks, taking the Boiler and the Hot Spout each day alternately. I had to be carried to and from the bath on a litter, and had to be put in and taken out. I went to no other Springs, took no medicine, except to drink the hot water freely. Before leaving I walked about with my cane, rode on horseback, and went home rejoicing in renewed health and strength; and from that day to this I have never met with one afflicted with Rheumatism that I have not advised them at once to go to the Hot Springs. It is Nature's own remedy.

I might add to this case of my own some cases which I witnessed while at the Springs, if any thing more remarkable than my own. One I will mention, that of an old sea captain, who, being wholly unable to walk, brought with him a most athletic Irishman, who carried him about upon his brawny shoulders. This old man, from great exposure or some other cause, had lost the use of one leg, and so insensible was his foot, that, by some accident on his journey, one of his toes was nearly cut off, and he was unaware of the injury until some time after. Before I left the Springs, this old man was walking about, merely resting his hand upon the shoulder of his attendant.

Very respectfully yours,

MUSCOE GARNETT, of Essex, Va.

Injuries to the Muscles, Joints, and Tendons.

Case of the Hon. John Y. Mason, since Attorney-General of the United States, Minister to France, &c. He "regarded himself as indebted to the Hot Springs for his leg."

Southampton, 15*th February*, 1843.

Dear Sir: Having derived the most important benefit from the use of the Spout Bath at the Hot Springs, it gives me pleasure to comply with your request, and bear testimony to its virtues.

In the month of August, 1829, a horse ran away with me in a gig—I leaped out, fractured the small bone in my leg, and injured the patilla or knee-pan most severely. A tedious confinement was the consequence. When I was sufficiently recovered to leave my bed, I found the leg so contracted that I could not walk without the aid of crutches. Indeed, when standing erect, my foot did not reach the ground by four inches. The limb shrunk from inaction, and, fearing I should be a cripple for life, I visited Philadelphia, and consulted Dr. Physic. He told me my case was hopeless, and surgical aid would be of no avail. I returned home and went to the Hot Springs. I had then been on crutches more than twelve months; my left leg was not half the size of the right, and so contracted that I could not get the foot to the ground. The very first bath relaxed the contraction, my leg became straight, and I walked back to my cabin without crutches. I used the bath once a day for about three weeks. The limb was gradually restored, and I have never used crutches since. I regard myself as indebted to the Hot Springs for my leg.

I am, most respectfully, your obedient servant and friend,

Dr. Thomas Goode. J. Y. MASON.

Gout.

Case of T. Fleming.

Mannsville, Goochland County, Virginia, August 25, 1856.

Dear Sir: Agreeably to your request, I send you the following certificate:

Ten years ago I was taken with a violent inflammatory rheumatic gout; and I suffered the tortures of an inquisition for four years. In 1850 I went to the Hot Springs, and after taking three or four baths, I was enabled to walk without the aid of stick or crutch. I remained at the Hot Springs fourteen days, and went home apparently well; so much so, I thought it useless for me to return the following summer, and therefore did not go. But, unfortunately, the next spring I was taken with the most violent attack I ever had, which lasted me for four months; the greater part of my time confined to my bed and on crutches. I then determined I would visit the Hot Springs every year, which I have done regularly, and, am happy to say, have never had an attack since.

Very respectfully yours, &c.,

Dr. Thomas Goode. T. FLEMING.

There is nothing doubtful or empirical in the use of Mineral Waters for the cure of Chronic Diseases. In Europe the "affirmative and approving voices of many centuries, of many physicians of the first eminence, and (what is better still) of many patients who have been cured by the Mineral Waters, after having in vain tried all the resources of art,"* attest their pre-eminent value.

And there is abundant evidence in my possession to prove that, in their power to subvert DISEASE and to restore HEALTH, in the maladies for which they are recommended, the VIRGINIA HOT SPRINGS are not excelled by any mineral water on the face of the globe.

☞ The Hot Springs Pamphlet, containing an analysis of the water, with cases of cure, &c., will be sent by mail to any person who may request it.
